

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. COURT RULES.

COURT OF CHANCERY OF NEW JERSEY.

The following was promulgated as rule 222 on November 25, 1905:

Rule 222. RECEIVERS OF PARTNERSHIP.

Receivers appointed or directed to wind up the affairs of a partnership or pay its debts, shall give notice of their appointment, and notice to creditors to present their claims. These notices shall be similar (mutatis mutandis) to the notices required to be given by assignees under the general assignment act, and shall be published and mailed in the same manner. The court may, by special order, make other or different directions as to the notices to be given or the time or manner of their publication.

At the expiration of three months from the time of appointment, the receiver shall file a list of the claims presented and proved. The receiver or any creditor or other person interested, may except to the allowance of the whole or any part of any claim presented, of which exception notice shall be given to the claimant, and thereupon order shall be taken for adjudication upon the claim. The court may, by special order, make other or different directions as to the time or manner of presenting the list of claims.

This rule shall not apply to receivers directed to continue a partnership business, unless by special order.

On the same day the Chancellor altered rule 4 by adding, at the end of the first paragraph, the following:

"And except, further, that the Tuesdays whereon the regular term of the court is opened, shall not be motion days at the Chancery Chambers at Newark."

SUPREME COURT OF RHODE ISLAND.

Rules of Practice.

On the seventeenth day of July, A. D. 1905, the following rules were adopted by the Supreme Court of the state of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in session at Providence, to regulate the practice in actions and proceedings in said court, all other rules theretofore existing being rescinded:

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS.

1. Any person desiring to be admitted to the bar may file his petition in the clerk's office setting forth:

First.—That he is a citizen of the United States, or has filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen; that he resides in this state; that he is over twenty-one years of age; and that he intends, if admitted, to practice law in this state.

Secondly.—Either that he has received a classical education and has studied law two years in the office of an attorney and counsellor at law, or two years in some law school in the country and the office of an attorney and counsellor, six months of which time of study, at least, shall in all cases have been in the office of an attorney and counsellor in this state;

Or that, not having received a classical education, he has studied law three years in the office of an attorney and counsellor at law, or three years in some law school in the country and the office of an attorney and counsellor, six months of which time of study, at least, shall have been in the office of an attorney and counsellor in this state;

Or that, having been admitted to the bar in some one of the United States, he has practiced law therein for more than three years and has studied law in the office of an attorney and counsellor in this state for the term of six months;

Or that, having been admitted to the bar in some one of the United States, he has practiced law for more than ten years.

Such petition shall be endorsed by an attorney and counsellor of this court, who shall certify that the petitioner is of good moral character and, in his opinion, a suitable person for admission to the bar. Upon filing such petition the petitioner shall pay to the clerk a fee of ten dollars: Provided, that in case an applicant is unsuccessful in his first application he shall be required to pay, upon the filing of any subsequent petition, the sum of five dollars only.

2. Any person entering the office of an attorney and counsellor in this state as a student of law shall file forthwith, with the clerk, a certificate from such attorney that the student has begun a course of study in his office; and the term of study of such student for the purpose of these rules shall be computed from the time of the filing of such certificate in the clerk's office.

3. Unless otherwise specially ordered, all petitions for admission to the bar shall be referred to a board of bar examiners of five members, appointed by the court. The members of the present board shall hold office for the term of five years from the date of their several appointments; and hereafter one member shall be appointed annually on the third day of March for the term of five years. The court may remove any examiner at its pleasure and fill any vacancy in said board.

4. The board of bar examiners shall investigate and verify the allegations in the petitions referred to them, shall ascertain the character, qualifications, and attainments of the several petitioners, and, unless otherwise specially ordered, shall subject the petitioners to examination as to their knowledge of law, and shall report to the court upon each petition, with such recommendation as they shall think proper.

If the board report that the petitioner is qualified and recommend his admission, then, unless the court otherwise order, he shall be admitted as an attorney and counsellor at law of this court, and as such shall be entitled to practice law in all the courts of this state.

5. The board of bar examiners shall determine the time and place of all examinations for admission to the bar, and shall notify the clerk of the time and place so fixed at least twenty days before the time for each examination; and said clerk shall publish in some one or more of the daily newspapers printed in the city of Providence, for the space of ten days before the time so fixed, a notice of such time and place and a list of the names and residences of the several applicants whose petitions shall have been referred to said board for action at the coming examination. Said board may make rules for their organization, conduct, and government, subject to the approval of the court.

Such compensation as the court shall determine shall be allowed and paid to the members of the board by the clerk of the court, from the fees received by him, under the provisions of rule 1.

6. Every person who is admitted as an attorney and counsellor shall take in open court the following engagement:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will demean myself as an attorney and counsellor of this court, and of all other courts before which I may practice as an attorney and counsellor, uprightly and according to law, and that I will support the Constitution and laws of this state, and the Constitution of the United States."

7. Members of the bar of other states not residing in this state will be permitted on motion to conduct or argue any case on trial in the courts of this state as heretofore, but no nonresident can be recognized as an attorney in any case for the purposes of endorsing writs, filing answers or pleas, or issuing or receiving notices or agreements.

8. Complaints against members of the bar for unprofessional conduct shall be made in writing and shall set forth specifically the facts upon which the charge is based. Such complaints when filed with the clerk will be referred for examination and report thereon to a standing committee of five members of the bar appointed by the court. The members of the present committee shall hold office until the expiration of their respective terms of appointment, and vacancies as they occur hereafter will be filled by appointments for the term of three years.

The members of this committee will be excused from attendance in court when necessary to fulfill engagements previously made to attend meetings of this committee.

FILING AND ENTERING PETITIONS, APPEALS, ETC., AND NOTICE THEREON.

9. Notice on petitions for trials or new trials in which notice is necessary shall be by citation issued by the clerk as of course, when the petition is filed, returnable at a time requested by the petitioner, not less than ten nor more than twenty days after the issue thereof, unless some other special notice shall be ordered by the court. Such citation shall be served at least ten days before the return-day, and the cause shall be placed by the clerk on the calendar of the court for hearing by the court on the return-day, of the citation, except that in vacation the citation shall be returnable on the first day on which the court will be in session, if said day shall not occur within twenty days from the date of citation.

Cases in which the Supreme Court and superior court have original concurrent jurisdiction shall not be filed or received by the clerk of the Supreme Court without leave of the court. Such matters may be called up in open court, without previous filing, upon the question whether the court will entertain jurisdiction.

The clerk is authorized to place other proceedings, original or appellate, in which the statute does not provide for notice upon the calendar of the court when requested by the moving party, upon the question of the notice to be given adverse parties of the pendency of proceedings.

Every appeal, petition, complaint, or other application in writing to the court shall have the name of the attorney presenting the same endorsed thereon; and every paper filed in any case, excepting notes, deeds, or other documentary evidence, shall also have endorsed thereon the name and number of the case and a brief designation of the character of the paper. The only proof of the time of filing any paper shall be the file-mark of the clerk.

DOCKETING.

10. All cases shall be docketed and numbered consecutively in the classes to which they respectively belong, except that the court may order a new series of numbers when it is deemed to be desirable. The classes will include the following:

- (1) Constitutional Questions.
- (2) Miscellaneous Petitions and Appeals.
- (3) Bills of Exceptions, etc.
- (4) Equity.

Petitions for extraordinary and prerogative writs and processes, and all appeals except appeals in equity, shall be docketed under "Miscellaneous Petitions and Appeals."

Bills of exceptions, petitions for trials and new trials, actions in which agreed statements of fact have been filed, motions in arrest of judgment, and all questions certified from lower courts in actions or criminal proceedings shall be docketed under "Bills of Exceptions, etc."

Proceedings in equity originally entered in the Supreme Court, appeals in equity, causes in equity certified to Supreme Court, and cases stated for opinions shall be docketed under "Equity."

ASSIGNMENT OF CASES.

11. Assignments of cases for hearing may be made by agreement of parties for Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of each week during the session, except that cases will not be assigned for hearing on legal holidays, nor on Good Friday, Commencement Day at Brown University, and the two days before and the two days after Christmas Day.

AFFIDAVITS.

12. In all petitions for new trials in which affidavits are admissible, the petitioner shall file his affidavits at least five days before the day set for hearing; and in case counter affidavits are admissible said counter affidavits shall be filed at least three days before the day of trial, unless otherwise allowed by the court.

BILLS OF EXCEPTIONS, ETC.

13. Every petition for allowance of a bill of exceptions or for determining the correctness of a transcript of testimony in this court shall be verified by affidavit accompanying the petition, setting forth in full the rulings upon which the exceptions are based or the grounds of objection and all facts material thereto, and the petitioner shall within twenty-four hours after the filing of his petition deliver to the adverse party or his attorney of record a copy of the same and the affidavits annexed thereto. The adverse party may file counter affidavits within ten days after receiving the copies aforesaid, and the court may grant further time to the petitioner to reply in its discretion; and thereafter the petition shall stand for assignment and hearing on motion of either party.

If the papers in the case shall not have been transmitted to this court upon the filing of the petition, the court will order the same transmitted when the exceptions are allowed.

ARGUMENTS AND BRIEFS.

14. Forty-eight hours, at least, before the day for which any case is assigned for trial, each party shall file with the clerk of the court, for the opposite party, each of the justices, and the reporter, a printed or typewritten brief, signed by the counsel presenting it, which shall contain (1) a brief and concise statement of the case, (2) the specific questions raised, duly numbered, and (3) the points made, together with the authorities relied on in support thereof. In cases where it may be necessary for the court to go into an examination of record evidence, each party shall briefly specify in his brief the leading facts which he deems established by the evidence, with a reference to the pages where the evidence of such facts may be found. In case the briefs are typewritten, they shall be on good paper and distinctly legible. No tissue-paper briefs will be received. The size of the paper shall be eight inches by ten, with not less than one inch margin on each side. The size of type to be used in printing briefs shall be that used in the text of Rhode Island Reports, as near as may be.

For the purpose of preservation and convenience of reference they shall be bound on the left side of the front page and not at the top.

A party in default shall not be heard, except by leave of court.

AGREEMENTS.

15. All agreements of parties or attorneys touching the business of the court shall be in writing, or they will be considered of no validity.

AMENDMENTS.

16. When the court shall allow amendments to any of the pleadings in a cause, they shall be embodied in a fair copy of the whole paper as amended, which shall then be substituted for the original.

The court will allow slight amendments, which do not affect legibility, to be made on the face of the original paper.

MOTIONS.

17. On the first Monday in every month on which the court is in session the court will hear motions for assignment of cases and for other purposes, before taking up the calendar for the day.

In case the first Monday of the month falls on a legal holiday, motion-day shall be the next day on which the court shall be in session.

TAKING OUT TRANSCRIPTS OF EVIDENCE.

18. Either party may take out the transcript of evidence, upon leaving receipt therefor, to be kept for the period of three weeks, unless the case at the time of taking out transcript shall be assigned for trial, in which event the transcript may be kept for one-half the period elapsing between the time of taking out and the date on which the case is assigned for trial: Provided, that the transcript shall not be retained by either party for a period longer than three weeks; and provided, further, that a transcript of evidence shall not be taken out a second time by the same side, except by consent of parties, until the other side has had an opportunity for three days of taking out same.

VOLUME 62.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF SCHOOL FOR INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION IN CITY OF HOBOKEN v. MAYOR, ETC. OF HO- BOKEN et al.

1. TRUSTS — PUBLIC CORPORATIONS — CONVEY- ANCES.

Certain donors offered to contribute funds for the erection of a free city public library building, provided that accommodations be at the same time given for the city's industrial education department and that the city would raise the balance of the funds necessary to erect the building. This offer was accepted by a resolution of the city council, and thereafter the site was purchased by the donors and conveyed to the city by a plain bargain and sale deed containing no restrictions. Held, that the city took title under such deeds on the trusts contained in the offer of donation.

2. CHARITIES — ENFORCEMENT — JURISDICTION IN EQUITY.

Where a library and mechanical education building was erected by a city in part from funds derived from a charity, subject to certain restrictions, a bill to regulate the use of such building was within the jurisdiction of equity as a bill to establish and enforce a charitable use.

3. SAME—GIFTS—PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

A gift of funds for the erection of a free public library building, to be used for a library and for industrial education in a city by the city's board of trustees of schools for industrial education and its free library board, constituted a valid gift for charitable uses; neither the city nor the two boards of trustees being prohibited by legislative or constitutional provision from taking property for charitable uses.

4. SAME—USE OF BUILDING.

Where a building was erected by a city with the proceeds of a charity for the construction of a free public library and mechanical education building, to be controlled by the city's board of trustees of schools for industrial education and by the trustees of the city's free public library, the "assembly room" on the third floor of the building was subject to joint use of both the library and school, while the "class room" in the basement was for the exclusive use of the school.

Bill by the board of trustees of schools for industrial education in the city of Hoboken against the mayor and common council of such city and the city's trustees of the city's public library to regulate the use of the public library and an industrial education building. Decree for complainant.

Black & Drayton, for complainants. J. F. Minturn, for defendants.

GARRISON, V. C. This is a bill filed by the board of trustees of schools for industrial education in the city of Hoboken against the mayor and common council of the city of Hoboken and the trustees of the free public library of the city of Hoboken. The city is, of course, a municipal corporation created by the Legislature, and the other parties are each public corporations of this state created and existing under appropriate legislation. The subject-matter of dispute is the regulation of the use of a building which was erected under the following circumstances:

On the 26th day of March, 1895, the following letter was sent and received: "Hoboken, N. J. March 26, 1895. Edward Russ, Esq., Chairman on Sites, Free Public Library—Dear Sir: On behalf of my mother, Mrs. Martha Stevens, and my sister-in-law, Mrs. John Stevens, and myself, I beg to acquaint you with the fact that we are willing to donate to the city of Hoboken in land and cash a sum not exceeding $28,000 towards the erection of a free public library building by the free public library trustees of the city of Hoboken, providing that accommodations at the same time be given for the proper accommodation of the industrial education department of the city of Hoboken, and providing that the city of Hoboken will raise the balance of the amount necessary to erect such buildings as may meet our approval for the above object, and providing that this offer must be accepted before the 1st day of July of this year, and that the deed of conveyance shall contain such restrictions as will insure the accomplishment of the above-named objects. The site of said building to be selected by the library trustees. Yours respectfully, Richard Stevens."

Thereupon the city took action as follows: City council received a report, dated April 24, 1895, as follows: "To the Honorable the Mayor and Council of the city of Hoboken—Gentlemen: Your special committee, appointed at the request of the board of trustees of the free public library to confer with the members of the said board in regard to the communication of Mrs. Martha Stevens, Mrs. John Stevens, and Mr. Richard Stevens to the board of trustees of the free public library, offering to donate land or cash to the value of $26,000 for the purpose of erecting a free public library building and school for manual training, would respectfully report that they have had a conference with the donors, committee of the board of trustees of the free public library, and a committee of the board of the manual training of industrial education, and would recommend the adoption of the following: 'Resolved, that the generous and public-spirited offer of Mrs. Martha Stevens, Mrs. John Stevens, and Mr. Richard Stevens be accepted under the conditions and restrictions mentioned in their communication dated March 28, 1895, and presented to this council March 27, 1895.' J. H. Timken, Edw. Offerman, A. Sturken, Committee."—and passed the resolution just quoted. Thereafter a site was selected by the library trustees, and the land was purchased by Mrs. Stevens, and by a deed dated the 7th of January, 1896, was conveyed to the mayor and council of the city of Hoboken. This deed is a plain bargain and sale deed, with no provisions or restrictions. Under these circumstances I find that the city took this title upon the trusts expressed in the writings above quoted.

Plans were then prepared under the joint supervision of the library trustees and the school trustees, and those plans were submitted to the donors and were by them approved. These plans provided for a building which, although under the one roof should practically contain two separate structures—one for the use of the library, and one for the use of the industrial school. The entrance to the library part of the building is upon one street, and that to the industrial school is upon another street. The various rooms on the plans have the purposes for which they are intended indicated by appropriate language; most of the rooms intended for the use of the school being marked "Class Room," and those for the use of the library being marked "Stack Room," or similar descriptive terms. There is one room upon the top floor of the building which is marked "Assembly Room."

There is no contention before me in this suit as to the use of any other rooms than the one in the basement, marked on the plans "Class Room," and the room on the top floor, marked "Assembly Room." The donors paid $17,719.40 for the land, and paid over the balance in cash. The remainder of the cost was raised upon bonds issued under legislative authority. The building was built according to the plans, and has since been occupied by the library trustees in their portion and by the industrial school trustees in their portion. Neither body has had occasion to use the assembly room excepting at the dedicatory exercises, and upon that occasion they joined in its use. The room marked "Class Room" in the basement has not been put to practical use by either party until just before the beginning of this suit; the library trustees having used it as a storeroom. The school trustees now need this room for their school purposes. Their right to use this room is disputed by the library trustees. Each side asserts the right to use the assembly room and the right of each is denied by the other. On the 12th of November, 1903, a deed was executed by the proper officers of the city of Hoboken, conveying the title to this property to the trustees of the free public library. This deed was based upon a resolution authorizing it, passed by the city council, which resolution was, upon certiorari, set aside by the Supreme Court. The opinion of the Court will be found in Keuffel v. Mayor, etc., of Hoboken, 59 Atl. 20.

I am of opinion that this bill should be considered as a bill to establish and enforce a charitable use, which, of course, is a well-recognized head of equity jurisprudence. "The primitive and inherent powers of a court of equity in this domain are sui generis, and of a very extensive character, * * * in full vigor in the hands of the chancellor of this state." Beasley, C. J. in Hesketh v. Murphy, (Ct. Err. & App. 1882) 36 N. J. Eq., at page 307. No special technical words are necessary to establish a charitable use or trust. If the words of donation specify some definite purpose which is regarded by the law as charitable, or for some general purpose which the law regards as charitable, that is sufficient. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 912 et seq. This donation was clearly a gift for charitable uses. A library has been held to be the proper subject of a charitable use (Brown v. Pancoast [Runyon, Ch.; 1881] 34 N. J. Eq. 321; George v. Braddock [Ct. Err. & App.] 45 N. J. Eq., 757, 18 Atl. 881, 6 L. R. A. 511, 14 Am. St. Rep. 754); as have schools (Stevens v. Shippen, 28 N. J. Eq. 487; Green v. Blackwell [N. J. Ch.] 35 Atl. 375; Hyde's Ex'rs v. Hyde, 64 N. J. Eq. 9, 53 Atl. 593). Municipal corporations and public corporations are held to have power to take property for charitable uses, unless disenabled by positive legislation. Dillon's Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) § 566 (436) et seq., p. 661 et seq.; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 922. Neither the municipal corporation nor the two public corporations involved in this suit are so disenabled by any legislative or constitutional prohibition brought to my attention or within my knowledge. I therefore conclude that by the donation, its acceptance, and the subsequent acts of the parties, a charitable use was created, and the building erected is for the use of the free public library and the industrial school in accordance with the intention of all of the parties, as indicated upon the plans.

It only remains, then, to determine the terms, limitations, or conditions of the trust. In this case these are readily ascertainable from the written papers expressing the trust and the joint and mutual actions of the parties. The building was intended to be used jointly in its separable parts by the free public library and the industrial school, and with respect to every part of the building, excepting the assembly room, its intended use was indicated in advance and was agreed upon by all the parties in interest. With respect to the assembly room, I find that it was intended to be used by each of the two corporate occupants of the building as their necessities required; that neither has an exclusive right, but each has a right. The class room in the basement was undoubtedly intended for the school, and to the extent, at least, that it is required for school purposes, is within the exclusive control of the school trustees.

I will advise a decree to define and enforce the charitable trust in accordance with the above-expressed views.

DOREMUS et al. v. MAYOR ETC., OF PATERSON et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. 30, 1906.)

1. EQUITY—CROSS-BILL—DEFINITION.

A cross-bill is one brought by the defendant against the plaintiff (and other parties, if necessary) in another suit touching the same matter, either to obtain discovery of facts in aid of the defense to the original bill, or to obtain full relief to all parties touching the matters of the original bill.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, §§ 446-449.]

2. SAME—NEW FACTS—SCOPE OF BILL.

Only such new facts are properly pleaded in a cross-bill as are necessary for the court to have before it in deciding the question raised in the original suit and to enable the court to do complete justice to all the parties in respect to the cause of action pleaded in the bill.

3. SAME—INAPPLICABLE ALLEGATIONS.

Where an original bill was filed against a city to restrain a nuisance consisting of the pollution of a river, a cross-bill filed by the city, in which it admitted the nuisance, but averred that a certain water company had unlawfully diverted for the benefit of another city water which would otherwise have flowed past defendant city and helped to dilute its sewage, and that another water company had constructed a dam across the river below defendant city, which prevented the passage of sewage down the stream, was fatally defective, as pleading matters not germane to the original bill.

4. SAME—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

Such cross-bill, seeking to make the water companies parties defendant, was demurrable for multifariousness.

5. SAME—MISJOINDER OF PARTIES.

The cross-bill was also demurrable for misjoinder of parties.

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—POLLUTION—DEFENSES—INDEPENDENT WRONGDOERS—CONTRIBUTION.

In a suit to restrain a city from polluting a water course, it was no defense that the acts of certain others contributed to cause the nuisance complained of; there being no contribution between independent wrongdoers.

7. SAME—ANSWER.

Where, in a suit to restrain the further pollution of a water course by a city, complainants stated their damages calculated on the basis of the injuries being permanent, and defendant admitted the nuisance, its answer failing to state whether the taking of complainant's property rights was to be perpetual or only temporary, and, if the latter, for what time the taking was to continue, was fatally defective.

Bill by Henry W. Doremus and others against the mayor and alderman of the city of Paterson and others. On application to strike defendant's cross-bill. Granted.

See 52 Atl. 1107; 55 Atl. 304; 57 Atl. 548; 61 Atl. 396.

Sherrerd Depue, for complainants. George S. Hilton, for defendant.

STEVENS, V. C. This is an application to strike out a cross-bill under rule 213. A cross-bill is a bill brought by the defendant against the plaintiff (and, if necessary, other parties) in another suit touching the same matter. Dan. Ch. Pr. (6th Am. Ed.) 1548. It is brought either (1) to obtain a discovery of facts in aid of the defense to the original bill or (2) "to obtain full relief to all parties touching the matters of the original bill." Story, Eq. Pl. § 389. "It should not introduce new and distinct matters not embraced in the original bill, as they cannot be properly examined in that suit, but constitute the subject-matter of an original independent suit. The cross-bill is auxiliary to the proceeding in the original suit, and a dependency upon it. * * * If its purpose be different from this, it is not a cross-bill, though it may have a connection with the said general subject." Stonemetz Printers' Co. v. Brown & Co. (C. C.) 46 Fed. 851. "The new facts which it is proper for a defendant to introduce into a pending litigation by means of a cross-bill are such, and such only, as it is necessary for the court to have before it in deciding the question raised in the original suit, to enable it to do full and complete justice to all the parties before it in respect to the cause of action on which complainant rests his right to aid or relief. If a defendant, in filing a cross-bill, attempts to go beyond this and to introduce new and distinct matter, not essential to the proper determination of the matter put in litigation by the original bill, although he may show a perfect case against either the complainant or one or more of his codefendants, his pleading will not be a cross-bill, but an original bill." Krueger v. Ferry, 41 N. J. Eq. 436, 5 Atl. 452; Id., 43 N. J. Eq. 295, 14 Atl. 811.

Judged by these rules, the cross-bill filed in the present case cannot be sustained. The original bill is, in the language of the Court of Errors and Appeals (Doremus v. Paterson, 61 Atl. 396), "a bill to restrain the further pollution of the river," but "it tenders to the city the opportunity of avoiding the issuance of the writ by making compensation to the complainant for the injury which will accrue to their property by the continued discharge of sewage into the stream." It is, in other words, an injunction bill to restrain a nuisance. The cross-bill admits the nuisance, but it avers (1) that the East Jersey Water Company has unlawfully diverted, for the benefit of the city of Newark, water which would otherwise have flowed past Paterson and helped to dilute its sewage; (2) that the Dundee Water Company has constructed a dam across the Passaic river below Paterson, and has by so doing formed Dundee Lake, with the effect of rendering its current more sluggish, and so retarding or preventing the passage of the sewage down the stream. It seeks, on the authority of Green v. Stone, 54 N. J. Eq. 387, 84 Atl. 1099, 55 Am. St. Rep. 577, to make the East Jersey Water Company, the city of Newark, and the Dundee Company parties. The attempt is based upon a misconception of the rule in that case. Its effect would be to involve the complainants in three distinct controversies with which they have absolutely no concern: (1) Whether, as against Paterson, the East Jersey Water Company may take the upper waters of the Passaic for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants of Essex and Hudson counties with pure water. (2) Whether, as against Paterson, Newark is illegally appropriating the waters of the Pequannock. (3) Whether, as against Paterson, the Dundee dam is an illegal structure. Not only would the cross-bill, if sustained, compel the complainant to litigate these distinct questions in one suit, but it would involve the city of Newark in a controversy over the Dundee dam, a question with which it has no concern; and it would involve the Dundee Company in a controversy respecting the use by Newark of the waters of the Pequannock, a question utterly distinct from the question whether the dam is a lawful structure. If Paterson had filed an original bill against these parties, it would have been demurrable on the ground of multifariousness and misjoinder. This cross-bill, original, certainly, as to the new parties brought in, is equally so. It would, if permitted to stand, subject complainants to an interminable litigation over questions with which they have no concern, and would amount to a practical denial of justice. If proved it would be no answer to the charge of nuisance. The defense, if such it can be called, would seem, also, to be obnoxious to the well-settled rule that, as between independent wrongdoers, there is no contribution. I think that the bill should be stricken out.

The city of Paterson has with its cross-bill filed an answer, and the complainants apply to strike out portions of it for insufficiency.

I understand that the first objection, viz., that the defendant does not elect whether it will submit to an injunction or make compensation, is admitted to be well taken, and that the answer will be amended in that particular.

The second objection is that the answer does not declare whether the taking of the complainants' property rights is to be perpetual, or only temporary; and the third objection is that, if the answer is to be construed as declaring that the taking is to be temporary, then it does not declare for what period of time the taking is to continue. I think these objections are valid. The complainants, in their bill, state their damages "calculated upon the basis of said injuries being permanent." This statement necessitates a counter statement by Paterson of whether it intends for an indefinite time in the future to pollute the waters of the Passaic, or whether it intends to stop polluting them within a definite period. If it intends to stop, it should so aver, and it should designate a time beyond which the pollution will cease. Thus only can the complainants' damages be definitely ascertained, if the injury is to be computed on this basis. It is self-evident that, if the nuisance is to come to an end in 5 or 10 years, the damages given will be less than they would be if the nuisance is to last for 50 or 100 years. Only by naming a definite time is it possible to compute them on any other theory than that of a permanent injury, and it is only fair to complainants that they should be informed before trial what Paterson's position is on this very important question.

The last objection is too indefinite to merit attention. Leslie v. Leslie, 50 N. J. Eq. 155, 24 Atl. 1029; Doane v. Lumber Co., 59 N. J. Eq. 142, 45 Atl. 537.

SCHLICHER et al. v. KEELER et al.

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — ADVANCEMENT—EVIDENCE.

Intestate died seised of a homestead worth $15,000, leaving seven children as his heirs at law, having previously conveyed to complainant, who was one of them, a city lot worth $10,000 by a bargain and sale deed for a nominal consideration. Complainant disclaimed that the transfer was made in consideration of services, and there was evidence that intestate told the attorney who was present when the deed was executed that, as complainant had taken care of him, he wanted to do something for her right away in excess of what he intended to do for the rest of the family. Held, that such conveyance to complainant constituted an advancement.

Bill for partition by Mary E. Schlicher and another against Charles Keeler and others. Case referred to master.

A. S. Applegate and G. O. Vanderblit, for complainants. Hommann & Stricker and J. V. B. Wyckoff, for defendants.

BERGEN, V. C. Charles Keeler died in October, 1900, seised of a farm, near Trenton, on which he resided at the time of his death. He left as his heirs at law seven children, of whom the complainant is one, who files her bill of complaint, praying partition of the lands. In July, 1899, her father conveyed to the complainant a valuable lot of land on Willow street, in Trenton, worth, according to the undisputed evidence in the cause, $10,000. George W. Keeler, one of the children, has answered, and charges that the real estate so conveyed to the complainant was intended by their father as an advancement, and that she is not in equity entitled to the equal undivided one-seventh part of the remaining lands left by their father, but to such part only as may be necessary to equalize the shares of the respective owners after charging her with the value of the lands previously transferred to her. It was urged on the argument that the answer is not so framed as to present the precise question the court is asked to determine; but, as the evidence offered by both parties was directed to the real issue between them, I will permit the defendants to amend their answer, so that the issue tried may be presented by the record.

The testimony shows that the homestead is fairly worth $15,000, and that it is all of the real property of which Charles Keeler died seised. It thus appears that the father had conveyed to this daughter a large proportion of his landed estate, although she was but one of seven children, and it does not appear that she paid any consideration therefor. At the conclusion of the argument I expressed my conviction that the transfer of the Willow street property was intended as an advancement, and further consideration has strengthened that conclusion. A conveyance of land in consideration of natural love and affection, or for a nominal consideration, by a parent to his child, has been held to be an advancement within our statute, unless a contrary intention is made to appear, and the presumption arising from such conditions overcome. Speer v. Speer, 14 N. J. Eq. 240; Hattersley v. Bissett, 51 N. J. Eq. 597-601, 29 Atl. 187, 40 Am. St. Rep. 532. This complainant expressly disclaimed that the transfer was made in consideration of services rendered to her father, and testified that her services to her father were given without the expectation of payment, and there is no proof of any claim of that character, nor of any accounting between them when the transfer was made. It was manifestly a conveyance in consideration of the grantor's affection for his daughter, prompted, perhaps, by a desire to greatly prefer her in the distribution of his estate. Bearing on the question of intention is the fact proven in this cause that shortly before his death the father undertook to convey to one of his sons the homestead property, which constituted the residue of his real estate. This effort was unsuccessful, because, as declared by our courts, the deed was not properly delivered to become effective; but the attempt, though void in law as an efficient method, nevertheless discloses a determination on his part to place the remainder of his lands beyond the possibility of the daughter's inheritance.

The only other testimony I consider it necessary to refer to is that of Mr. Hamill, the attorney who was present when this deed was executed, who, while unable to recall the words used by the grantor at the time, testified that according to his recollection Mr. Keeler said in substance that, as Mary (the complainant) had taken care of him and nursed him, he wanted to do something for her right away in excess of what he intended to do for the rest of the family. In another part of his testimony Mr. Hamill said that Mr. Keeler declared that he wanted Mary to have something in addition to the others. Accepting Mr. Hamill's statement of impressions remaining in his mind regarding a conversation had six years ago as a substantial reproduction of what was said, it is entirely consistent with the theory that it was intended as an advancement, and does not tend to overcome the presumption that a gift of this character is an advance to a probable inheritor. The provision being made was in excess of what the other children could possibly inherit, and it was something in addition to what the others would get. Her share of the estate, without preference, would have been one-seventh of $25,000, while under the advancement she has $10,000, a substantial excess over, or an addition to, any sum the other children will take.

There will be a reference to a master in the usual form, who, among matters, shall ascertain the interests of the respective parties, and also what amount should be charged against the share of the complainant in this cause on account of the advancement to her of the Willow street lot. The master will also take an account of the rents, issues, and profits derived from the lands sought to be partitioned by the tenants in common, who are or have been in possession, and what amount, if any, should be charged against the respective shares of such tenants.

BAYARD v. BANCROFT et al.

(Court of Chancery of Delaware. Nov. 6, 1905.)

1. INJUNCTION—RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS IN DEED—ENFORCEMENT.

The grantor in a conveyance of property "for the sole use and behoof of a public park" is entitled to enjoin a violation of the terms of the grant by diverting the property to some other purpose than that of a park, irrespective of any question of damage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, § 124.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—DIVERSION OF USE OF PARK—RIGHTS OF ABUTTING OWNERS.

A landowner abutting upon land dedicated to the uses of a public park is entitled to invoke the intervention of a court of equity to prevent the diversion of such land from the use to which it has been dedicated, provided he will receive some special, tangible, practical damage from such diversion that differs in kind from the damage received by the public at large and by any individual as a citizen and taxpayer.

3. SAME—GROUNDS—INJURY TO PUBLIC PARK—CHARACTER OF DAMAGE SUFFERED.

An owner of land abutting on a public park is not entitled to enjoin the construction of a street railway through the park in such a manner as to be visible from his doorstep and offend his artistic sensibilities by its unsightly poles and appurtenances and the marring of beauteous grassy knolls, where he does not claim that such construction will result in any depreciation in the value of his property or in any pecuniary damage whatever.

Bill for injunction by Thomas F. Bayard against William P. Bancroft and others, constituting the board of park commissioners of the city of Wilmington, and the People's Railway Company. On motion for preliminary injunction. Denied.

Thomas F. Bayard, in pro. per. William S. Hilles, for respondents.

NICHOLSON, Ch. A motion for a preliminary injunction in this cause was argued on bill and answer September 11, 1906, and on September 18th an amended bill was filed, in which the allegation of injury or detriment contained in the original bill was amplified. To this the People's Railway Company, respondent, filed its answer, and the amended pleadings were submitted by counsel without further argument.

It would be useless for me to state at length the whole case presented by the pleadings, as it is essentially the same as that presented in the suit of Samuel Bancroft, Jr., against the same defendants, except that the present suit is concerned only with one of the tracts of land mentioned and described in that cause, and is brought by an abutting landowner, instead of a grantor. The opinion, which was filed on the 28th of August last past, with the order denying the motion for a preliminary injunction, in the suit brought by Mr. Bancroft set forth in detail all the facts involved and the questions raised in that cause.

Samuel Bancroft, Jr., v. William P. Bancroft et al. (Del. Ch.) 61 Atl. 689.

The question to be considered in the case before me at the very outset was vigorously argued by respondent's counsel, and if his contention be correct it will be decisive of the pending motion. The question to which I refer is whether the complainant has any standing in a court of equity as an abutting landowner upon the allegation of injury contained in his bill. He alleges, and it is not denied, that he is the sole owner in fee of a lot of land situated on the southerly corner of Red Oak Road and Greenhill avenue, which abuts upon the parcel of land which William P. Bancroft and wife did, on the 28th of September, 1899, convey unto the mayor and council of the city of Wilmington "for the sole use and behoof of a public park," and that he, the said complainant, derived his title thereto by fee-simple deed from the Woodlawn Company, dated May 5, 1904, which company in turn derived its title from the said William P. Bancroft after he had made his conveyance to the municipality for park purposes as set out above.

The complainant's allegation of damage or detriment is contained in the sixteenth paragraph of the bill as amended, and is as follows:

"(16) That your orator avers that it would be detrimental and unjust to him as a citizen and abutting owner upon the said parcel of the said park land if the said People's Railway Company is allowed to place, install, and operate its line of railway upon the said park land mentioned in paragraph 5 of this bill, for the following reasons: (a) That the installation and operation of the said railway would destroy the use of said parcel of land in so far as it traversed the same by destroying the same for park purposes. (b) That the installation and operation of said railway upon said parcel of land would be an unsightly object in the said park, and in so far as the use and beauty of the said park is destroyed the rights and pleasures of your orator as an abutting owner would be interfered with. (c) That the property of your orator as an abutting owner is enhanced by reason of the fact that his said property abuts upon the said parcel of land which was given solely for park purposes, and that any use other than that of a park purpose, more especially the proposed use by the said railway company, would destroy the rights and pleasures of your orator as an abutting owner. (d) That your orator by a valid contract and purchase became the owner of the said abutting parcel with the idea and intention that he should have forever all the rights and pleasures of an abutting owner upon said parcel of land in accordance with the terms and conditions under which the said parcel of land became a part of the park system, so that the installation and operation of the said railway upon the said parcel of land would be a perpetual interference and abridgement of your orator's pleasure and vested rights as an abutting owner in the said land. (e) That your orator as an abutting owner upon the aforesaid parcel of park land would, if the said railway company was allowed to install and operate the line of railway over the said parcel, be irreparably injured, in that the said parcel of land in the park system would be subjected to the use and occupation by the said railway, contrary to the terms and conditions under which the said parcel of land became a part of the park system. (f) That upon the installation and operation of the said railway upon the said park land your orator as an abutting owner would be forever and irreparably prevented from enjoying the beauties and pleasures of the said park land for the proper purposes for which it was given, so long as the said railway was allowed to keep its rails, poles and wires and to operate its cars over and upon the said parcel of land."

In response to this paragraph of the bill, the People's Railway Company, respondent, denies in its answer all the allegations serialim, and alleges that "it is not the province of a court of equity to protect pleasures," and "that it is not informed what rights of the complainant are interfered with," concluding as follows: "And this defendant generally denies that any property rights of the said complainant would in any way be affected, abridged, or interfered with by the construction of the said line of railway, and this defendant further denies that there is anything contained in the said sixteenth paragraph of the said complainant's bill which entitles him to the relief prayed for therein."

The complainant has also filed an affidavit which contains the following allegations: "That the said proposed use of the said parcel of the park system by the defendant the People's Railway Company is plainly within sight of the abutting property owned by the said complainant, and that the said complainant can by standing upon his front doorstep plainly see a large portion of the said railway which runs through the parcel of the park aforesaid, and that the proposed mode of constructing and operating the line of railway will cause the digging of a 12-foot trench or cut within the immediate view of the said complainant's property, and thus transform what is now a grassy knoll of great beauty into a disfigured mound, with all the unsightly appurtenances which a trolley road using the overhead wire would require."

If the complainant be correct in his contention that the construction and operation of the said line of railway would be in violation of the terms of the conveyance by which the mayor and council of Wilmington became seised of the above-mentioned parcel of land, conveyed by William P. Bancroft "for the sole use and behoof of a public park," it would follow necessarily that the grantor, the said William P. Bancroft, would be entitled to the intervention of a court of equity to enjoin such violation of the terms of the grant, irrespective of any question of damage. William P. Bancroft, however, not only refuses so to do, but as a member of the board of park commissioners, respondent in this suit, has given his assent to the occupation of the park by the said railway.

This right of a grantor to invoke the strong arm of the Court of Chancery to prevent any violation of the terms and conditions of covenants contained in the conveyance of his estate is one of the fundamental principles of the common law, a corollary of the theory of conveyances, and there is no analogy or likeness whatever between the rights of a grantor and the rights of an abutting owner in such a case as the present. The said William P. Bancroft had made his conveyance for park purposes before he had conveyed to the Woodlawn Company, from which the complainant took his conveyance, and there is no privity of contract between the complainant and the board of park commissioners, nor any theory of covenant of any sort affecting the relations of the board of park commissioners or People's Railway Company, respondent, and the complainant, whatever may be the situation of the complainant as regards the Woodlawn Company and William P. Bancroft.

It is well settled, however, that a landowner abutting upon land dedicated in any way to the uses of a public park is entitled to invoke the intervention of a court of equity to prevent the diversion of the said land from the use to which it was dedicated; but the sole ground upon which is based his standing in court, the claim which entitles him to ask for relief, is uniformly held to be that he will receive some special damage from the total or partial destruction of such public use that differs in kind from that received by the public at large, by any individual as citizen and taxpayer. It is not necessary, of course, that the damage should be great; but there must be some injury of the tangible, practical kind that courts recognize as damage. In order to determine, therefore, the right of the complainant to bring his suit, it is only necessary to consider whether he has alleged and proved such special damage.

I have examined with care every case cited by counsel, as well as many more, and in every case in which the application of an abutting landowner for an injunction was sustained, it was proved to the satisfaction of the court, or admitted, that the act enjoined amounted to the practical destruction of the park as a park, and that in consequence of such diversion or destruction considerable pecuniary damage would result to the abutting owner bringing the suit by reason of the reduction in value of his abutting property. See Morris v. Sea Girt Land Improvement Co., 88 N. J. Eq. 304. In a note at the end of the case are collected a great number of cases upon the general question. In Woods on Street Railways, p.—, other cases are collected in a note. Complainant cites, amongst other cases, Le Clercq et al. v. Trustees of Gallipolis, 7 Ohio, 218, pt. 1, 28 Am. Dec. 641; Warren v. Mayor of Lyons City, 22 Iowa, 351; Commissioners of Franklin County v. Carrie R. Lathrope, 9 Kan. 453. The case of Tulk v. Moxhay, 11 Beavan, 571, is an interesting and instructing case upon the general subject. In the case of Equitable Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Donahoe (Del. Ch.) 45 Atl. 586, the Chancellor, in the course of a review of the development of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, says: "The English and American equitable jurisprudence is a unique system, a complex interweaving of principle and precedent, of reason and experience. It has progressed by slow and careful steps, guided always by a careful observation of the practical consequences of what had been done already. And in no department has the adherence to precedents been so marked, in no sphere of action does it behoove the equity judge to be so careful 'to keep within the ancient mere-stones,' as when there is question of wielding the tremendous power of the injunction process."

In the allegations of injury made by the complainant, which I have quoted above at length, he carefully refrains from alleging that any depreciation in the value of his abutting property, or that any pecuniary damage whatever, would result to him from the construction and operating of the railway upon the park lands in the manner indicated. Neither does he allege or claim that any such injury or detriment would result to him as abutting landowner as would be recognized to be such by the average man, whose judgment in the matter of damage is after all the standard set by the court. The Court of Chancery has never used the tremendous power of the injunction process to protect artistic sensibilities. An extension of its power into that domain would be most dangerous. Its mode of exercise would vary with the kind and degree of cultivation possessed by the individual Chancellor in matters of taste, for it is the subject of everyday observation that there are many specimens of landscape gardening and of architecture, to say nothing of sights and sounds and odors in general, which, while pleasing and agreeable to many men, are offensive in the extreme to others.

It is in evidence that the projected railway, after passing down the Rockford Road, curves along the outside edge of the park, just within its boundary line, at a distance of 657 feet from the front of complainant's house, the abutting property, at its nearest point of approach. And during this part of its course, as alleged in the affidavit above quoted, it "is plainly in sight of the abutting property owned by the said complainant, and that the said complainant can by standing upon his front doorstep plainly see a large portion of the said line of the said railway which runs through the parcel of the park aforesaid." The affidavit, as we have seen, then alleges the unsightliness of its poles and appurtenances and the marring of a grassy knoll of great beauty through which it passes. However unsightly and unpleasant all this may be to the complainant, it does not constitute such an injury as could be construed by this court to be the special damages which must be proved by him to entitle him to the relief for which he prays. The principles which I have laid down as governing this question are only the elementary ones governing the wielding of the injunction process. To fully illustrate and support them by citations from treatises and Reports would be tedious and unnecessary.

The respondent's counsel argued most ingeniously to show that this particular railway in this particular park is not inconsistent with the uses of a park, although no case has been produced by him holding that a railway, whether operated by steam or electricity, is not inconsistent with the uses of a public park, and several have been cited by the complainant which hold that it is inconsistent. If Mr. Bayard, as abutting property owner, had been able to show that he would receive from the proposed location and operating of the trolley such special damage as would give him standing in this court, it would be necessary for me to make an exhaustive examination of this large and most important question; but, inasmuch as the considerations which I have briefly set forth above have brought me to the conclusion that the complainant has failed to show that he has any standing in court, it becomes unnecessary, if not improper, for me to pass upon the other contention, and I am therefore constrained to decide that the motion for a preliminary injunction must be denied, for the reasons which I have indicated.

Let the order be entered accordingly.

PATTERSON et ux. v. JARMON.
(Superior Court of Delaware. Kent. Oct. 26, 1905.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—REVIEW OF PROCEEDINGS—RECORD.

A justice's record should state, as required by statute, that the justice heard plaintiff's "proofs and allegations," and it is insufficient for it to state that he heard the "proofs in the case."

2. JUDGMENT—DEFAULT—CODEFENDANTS.

In an action against joint defendants, a judgment by default against one of the defendants vitiates a joint judgment against both.

Action before a justice by Ralph B. Jarmon against Frank Patterson and wife. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring certiorari. Reversed.

The record of the justice, after the title of the case, was as follows: "Be it remembered that on this 17th day of March, A. D. 1906, an action on book account was brought by Ralph B. Jarmon against Frank Patterson and Mrs. Frank Patterson for the sum of $10.75, with credit of $4. The justice being satisfied by deposition of Ralph B. Jarmon, the plaintiff, there is danger of losing process by delay, summons issued forthwith this 17th day of March to Constable Jenkins. Constable Jenkins returns, 'Served personally.' And now, to wit, this 18th day of March, 1906, Frank Patterson appearing and Mrs. Frank Patterson failing to appear, and after hearing the proofs in the case, the credit of $4 is corrected to $4.75, and I therefore give judgment against the defendants, Frank Patterson and Mrs. Frank Patterson, for the sum of $10.75, with credit of $4.75, and costs of this suit. Charles B. Ridgely, J. P."

Numerous exceptions were filed to the above record, among which were the following: (1) That it does not appear by the record that the plaintiff was present on the day of the hearing of the justice, which was error, as judgment should not be rendered against the defendants without the allegations and proofs of the party plaintiff. (2) That the record does not show that the proofs and allegations of the defendants were heard by the justice, and it is error to enter judgment against the defendants without their proofs and allegations. (3) That the record does not show that the parties plaintiff and defendant were present at the hearing on the 18th of March, 1905, but discloses that only one of the defendants was present and one thereof absent at said hearing, and it was error for the justice to have rendered judgment without hearing the proofs and allegations of the plaintiff. (4) That the record of the justice is erroneous and defective, in that it fails to show that the justice heard the proofs and allegations in the cause before rendering judgment therein, which is error.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWELL, JJ.

Thomas C. Frame, Jr., for plaintiffs in error. Arley B. Magee, for defendant in error.

LORE, C. J. This record states that the justice heard "the proofs in the case." We have uniformly held that the record should set out, as required by statute, that the justice heard the plaintiff's proofs and allegations; and, moreover, this judgment against the wife is on the face of it a judgment by default, and, it being a joint judgment, it of course vitiates the judgment.

Let the judgment below be reversed.

JOHNSON v. SMITH et al.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS — SETTLEMENT AND SIGNING — DEATH OF JUDGE — PENDING CAUSES — RETROACTIVE STATUTE.

Acts 1902, p. 44, No. 35, provides that in case of the decease of a judge of the Supreme Court any judge of that court may allow or amend exceptions in a case tried by such deceased judge. Held, that a party's right to a new trial under the law as it stood at the time of the trial, because of the death of the trial judge without signing and settling the bill of exceptions presented to him, was not a vested right, and hence such act applied to causes pending at the time it took effect.

Exceptions from Caledonia County Court; Watson, Judge.

Action by George L. Johnson against A. D. and D. D. Smith. A motion by defendants for judgment on the verdict was overruled, and plaintiff's motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial was granted, and defendants bring exceptions. Reversed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, and POWERS, JJ.

Demmett & Slack, for plaintiff. J. P. Lamson and May & Hill, for defendants.

POWERS, J. The defendants obtained a verdict at the June term, 1900, of Caledonia county court, which the plaintiff moved to set aside for misconduct of certain of the jurors and of the officer who had them in charge. With this motion pending, the case was entered "with the court," and was held by the late Chief Judge Taft, who presided at the trial, until his death. So no judgment had been entered upon the verdict, and no bill of the exceptions taken by the plaintiff during the course of the trial had been signed. In these circumstances, as the law then stood, the plaintiff was without means of having the case reviewed in this court, and was therefore entitled to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted. See Nelson v. Marshall, 77 Vt. 44, 58 Atl. 793, and cases cited. But before the plaintiff took further action in the matter Acts 1902, p. 44, No. 35, became effective. By this act it is provided that "in case of the decease of a judge of the Supreme Court, any judge of that court may allow or amend exceptions in a case tried by such deceased judge." At the December term, 1903, of Caledonia county court, the plaintiff having withdrawn his former motion, the defendants moved for a judgment on the verdict, and the plaintiff moved to set aside the verdict and for a new trial; the latter motion being based on the plaintiff's inability to obtain a bill of exceptions on which to have his case heard in this court. The defendants' motion was overruled, and the plaintiff's granted; both questions being ruled as matter of law. The case is here on the defendants' exceptions to these rulings.

The determination of the question thus presented depends upon the character of the right which entitles an excepting party to a new trial when the presiding judge dies without signing the bill; for, if the right is a vested one, it is beyond the reach of the Legislature, and the act of 1902 could not divest it. On the other hand, if it springs simply from a rule of procedure, the act of 1902 applies, and the plaintiff is provided with ample means for the prosecution of his exceptions, and the necessity, upon which is based the right to a new trial, is removed, and the reason for such procedure falls. While it is true as a general rule of construction that retroactive effect is not favored, in the absence of terms clearly indicating such legislative intent, it is equally true that a statute which is designed to change the mode of judicial procedure only, where such change relates to the method of enforcing a right and does not affect the right itself, applies to causes of action which accrued prior to its enactment as well as to those which accrue thereafter, and takes effect upon a pending action as it stands when the act became operative, in the absence of a saving clause. Richardson's Adm'r v. Richardson's Ex'rs, 37 Vt. 599, 88 Am. Dec. 622; Murray v. Mattison, 68 Vt. 479, 21 Atl. 532; Willis v. Fincher, 68 Ga. 444; In re Savings Bank, 69 N. H. 84, 39 Atl. 522. Our statute (V. S. 28) is in harmony with this rule of construction; for, while it provides, speaking generally, that no act of the General Assembly shall effect pending suits, it expressly excepts from its provisions acts regulating "practice in courts"—a term broad enough to cover all matters of judicial procedure.

The rule granting a new trial under the circumstances here existing seems to have received its first announcement in Newton et ux. v. Boodle et al., 54 E. C. L. 795, decided in 1847. This case was tried before Chief Justice Tindal, who ordered a verdict for one of the defendants, to which the plaintiffs excepted. A bill of exceptions was prepared and presented to the Lord Chief Justice, but he ultimately died without having sealed the bill. Thereupon, after some delay, judgment having been signed, the plaintiffs moved for a rule upon the defendants to show cause why, among other things, the judgment should not be set aside and a new trial granted. In granting the rule, Chief Justice Wilde used this language: "If it should turn out, upon examination, that the plaintiffs have, without any fault of their own, but solely from the circumstance alluded to, lost the benefit of their bill of exceptions, the court think that the justice of the case may require that they should have an opportunity to try the cause again. At the same time, it is to be observed that there was an interval of nearly 17 months between the day of the trial and the decease of the late Chief Justice; and it is rather a fearful thing to say that the whole proceedings should be reopened after so great a delay. As, however, we have not the facts sufficiently before us to enable us to determine how far the plaintiffs are to be held responsible for this delay, and with a view to prevent a failure of justice by reason of the happening of an event beyond human control, we think a rule may go, calling upon the defendants to show cause why there should not be a new trial upon the point as to the sufficiency of the evidence to fix Norman." It is apparent from this language that the learned Chief Justice did not consider that the plaintiffs had a vested right to a new trial, or even a fixed right. Else why did he allude to the delay in their application? Certainly a delay of 17 months would not forfeit a right which had become vested within the meaning of the law. Vested rights are not thus easily taken away. More significant still is the fact that upon hearing a new trial was refused in this case, because it appeared from the minutes of the presiding judge that there was no error in ordering a verdict for the defendant Norman. This result could not have been reached if the court had considered that the plaintiffs were entitled to a new trial as a matter of right at all; for in that case the question of misdirection would have been entirely immaterial. A little later Chief Justice Wilde himself left Benett v. Steam Boat Co., 16 C. B. 29, in the same plight, and a new trial was granted, apparently on the authority of Newton v. Boodle; but there is nothing in the case to aid us here. The rule thus established has been generally followed in this country, as is shown in the opinion in Nelson v. Marshall, supra; and in State v. Weiskittle, 61 Md. 51, there cited, this significant language is used: "It is the established practice, both in England and this state" to grant new trials under these circumstances. This language indicates pretty clearly that the Maryland court did not regard the right as a vested one, but rather as a rule of practice merely. And this, we think, is the logic of it. The procurement of a bill of exceptions, with a proper signature, for the consideration of this court, is one of the steps in the orderly progress of the case to its final determination. A statute which extends the means or opportunity of obtaining such a bill is remedial in its character and should be liberally construed. It extends, rather than restricts, the plaintiff's rights. It affects the remedy only, it is not repugnant to the statute, and it does not disturb a vested right; for there is no such thing as a vested right in a particular procedure. Endl. Intrep. St. § 285; Lee v. Buckheit, 49 Wis. 54, 4 N. W. 1077.

In reaching this conclusion we have not overlooked People v. Judge, 40 Mich. 630, where a contrary result is arrived at on the precise question here presented, or Yeatman

v. Day, 79 Ky. 186, which is in conflict with the views herein expressed. But, notwithstanding these very respectable authorities to the contrary, we hold that the provisions of the act of 1902 apply to this case, and that the court erred in denying the motion of the defendants and in granting that of the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

GIBSON v. HOLMES et al.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Franklin. Oct. 28, 1905.)

1. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS—DOCKET ENTRIES.

A certified copy of docket entries made in a bankruptcy court, which entries constitute only the minutes from which to make a record, is inadmissible to show bankruptcy.

2. BANKRUPTCY—ARRESTS—PRIVILEGE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Testimony that plaintiff filed his petition in bankruptcy before his arrest on civil process is insufficient to show that plaintiff was privileged from arrest because of the bankruptcy proceedings, where it is not shown when he filed the petition.

3. FALSE IMPRISONMENT—ILLEGAL DETENTION.

Under V. S. 1701, 1703, providing that, when defendant is arrested on mesne process in a civil action, the officer shall take him to jail in the county where the arrest is made, if there is a legal jail there, it is the duty of the officer making the arrest to commit defendant to a legal jail, if there is one in the county, and his action in lodging defendant in jail in another county, without defendant's consent, constitutes the officer a trespasser ab initio.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. False Imprisonment, § 72.]

4. ARREST—PRODUCTION OF PRISONER.

An officer who arrests defendant on civil process does not, by following V. S. 1701, 1703, requiring a defendant arrested on mesne process to be committed to jail, put it out of his power to obey the precept of the writ commanding him to produce defendant at the time and place of trial.

5. SAME—PRODUCTION OF PRISONER—RECOMMITMENT.

While an officer who has arrested defendant on civil process and has committed him to jail, in accordance with V. S. 1701, 1703, is unable, after taking defendant out of jail for production in court, to recommit him on the original writ, yet the court, especially a court of record, has ample authority to order defendant committed for want of bail, and such commitment will be deemed to be on the original writ.

6. FALSE IMPRISONMENT—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY—RESPONSIBILITY OF CLIENT.

An attorney retained to collect a debt is, by virtue of his employment as such, invested as his client's agent with a large and liberal discretion and the most ample authority in everything pertaining to the collection of the debt and control and service of the process; and his action in directing an officer, who arrests the debtor, to commit the debtor to a jail in another county than that in which the arrest is made, in violation of V. S. 1701, 1703, is chargeable to the client, and makes the client a trespasser ab initio with the officer who makes the arrest.

7. PROCESS—AMENDMENT—JURISDICTION TO PERMIT.

Where plaintiff, in an action before a justice, abandoned his suit on the release of defendant from arrest, and the justice was not present at the time and place of trial, nor within two hours thereafter, and the case was not continued, so that the jurisdiction of the justice lapsed, the justice had no authority, six months afterwards, and after defendant had commenced an action for false imprisonment, to allow the officer who arrested defendant to amend his return to the writ.

8. FALSE IMPRISONMENT—JUSTIFICATION—PROCESS—RETURN—SUFFICIENCY.

Under V. S. 1075, 1076, requiring officers to execute and return writs and precepts agreeably to the direction thereof, and subjecting them to a penalty for making a false and undue return, an officer who arrests defendant in a civil action on mesne process, which commands him to "make service and return according to law," must return the writ with a statement of substantially all his doings in executing the same; and a return, merely stating that he served the writ on defendant and read the same in his hearing, is not sufficient to enable the officer to justify under the writ for making the arrest.

9. SAME.

Where plaintiff abandons his suit before the entry thereof, he cannot justify under the writ on which defendant was arrested, in an action by defendant for false imprisonment.

Exceptions from Franklin County Court; Tyler, Judge.

Trespass by Burton J. Gibson against A. G. Holmes and another. The court directed a verdict for defendants, and plaintiff excepted. Reversed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

C. G. Austin & Sons and A. A. Hall, for plaintiff. Hogan & Hogan, for defendant Holmes. G. F. Ladd, for defendant Phareuf.

ROWELL, C. J. Trespass for false imprisonment. The defendants separately justified under a justice writ in favor of the defendant Holmes against the plaintiff, issued as a capias, brought to recover for goods sold and delivered, and served by the defendant Phareuf by arresting the plaintiff in Orleans county. The plaintiff claims that he was in bankruptcy in Massachusetts, where he lived, and therefore was privileged from arrest, as his discharge would release him from the debt sued for. But he can take nothing by this claim, for it does not appear that he was in bankruptcy. The certified copy of the docket entries in the bankruptcy court of Massachusetts, introduced to show that he was in bankruptcy, was not admissible, as those entries were no record, but only minutes from which to make a record. Austin v. Howe, 17 Vt. 654; Armstrong v. Colby, 47 Vt. 359. Nor was the plaintiff's testimony that he filed his petition in bankruptcy before his arrest sufficient, though admitted without objection; for it does not appear when he filed it, and it might have been so long before the arrest that there had been a final adjudication on his application for a discharge, which would end his privilege, and the presumption of continuance cannot be invoked for want of sufficient data, if for no other reason.

But it was error to direct a verdict for the defendants, for the testimony tended to show, if it did not thereby appear, that the defendants were trespassers ab initio. At common law, when an officer arrests a man on mesne process in a civil action, he may make any place his prison; for the writ is, "ita quod, habeas corpus ejus coram," etc., which is a general authority. But when the authority is special, he must imprison accordingly; and, if he imprisons elsewhere or otherwise, he is a trespasser. Swinstead v. Lyddal, 1 Salk. 408; Bac. Ab. "Trespass" (D). But our statute has changed the common law in respect of a general authority, and makes the authority special in such cases, notwithstanding the command of the writ remains the same; for it provides that, when a defendant is arrested on mesne process in a civil action, the officer shall commit him to jail in the county where the arrest is made, unless otherwise directed by law, if there is a legal jail there, unless he exposes sufficient property to secure the officer, or some person becomes surety to the satisfaction of the officer by indorsing his name on the writ as bail. V. S. 1701, 1703. It appearing that there was a legal jail in Orleans county, where the arrest was made, and it not being otherwise directed by law, it was the duty of the officer to commit the plaintiff there in default of exposing property or procuring bail; and it was the plaintiff's right to be committed there, unless he waived that right, and the testimony tended to show that he did not. Ellis v. Cleveland, 54 Vt. 437. But, instead of committing him there, by direction of Holmes' attorney, given pursuant to an understanding with Holmes, the officer took him to St. Albans and lodged him in the Franklin county jail for safe-keeping till the time of trial, where he remained about an hour in a cell, and then, by advice of counsel whom he consulted about leaving him there and about making his return if he did leave him there, the officer took him back to Richford, where he was released by order of Holmes or his attorney on July 30th, having been arrested at North Troy on July 28th. This, if done without the plaintiff's consent, made the officer a trespasser ab initio. Bond v. Wilder, 16 Vt. 393; Hall v. Ray, 40 Vt. 576, 94 Am. Dec. 440; Clayton v. Scott, 45 Vt. 386.

It is claimed that the officer might keep the plaintiff where he pleased, notwithstanding the statute, because, if he committed him to jail in Orleans county by delivering him to the keeper thereof within the same, and giving the keeper an attested copy of the writ with his return thereon, as he would have to do by statute, he would thereby have transferred the custody and control of him to the jailer, and so have put it out of his power to obey his precept by having him before the justice at the time and place of trial. But in re Jennison, 74 Vt. 40, 51 Atl. 1061, holds the other way. There the relator was arrested on a justice writ issued as a capias, and committed to jail for want of bail; and yet the court said it was the duty of the officer to obey his precept by producing the relator at the time and place of trial, and, because he did not, the relator was discharged, but by agreement of the parties. That case is express authority for the proposition that by obeying the statute in respect of committing the officer does not put it out of his power further to obey his precept by having the defendant before the justice at the time and place of trial. To hold otherwise would bring the precept and the statute into conflict, whereas they should be made to harmonize, if possible. And there is no difficulty in harmonizing them; for, although the officer, by taking the defendant out of jail for production in court, would be incapacitated to recommit him on the original writ, because that, being returned into court, could not be taken out for that purpose, yet the court, especially as it is a court of record, would have ample authority to order him committed for want of bail, and such commitment would be deemed to be on the original writ, the same as it is by statute when a surety on mesne process delivers the principal into court in discharge of himself. Although there seems to be no statute for this, yet the authority inheres in the court, as much as the authority did before the statute to do what the statute says shall be done when the principal is surrendered, as shown by Abells v. Chipman, 1 Tyler, 377. And see 1 Tidd, Pr. 285, 286. Cf. Worthen v. Prescott, 60 Vt. 68, 11 Atl. 690, and State v. Shaw, 73 Vt. 159, 50 Atl. 863, and following.

The cases referred to in support of said claim are not in point. What is said in Whitcomb's Adm'r. v. Cook, 38 Vt. 477, about the officer having a right to put the defendant into any suitable place for safe-keeping, was said in respect of keeping him after notice that he would appear before the magistrate for examination for discharge from arrest, which suspended the right to commit until the examination was had. In Kenerson v. Bacon, 41 Vt. 573, commitment was made in disregard of such a notice, which was held to deprive the defendant of his right to go before the magistrate, because, as it would seem to have been thought, the officer could not take him out for that purpose. But this is not authority for saying that he could not take him out to produce in court, concerning which the precept commanded him, but did not command him concerning taking him before the magistrate for examination for discharge from arrest. In Durant's Case, 60 Vt. 176, 12 Atl. 650, the process on which the arrest was made was a warrant in a criminal case. What is there said about its having "been repeatedly held in civil cases that an officer may use the common jail for the safe-keeping of a person arrested on a capias, whom it is his duty to keep safely so to have him to appear at a time and place named," referring to Whitcomb's Adm'r v. Cook, 38 Vt. 477, is disapproved, if it means less than a commitment in the statutory sense. In Kent v. Miles, 68 Vt. 48, 33 Atl. 768, and 69 Vt. 379, 37 Atl. 1115, the precepts were warrants in a criminal case, and the authority was general, as neither the warrants nor the law required commitment to jail. But the plaintiff was committed, and rightly, it was held. In the Miles Case the court expressly said that the case did not come within V. S. 1701, and said that that section relates to service of legal process when the officer is "directed by the process to commit to jail." Counsel seize upon this as making in their favor. But the language of the section makes it broader than that. It is, when "required by law to commit to jail." This embraces the case at bar; for, although the process did not require commitment to jail, the statute did.

And the defendant Holmes is a trespasser ab initio, as well as the officer, for he procured the suit to be brought and the arrest to be made, and is responsible for his attorney's direction to have the plaintiff taken to jail in St. Albans; for that direction was within the scope of his attorney's authority by virtue of his employment as such, who was thereby invested as Holmes' agent with large and liberal discretion and most ample authority in everything pertaining to the collection of the debt and the control and service of the process. Willard v. Goodrich, 31 Vt. 597, where it is held that the attorney of an execution creditor has full authority as such to direct the officer as to the time and manner of enforcing the execution, short of discharging it without satisfaction. Trespass for false imprisonment lies against the client and his attorney, when the latter sues out an illegal ca. sa. and causes the defendant to be arrested and imprisoned thereon. "The client commands the attorney; the attorney actually commands the sheriff's officer; the real commander is the attorney; the nominal commander is the plaintiff in the action; so attorney and client are both principals." Barker v. Braham, 3 Wils. 368, 377. In Bates v. Pilling, 6 B. & C. 38, attorney and client were held jointly liable in trespass for the issue and service of an execution by the attorney's agent after the demand had been paid, though neither of them directed or knew of its issue. In Cook v. Wright, R. & M., 278, it was held that, where a trespass was committed in the service upon the defendant therein of a fi. fa. sued out by an attorney, it was necessary, in order to make the execution creditors liable, to show that the attorney was retained in the case; and, when that appeared, the creditors were made trespassers by the act of their attorney. In Newberry v. Lee, 3 Hill, 523, it is held that, where an attorney of record illegally issues a fi. fa., and thereby renders himself liable as a trespasser, his client is liable also, without showing that he specially directed its issue. In Foster v. Wiley, 27 Mich. 244, 15 Am. Rep. 185, it was held that, where plaintiff's property was taken and sold on an execution wrongly issued at the instance of the defendant's attorney, the defendant was liable in trespass. The court, speaking through Judge Cooley, said it seemed to be the result of the authorities that, when one puts his case against another into the hands of an attorney for suit, it is a reasonable presumption that the authority he intends to confer upon the attorney includes such action as the latter, in his superior knowledge of the law, may decide to be legal, proper, and necessary in the prosecution of the demand, and that consequently whatever adverse proceedings may be taken by the attorney are to be considered, as far as they affect the defendant in the suit, as approved by the client in advance, and therefore as his acts, even though they prove to be unwarranted by the law. In Poucher v. Blanchard, 86 N. Y. 256, it was said not to matter that the sale of the boat in question was a pure trespass; for it had been frequently decided that a client may be responsible for a trespass committed by his attorney that he in no way authorized, except by his general employment of the attorney. It is said in Moulton v. Bowker, 115 Mass. 36, 15 Am. Rep. 72, that an attorney at law has authority, by virtue of his employment as such, to do in behalf of his client all acts, in court or out, necessary or incidental to the prosecution and management of the suit, and which affect the remedy only, and not the cause of action. In Morgan v. Joyce (N. H.) 27 Atl. 225, it was held that the plaintiff, by employing an attorney to bring and prosecute a suit, authorized him to give directions for serving the writ, and was bound by them.

When the plaintiff was released from arrest, the suit was abandoned by the defendant Holmes, who did nothing more with it. Nor was the justice present at the time and place of trial, nor within two hours thereafter, nor was the case continued. So it was never entered in court, and was discontinued, and the jurisdiction of the justice lapsed. He had, therefore, no authority, six months afterwards and after this suit was commenced and being prepared by the defendants for trial, to allow the defendant Pharneuf to amend his return on the writ, by adding thereto that he safely kept and detained the plaintiff within his precinct until the 30th of July, when he released and discharged him from custody by direction of Holmes' attorney. Fletcher v. Pratt, 4 Vt. 182; Orvis v. Isle La Motte, 12 Vt. 195. So the return as amended must be laid out of the case.

The testimony tended to show that the justice who signed said writ kept all the writs and files in cases before him in which Holmes' attorney in said suit was attorney for the plaintiffs, in said attorney's office, and that the writ in that case was returned by the officer to said attorney's office before the return day, where it was put with the justice's other files, with a return upon it stating only that at North Troy, in Orleans county, on July 28, 1902, "I served this writ by arresting the body of the within-named defendant, Burt Gibson, read the same in his hearing, and this my return indorsed thereon." It does not appear that the fact that the writ was returned to the office of said attorney was ever brought to the attention of the justice. But, treating that for present purposes as a sufficient returning to the justice, the officer's return was not sufficient to enable him to justify under the process. The writ commanded him to "make service and return according to law." This is the form prescribed by statute, which requires officers to execute and return writs and precepts "agreeably to the direction thereof," and subjects them to a penalty for making a false or an "undue return." V. S. 1075, 1076. To make "return according to law" is not only to return the precept to the authority that issued it, but to return with it a statement by the officer of his doings in executing it. Turner v. Lowry, 2 Aikens, 72, 75. And that statement must contain substantially all of his doings within the scope of proper execution, certainly; otherwise, the return will be "undue," within the meaning of the statute, and may be essentially false. Here the officer states nothing in his return but the mere fact of arrest and reading. Whether the defendant in that action exposed property, procured bail, was released by the magistrate on preliminary hearing, was committed for want of bail, or discharged by direction of the plaintiff in the action or his attorney, the return does not show, and but for the oral testimony we should not know what was done with him. It was the officer's duty to make a full and complete return of his doings, and, because he did not, his return is "undue," and insufficient for his protection. An officer who serves returnable process shall not protect himself by it unless he shows that he has paid due and full obedience to its command. Ellis v. Cleveland, 54 Vt. 487. He must show that he has done all it was his duty to do. Tubbs v. Tukey, 3 Cush. 438. 50 Am. Dec. 744. He must show that he has done all that was required of him in order to complete and fulfill the duty imposed on him. Kent v. Willey, 11 Gray, 368, 373. He must show that he made return of his writ, and did all the law required him to do. Paine v. Farr, 118 Mass. 74. He must faithfully obey every lawful command of the statute and the process, or he will be left without protection. Boston & Maine R. R. Co. v. Small, 85 Me. 462, 27 Atl. 349. 35 Am. St. Rep. 379, 383. There are exceptions to this rule; as when the parties settle the suit, and agree that the writ need not be returned. Paine v. Farr, above cited. But that element does not appear in this case.

Nor is the officer's neglect to make a proper return a mere nonfeasance, any more than his neglect to return at all would be, in which case he would unquestionably be a trespasser ab initio. In Moore v. Robbins, 7 Vt. 363, 367, it is said that the neglect of an impounder to proceed with the distress according to the statute makes him a trespasser ab initio, because his neglect is not a mere nonfeasance, but is analogous to a sheriff's neglect to return a writ. So a tax collector, who neglects to offer a distress for sale within the time prescribed by statute, is not protected; for he is thereby deprived of a justification for the taking, and stands as though he took without authority, and therefore is a trespasser ab initio. Pierce v. Benjamin, 14 Pick. 356, 360, 25 Am. Dec. 396. So an officer is a trespasser ab initio who neglects to sell property on an execution. Bond v. Wilder, 16 Vt. 393. The resolution, in the Six Carpenters' Case, that "not doing cannot make a party who has authority or license by law a trespasser ab initio, because not doing is no trespass," is criticised because it is the disobedience, and not the act, that deprives of protection, and that disobedience can come from not doing, as well as from doing. But that resolution is followed in this state. The true view of the matter, when applied to the nonreturn or the insufficient return of process, seems to be that, if an officer arrests a person or seizes goods on a writ that it is his duty to return, he never has a justification under it, unless he discharges that duty; that it is inaccurate to say that he is made a trespasser ab initio by not returning, but, rather, that for want of a return, or a proper return, he never has a justification; that therefore, instead of saying that the want of a return makes him a trespasser ab initio, it would be more accurate to say that the presence of a return is necessary to make the taking lawful ab initio. Shorland v. Govett, 5 B. & C. 485.

But, although the defendant Holmes may not be responsible for the officer's neglect to make a proper return, yet, having abandoned his suit before entry, he cannot justify under the writ.

Reversed and remanded.

STATE v. STIMPSON.

STATE v. LEE.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Orleans. Oct. 25, 1905.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—"LAWS OF THE LAND"—OFFENSES—PROSECUTION—INDICTMENT BY GRAND JURY.

V. S. 1867, as amended by Acts 1893, p. 34, No. 46, and Acts 1904, No. 64, providing that state's attorneys may prosecute by information all crimes except those punishable by death or by imprisonment in the state's prison for life, is not unconstitutional as depriving persons convicted of noncapital felonies of their liberty, except by the "laws of the land," in that it authorizes their prosecution and conviction otherwise than by indictment of a grand jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 755.]

2. WITNESSES — CREDIBILITY — RAPE — EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for rape on a female under the age of consent, defendant was not entitled to prove, to affect her credibility as a witness, that she was 6 or 8 months gone with child, was never pregnant before, and that ever since she was 12 years old, to the time in question, she had had sexual intercourse with many different men.

Exceptions from Orleans County Court; Tyler and Munson, Judges.

W. H. Stimpson was convicted of rape and Edward Lee was convicted of grand larceny, and they bring exceptions. Cases heard together. Exceptions overruled.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

In Stimpson's Case: E. A. Cook, State's Atty., for the State. J. W. Redmund, for respondent.

In Lee's Case: F. G. Bicknell, State's Atty., for the State. Taylor & Dutton, for respondent.

ROWELL, C. J. The case against Stimpson is an information for statutory rape, and the one against Lee is an information for grand larceny. The principal question in the former, and the only question in the latter, is whether section 1867 of the Vermont Statutes, as amended by Act No. 46, p. 34, Acts 1896, and Act No. 64, Acts 1904, is constitutional. It provides that state's attorneys may prosecute by information all crimes except those punishable by death or by imprisonment in the state prison for life. It is claimed that said section is in contravention of the declaration in the Constitution that no person can "be justly deprived of his liberty, except by the laws of the land, or the judgment of his peers." This claim is based upon the contention that the words "laws of the land," as there used, require prosecutions for common-law felonies to be by indictment, because it is said those words as used in Magna Charta, from which we borrow them, required that by settled judicial construction in England at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and that it is to be presumed that we took that construction with the words. As bearing on this question, it is important to consider whether that declaration in the Constitution has received a practical construction that has been acquiesced in for a considerable time; for, if it has, that will be a valuable aid, to say the least, in determining the intent and meaning of those words as there used.

As early as 1779 state's attorneys were provided for, and authorized to prosecute, manage, and plead, in all matters proper, for and in behalf of the state. Slade's State Papers, 331. By an act passed November 10, 1797, it was made the duty of state's attorneys to file informations ex officio in matters proper therefor. Rev. St. 1797, c. 64, § 1. By an act passed February 27, 1787, it was provided that no person should be held to trial, nor put to plead for a capital offense punishable with death, unless a bill of indictment was found against him therefor by a grand jury lawfully impaneled and sworn. St. 1787, p. 82. This was only 10 years after the adoption of the Constitution, and indicates that thus early the Legislature thought that without such an enactment one might be prosecuted for a capital offense even otherwise than by indictment; for it is not to be presumed that the Legislature thought it was passing a useless act. This provision was carried into Revision 1797, p. 106, c. 8, § 65. By an act "for the punishment of certain capital and other high crimes and misdemeanors," passed March 9, 1797, it was provided that no person should be tried for any offense under said act until a bill of indictment was found against him by the grand jurors attending the Supreme Court of Judicature. Revision 1797, p. 178, c. 9, § 36. This act did not include larceny, except horse stealing. On March 4, 1797, during the same session, an act was passed "for the punishment of certain inferior crimes and misdemeanors." Revision 1797, p. 175, c. 10. This act included larceny of money, goods, chattels, bonds, bills, notes, etc., regardless of value, and diverse other offenses but did not provide how any of them should be prosecuted, and larceny is a felony at common law. These two statutes, taken together, point strongly to the conclusion that at that time it was not supposed that the Constitution required common-law felonies to be prosecuted by indictment, but that it was for the Legislature to say what ones should be thus prosecuted, and what ones might be thus or otherwise prosecuted. The act of March 9, 1797, was re-enacted in 1818 with some additions, but not with the addition of larceny, and the act repealed. But the provision in respect of prosecuting by indictment was retained (Acts 1818, p. 19, c. 1, § 37), and continued in force till the Revision of 1839, unless it was changed by chapter 9, § 1, p. 19, of the Acts of 1819, constituting state's attorneys "informing officers," which is doubtful, although it is said in State v. Magoon, 61 Vt. at page 47, 17 Atl. 729, that prosecution by information of all crimes was authorized by statute from 1819 to 1839. The act of March 4, 1797, was re-enacted in 1821, with an increased penalty for larceny, but was still silent as to the mode of prosecution, and continued so until the Revision of 1839.

Since 1816 it has been the law that, when a person is confined in jail on a complaint for a crime or misdemeanor, the Supreme Court may, on his application in writing, direct an information to be filed against him, whereon the court may receive and record a plea of guilty and award sentence. V. S. 1895. The act of October 30, 1828, provided that, whenever a person was in actual confinement in jail by virtue of a complaint for an offense against said act "for the punishment of certain capital and other high crimes and misdemeanors," the county court should have power and authority, on the application in writing of such person, to direct an information to be filed against him for the offense for which he stood charged, on the filing of which it was made the duty of the court to proceed in the trial in the same way and manner as if an indictment had been presented by the grand jury. Acts 1828, p. 4, No. 23, § 3. And that has been the law ever since (V. S. 1897), and has always been acted upon, except in homicide cases, probably, and without objection as far as we know. This, in effect, is a legislative construction that the Constitution does not require prosecution by indictment in any case, unless we say that the Legislature thought the requirement, if it existed, could be waived by the accused with its consent, which we can hardly do, for the law seems to be otherwise. That mere rights and privileges guaranteed by the Constitution can be waived, to some extent at least, is probably true. But it would seem that constitutional requirements as to the mode and manner of instituting prosecutions involving the deprivation of life or liberty cannot be dispensed with by the Legislature, nor waived by the accused, even with the consent of the Legislature. Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 214 et seq., 390; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128; Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 579, 4 Sup. Ct. 202, 28 L. Ed. 262. In 1839 it was enacted that no person should be held to answer in any court for an alleged crime or offense, unless upon indictment by a grand jury, except in case of proceedings before a justice and when a prosecution by information was expressly authorized by statute. Rev. St. c. 93, § 1. This was but the act of March 9, 1797, as re-enacted in 1818, with some additions. By chapter 102, § 1, of the Revision of 1839, it was provided that state's attorneys might prosecute by information all crimes not capital and where the punishment was by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not exceeding seven years. Both of these statutes are still in force, with an enlargement in the latter of the authority of the state's attorney to prosecute by information all crimes not capital and not punishable in the state prison for life.

It was decided in State v. Leach, 77 Vt. 166, 59 Atl. 168, that statutory rape can be prosecuted by information. But the constitutionality of that mode of prosecuting was not raised nor considered, and the question has never been decided by this court, nor raised in it but twice before—once in 1880, in State v. Haley, 52 Vt. 476, and again in 1883, in State v. Magoon, above cited, in both of which, strong judicial utterances were made in favor of the correctness of the long practical construction above shown. State v. Haley was an information for a liquor nuisance, a mere misdemeanor, and the respondent contended that the proceeding should have been by indictment. But the court held otherwise, and said that the statute had always been supposed to mean that all crimes, except capital and those for which the punishment exceeded seven years in the state prison, might be prosecuted by information, without regard to any distinction between felonies and misdemeanors, and without regard to the punishment prescribed, provided it did not exceed seven years in state prison and was not capital, and that such had been the construction and uniform practice by all courts, judges, state's attorneys, and lawyers down to that time. State v. Magoon was an information for grand larceny. The court said that, prosecutions by information for high crimes having been authorized by statute from a time reaching back to a period when many of those who framed and adopted our present Constitution were living, and those statutes having been acted upon unquestioned for nearly 70 years, it would not be profitable to consider the respondent's contention of unconstitutionality; its consideration being unnecessary. The question was not involved. State v. Dyer, 67 Vt. 690, 32 Atl. 814, was an information for conspiracy, held to be a misdemeanor; and the contention was that the case did not come within the statute authorizing the state's attorney to prosecute by information, because the punishment might be by imprisonment in the state prison for more than seven years. Thus it appears that during substantially the whole time since the adoption of the Constitution the Legislature has practically construed the clause in question not to require common-law felonies to be prosecuted by indictment, and this construction has been acquiesced in and accepted as correct by the courts and with great unanimity by the profession generally, many of the best of whom have revised the statutes from time to time, commencing with that great lawyer, Nathaniel Chipman, in 1797, who was prominently active in public affairs during the formative period of the Constitution and must have been imbued with its spirit and meaning.

There is abundant authority for saying that after this long acquiescence in that construction it should not be departed from, but should be accepted as correct beyond the permissibility of question. In State v. Bosworth, 18 Vt. 402, 413, it is said that questions arising under the Constitution, settled by a long and uniform practice, questioned in the judicial tribunals but once, and then sanctioned, should be considered at rest. "Where," the court asked, "is the security of individual rights, if constitutional questions are to be considered as always open, if no acquiescence, even though sanctioned by judicial decree, is to be regarded as settling them?" There the construction had obtained only 34 years, while here it has obtained more than 100 years. See, also, Boyden v. Brookline, 8 Vt. 284. In Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 328, 345, this court adopted the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Briscoe v. Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, 11 Pet., at page 818, 9 L. Ed. 700, 928, that "a uniform action involving the right to the exercise of an important power by the state government for half a century, and this almost without question, is no unsatisfactory evidence that the power is rightly exercised." In Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 290, 2 L. Ed. 115, it was objected that the judges of the Supreme Court had no right to sit as Circuit Judges, not being appointed nor commissioned as such. But the court said that practice and acquiescence under it for several years, commencing with the organization of the judicial system, afforded an irresistible answer to the objection, and had fixed the construction of the Constitution, which was too strong to be shaken or controlled. There are many more cases to the same effect, but they need not be referred to. The subject is pretty fully treated in Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 102 and following. See, also, Black, Int. Laws, 31; Lewis' Suth. Stat. Const. § 476; Endlich, Int. Sts. § 527. But the aids of contemporaneous and practical construction must be resorted to with caution and reserve, and can never be allowed to abrogate, contradict, enlarge, nor restrict the plain and obvious meaning of the text.

As to the true meaning of the words "law of the land" and "due process of law," as used in the Constitutions of our states, there is a diversity of opinion; but all agree that they mean the same thing, whatever that is, and that, if they were combined to read, "due process of the law of the land," the meaning would not be changed. The Supreme Court of the United States had this question under consideration in 1883, in Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 28 L. Ed. 232; and pretty much all that can be said on the subject was there brought out in the majority opinion by Mr. Justice Matthews and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan. The Constitution of California, adopted in 1879, provides that offenses therefore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment, with or without such examination and commitment, as may be prescribed by law, and that a grand jury shall be summoned at least once a year in each county. By the Penal Code of the state, where a defendant has been examined and committed as thereby provided, it is the duty of the district attorney to inform against him for the offense. The plaintiff in error having been thus examined and committed for murder, the district attorney informed against him for that crime, and he was convicted and sentenced to death, and the question was whether that was "due process of law" within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, which forbids the states to "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," and it was held that it was; that an indictment or a presentment by a grand jury, as known to the common law of England, is not essential to that "due process of law," when applied to prosecutions for felonies, that is guarantied by the federal Constitution, and forbidden to the states to dispense with in the administration of criminal law; that those words refer to the law of the land in each state that derives its authority from the inherent and reserved powers of the state, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice that lie at the foundation of all our civil and political institutions, the greatest security for which lies in the right of the people to make their own laws, and to alter them at pleasure. The court said that in this country written Constitutions were deemed essential to protect the rights and liberties of the people against the encroachments of power delegated to their governments, and so the provisions of Magna Charta were incorporated into bills of rights; that they were limitations upon all the powers of government, legislative as well as executive and judicial; that it necessarily happened, therefore, that as these broad and general maxims of liberty and justice held in our system a different place and performed a different function from their position and office in English constitutional history and law, they would justify and receive a corresponding and more comprehensive interpretation; that they applied in England only as guards against executive usurpation and tyranny, while here they have become bulwarks also against arbitrary legislation; but in that application, as it would be incongruous to measure and restrict them by the ancient customary law of England, they must be held to guaranty, not particular forms of procedure, but the very substance of individual rights to life, liberty, and property. The court approved and commended as most accurate the language of Mr. Justice Johnson in Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. 235, 244, 4 L. Ed. 559, when he said, speaking of those words from Magna Charta, incorporated into the Constitution of Maryland, that "after volumes spoken and written with a view to their exposition, the good sense of mankind has at last settled down to this: that they were intended to secure the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice."

Such is the oft-repeated and settled doctrine of that court. And this court approved that doctrine in State v. Hodgson, 66 Vt. 134, 157, 28 Atl. 1089, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hodgson v. Vermont, 168 U. S. 262, 18 Sup. Ct. 30, 42 L. Ed. 461. And such has been and is the prevailing opinion in this country, both judicial and individual. Chancellor Kent says that "the better and larger definition of 'due process of law' is that it means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice." 2 Com. *13. Webster's famous definition in the Dartmouth College Case is often quoted. "By the law of the land," he says, "is most clearly intended the general law; a law that hears before it condemns, that proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules that govern society," etc. Judge Cooley says this definition is apt and suitable to judicial proceedings. He says that he has met in no judicial decision a statement that embodies more tersely and accurately the correct view of the matter than the language of Mr. Justice Johnson above quoted. He then goes on to say that "the principles, then, on which the process is based, are to determine whether it is 'due process of law' or not, and not any considerations of mere form," which, he says, may change from time to time, with due regard to the landmarks established for the protection of the citizen. Const. Lim. *355. Again he says: "Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." Id. *356.

The Supreme Court of Tennessee says that, "when first adopted in Magna Charta, the phrase 'law of the land' had reference to the common and statute law then existing in England, and when embodied in our Constitution, it referred to the same common law as previously modified, and as far as suited to the wants and conditions of our people in a new country. At present, the 'law of the land' embraces the same body of laws as still further modified; those parts validly cut off being now excluded, and those parts validly added being now included. Every valid statute of the state now in existence, whenever enacted, is the present 'law of the land' in respect to the subject-matter of that statute, and every existing enactment passed with due form and ceremony and not in conflict with some provision of the state or federal Constitution is a valid statute; and no statute otherwise valid is unconstitutional because affecting life, liberty, or property, if, when being general, it embraces all persons who are or may be in like situation and circumstances, or, when being special, it is, in addition, natural and reasonable in its classification." Harbison v. Knoxville Iron Co., 103 Tenn. 421, 437, 53 S. W. 955, 56 L. R. A. 316, 76 Am. St. Rep. 682, affirmed in 183 U. S. 13, 22 Sup. Ct. 1, 46 L. Ed. 55.

The Supreme Court of Mississippi says, in Brown v. Levee Commissioners, 50 Miss. 468, speaking of the words "due process of law," that "the principle does not demand that the laws existing at any point of time shall be irrevocable, nor that any forms of remedies shall necessarily continue. It refers to certain fundamental rights which that system of jurisprudence, of which ours is a part, has always recognized. If any of these are disregarded in the proceedings by which a person is condemned to the loss of life, liberty, or property, the deprivation has not been by 'due process of law.'"

The Constitution of Wisconsin originally declared that "no person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury." Const. 1848, art. 1, § 8. That clause was amended in 1870 (Laws 1870, p. 180, c. 118), so as to read: "No person shall be held to answer for a criminal offense without due process of law." The statute of 1871 provided that the several courts of the state should possess, and might exercise, the same power and jurisdiction to try prosecutions on information for all crimes as they possessed and might exercise in cases of like prosecution on indictment. Laws 1871, p. 202, c. 137, § 1. Rowan v. State, 30 Wis. 129, 11 Am. Rep. 559, was an information for murder, and the question was whether the amendment changed the meaning of the Constitution, or, in other words, whether "due process of law" and "on presentment or indictment of a grand jury" meant the same thing; and it was held that they did not. The court said that the words "due process of law" did not mean, and had not the effect, to limit the powers of the state to prosecution of crime by indictment, but meant law in its regular course of administration according to prescribed forms and in accordance with the general rules for the prosecution of individual rights.

The Supreme Court of Texas says that, when the words "law of the land" were used in Magna Charta, they probably meant the established law of the kingdom, in opposition to the Roman law, which was about being introduced into the land, but that now, in their most usual acceptation, they are regarded as meaning general public laws, binding all the members of the community in similar circumstances, and not partial or private laws affecting the rights of private individuals. Janes v. Reynolds' Adm'rs, 2 Tex. 250.

The Supreme Court of California, in the judgment under review in the Hurtado Case, followed its previous decision in Kalloch v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 229, in which it held that the proceeding, as regulated by the Constitution and laws of the state, was not opposed to any of the definitions of "due process of law" and "the law of the land" but was strictly within such definitions, as much as was a proceeding by indictment, and took from the accused no immunity nor protection to which he was entitled under the law.

In Utah, the words "due process of law" are held to mean law in the regular course of administration through the courts. In re McKee, 19 Utah, 231, 242, 57 Pac. 23. Indiana holds the same. State v. Boswell, 104 Ind. 541, 4 N. E. 675. It is said in Hoke v. Henderson 15 N. C. 1, 25 Am. Dec. 688, 689, that the words "law of the land" do not mean merely an act of the General Assembly, for, if they did, every restriction upon legislative authority would be at once abrogated; but that they mean that such legislative acts as profess in themselves directly to punish persons or to deprive the citizen of his property without trial before the judicial tribunals, and a decision upon the matter of right as determined by the laws under which it vested, according to the course, mode, and usages of the common law, are not effectually laws of the land for those purposes. Many of the other states adopt the view of the cases referred to, but some of them hold the other way, notably Massachusetts, in Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329. Mr. Stephen says, in the first volume of his History of the Criminal Law of England (page 595), that "from the earliest times the king accused persons of offenses not capital in his own court by the agency of his legal representatives without the intervention of a grand jury."

But it is objected that Hurtado v. California is not in point here, because, the case coming within the Penal Code of that state, its Constitution expressly authorized prosecution by information, whereas our Constitution gives no such authority. But the objection is not well taken; for, if an information for a capital offense was forbidden by the fourteenth amendment, the Constitution of the state could not authorize it in any circumstances. So the case is precisely in point. Thus it appears that the practical construction that our Constitution has so long received in this respect accords with the prevailing opinion in this country, which we think the better opinion, and therefore we the more readily hold that our Constitution does not require common-law felonies to be prosecuted by indictment, and that consequently the statute in question is constitutional.

In the rape case, it appeared that the girl consented in fact; but she could not consent in law, as she was under the age of consent. As bearing on her credibility as a witness, and as tending to show a motive to charge the respondent with the crime, the respondent offered to show by her on cross-examination that she was 6 or 8 months gone with child, and was never pregnant before; and that ever since she was 12 years old, down to the time in question, she had had sexual intercourse with many different men. The state offered to admit her pregnancy, but objected to her being cross-examined as to her intercourse with other men; but the respondent did not want the admission of pregnancy unless he could cross-examine as to the intercourse, which was not permitted. As a general rule, particular acts of misconduct are not provable by extrinsic evidence. In this state you cannot prove by such evidence that a woman is a prostitute, for the purpose of impeaching her credibility as a witness (Morse v. Pineo, 4 Vt. 281; State v. Smith, 7 Vt. 141; Spears v. Forrest, 15 Vt. 435), nor that a witness is a notorious counterfeiter (Crane v. Thayer, 18 Vt. 162, 46 Am. Dec. 142), nor the keeper of a house of ill fame (State v. Fournier, 68 Vt. 262, 270, 35 Atl. 178).

State v. Hollenbeck, 67 Vt. 34, 30 Atl. 696, relied upon by the respondent as expressly deciding this question, is not in point. That was an indictment for rape simpliciter, and the woman was of the age of consent, as shown by the record in that case and as is inferable from the case as reported. In such a case, there is no doubt but the respondent has a legal right to cross-examine the complainant as to her intercourse with other men, not to shake her credit as a witness, but to show her consent, and so no rape. What is said in that case about allowing the cross-examination to be as unrestricted and searching as consistent with the rules of law related to the refusal of the trial court to accord to the respondent his legal right to show by the complainant that her relations with him were friendly and cordial at the time of the alleged offense, and continued so afterwards. Whether in the case at bar the Court could have allowed the cross-examination as matter of discretion is a question not before us. As to a motive to charge the respondent unjustly, the case as presented would afford no ground for such an inference, had the claimed intercourse with other men been shown.

Judgment in Stimpson's Case that there is no error in the proceedings of the county court, and that the respondent take nothing by his exceptions; and judgment in Lee's Case that there is no error, and that sentence be imposed and execution thereof done.

MARCY v. PARKER.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Orleans. Oct. 25, 1905.)

1. SHERIFFS—WRONGFUL LEVY—EVIDENCE.

In trover against a sheriff for the conversion of lumber standing in the yard of a third person, a contract between plaintiff and the third person giving plaintiff title to the lumber in the yard until advancements made by him should be repaid, leases of the yard from the third person to plaintiff, and a quitclaim deed executed by the third person, prior to the taking by defendant, conveying the yard to plaintiff, were admissible in evidence, although the third person remained in possession and control of the premises until the execution of the quitclaim deed, where there was testimony showing that, when the quitclaim deed was executed, plaintiff assumed control of the premises and took exclusive possession of the lumber, and continued so in possession until after the lumber was taken by defendant at the instance of a creditor of the third person.

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In trover against a sheriff for the conversion of lumber, evidence held sufficient to show that plaintiff was in actual possession of the lumber at the time of the conversion.

3. EVIDENCE—PLANS AND DIAGRAMS—ACCURACY.

A plan offered in evidence to show the location of certain piles of lumber was properly admitted, although other piles of lumber standing in the same neighborhood were not shown thereon, where the omitted piles were not in controversy and their location was wholly immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 1505.]

4. APPEAL—PRESERVATION OF ERRORS—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTION.

Error in the admission of evidence over objection is not before the Supreme Court for review, where no exception was taken to such admission.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 1503, 1509.]

5. SAME—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error in allowing a question asked of a witness was harmless, where the witness answered that he did not know and had never paid much attention to the matter.

6. TROVER AND CONVERSION—SUFFICIENCY OF PLAINTIFF'S TITLE—POSSESSION.

A person having actual possession of chattels has sufficient title thereto to enable him to maintain trover against a stranger for their conversion.

7. SAME—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where plaintiff in an action of trover, was in actual possession of the property at the time of the conversion, the burden was on defendant to show a better title than plaintiff's in some other person and also to connect himself with such person.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trover and Conversion, § 216.]

8. APPEAL—REVIEW OF FACTS.

The action of the trial court in sustaining a verdict as not against the weight of the evidence is discretionary, and not revisable by the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3872.]

9. TRIAL—VERDICT—IMPEACHMENT—AFFIDAVITS OF JURORS.

Affidavits of jurors to the effect that they misunderstood the law of the case or the instructions of the court will not be received to impeach or set aside their verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, § 813.]

Exceptions from Orleans County Court; Rowell, Judge.

Action by Frank F. Marcy against Chester S. Parker. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and petitioned for a new trial. Judgment affirmed, and petition dismissed.

Argued before TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

J. W. Redmond and W. R. Aldrich, for plaintiff. Young & Young, for defendant.

WATSON, J. This is an action of trover for the alleged conversion of a quantity of lumber. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the defendant took and sold about 30,000 feet of 2-inch hardwood planks, which plaintiff claimed to own by purchase from R. B. Lang, of Barton, and also to hold, as against the defendant, by virtue of his claimed possession thereof. The defendant, who was a deputy sheriff, denied that the plaintiff was either owner or possessor of the property. He admitted the taking and selling of the planks in question, but claimed and his evidence tended to show that they were previously conditionally sold to Lang by Taplin & Rowell, and that in payment therefor they took Lang's two lien notes, each payable one day after date and duly recorded; that the lien notes covered all the 2-inch hardwood planks shipped by Taplin & Rowell to Lang from October 7, 1903, to November 20, 1903, inclusive, and that they covered no other or different 2-inch hardwood planks; that said planks were piled in the Lang millyard in a certain large double pile, just west of the spur track, and in one other stack just south of and next to the double pile in the same row, and none of said lumber was piled in any other stack or pile; that shortly before January 20, 1904, Taplin & Rowell placed the two lien notes, then overdue and unpaid, in his hands as deputy sheriff, and directed him to enforce them against the 2-inch hardwood planks described in each; and that by virtue of said lien notes he took and sold the same 2-inch hardwood planks described therein and none other, and applied the net proceeds thereof to the notes in proportion as the planks were covered by them, respectively. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the defendant took, moved, and sold all the 2-inch hardwood planks in the said double pile and the single pile directly south of and next to it, and also nearly all of another stack just south of the one last named and on the same side of the spur track, and that the planks which the defendant admitted that he took and sold were in fact delivered at the Lang millyard at an earlier date than October 7, 1903, and were largely planks which had been piled there as early as the first part of August, 1903, and were not covered by the lien notes. In connection with the general verdict for the plaintiff, the jury made a special finding that the hardwood planks which the defendant took and sold were not covered by the lien notes.

It appeared that prior to December 8, 1903, Lang was the owner of the millyard and premises known as the "R. B. Lang mill property" at South Barton. The lumber in controversy, at the time it was moved away by the defendant, was located on these premises, piled or stacked in the millyard. Subject to defendant's exception, and for the purpose of showing that at the time in question the possession of the millyard was in himself, the plaintiff introduced in evidence a contract, two leases, and a quitclaim deed. The contract was made and executed September 30, 1902, by and between Lang and the plaintiff. By its provisions, in consideration of advancements to be made by the plaintiff, Lang agreed to ship to the order of the plaintiff all the lumber cut out of the then coming season's stock of logs, that the plaintiff should do the exclusive marketing thereof, and that Lang should manufacture and car the lumber according to plaintiff's directions. The plaintiff agreed to advance to Lang a certain sum of money per 1,000 feet when the logs were cut and piled on skids on the "railroad lots," a further sum when hauled to Lang's mill, a further sum when the logs were sawed and the lumber stuck up, and a further sum when the lumber was planed and loaded on the cars at South Barton. He also agreed to advance money to Lang on all other logs purchased by him, at different stages, from the time when they should be delivered at Lang's mill to the loading of the lumber on the cars, inclusive. It further stated: "It is agreed and understood by the parties that all logs and the lumber manufactured therefrom, when delivered at or about the Lang mill, shall become the sole and entire property of said Marcy, and so remain until all advancements made by the said Marcy and the interest thereon are fully paid." The contract was to continue in force until the lumber from the then coming season's stock of logs should be disposed of according to its terms. On September 28, 1903, this contract, by agreement in writing on the back, was extended to continue in force until all the lumber manufactured from "the past season's cut of logs, and from the logs to be hereafter cut on lots Nos. 130 and 181 (mentioned in a deed from R. B. Lang to Frank F. Marcy, dated November 5, A. D. 1902), is fully marketed." The evidence showed that the lots referred to in the contract as "railroad lots" were owned by the plaintiff and that the logs cut thereon under the contract belonged to him. True, this written contract did not in itself refer to any of the lumber in dispute; but the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that by subsequent parol agreement it was made to cover all sawed lumber bought by Lang and delivered at the Lang millyard, which would include the lumber in question. Thus, in re-examination, the plaintiff testified respecting such sawed lumber as follows: "Q. You may state the substance of what was said between you and Mr. Lang about that lumber that he should buy. A. At various times I was to pay for what lumber was delivered on my ground and put in my possession, and it was to be treated the same as the logs. Q. Same as the logs under the contract? A. Yes, sir."

The leases were from Lang to the plaintiff, and of the Lang millyard where the lumber was piled—one dated October 1, 1903, and recorded on the 6th day of the same month, with term to October 1, 1903; the other dated September 28, 1903, and recorded the next day, term to begin at the expiration of the former lease and to continue one year. The defendant's counsel objected to the admission of the written contract and the two leases on the ground that they were immaterial. The quitclaim deed was from Lang to the plaintiff, dated and delivered December 8, 1903, and recorded the next day, conveying Lang's mill property at South Barton, including the millyard on which the lumber in dispute was located at the time it was taken by the defendant. Defendant objected to its admission on the ground that it also was immaterial, being dated after the defendant's lien notes were executed and recorded. In the light of the parol evidence showing the situation of the parties, the subject-matter of these four documents, and the surrounding circumstances when they were respectively executed, there can be no doubt regarding their materiality. They were so connected with the lumber transaction between Lang and the plaintiff as to form a part of it. They constituted different steps therein, from the time when the plaintiff engaged to advance money to Lang on the logs cut on the plaintiff's lots, and on all other logs purchased by Lang at market price, and the lumber sawed, at different stages of the work, with an agreement that all logs and the lumber manufactured therefrom, when delivered at the Lang mill, should "become the sole and entire property of" the plaintiff, and so remain until all advancements made by him should be fully paid, and a subsequent parol agreement that all other lumber furnished by Lang was to be treated the same as logs, to the time when, finding that Lang "was running things wrong," the plaintiff received the quitclaim deed and took possession of the property. True, the evidence showed that Lang was in the occupancy of the millyard during all the time covered by the terms of the two leases until he gave the quitclaim deed; yet the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that when he received the deed he put men in charge of the mill and millyard, and kept them in charge thereof until after the defendant took the lumber in dispute, and that soon after the plaintiff received the deed, and before the lumber in question was taken away by the defendant, Lang ceased to work in or about the mill or millyard, left the premises, and ceased to exercise any control over the mill premises, or the property there, or the business there carried on. Especially is the materiality of this documentary evidence obvious if, as the plaintiff claims, the testimony tended to show that he took exclusive possession of all the lumber in the millyard on or about the day he received the quitclaim deed, and continued so in possession till after the lumber in controversy was taken.

The defendant denies that the testimony tended to show that plaintiff took possession of the lumber in controversy, beyond such constructive possession as the quitclaim deed and leases gave him, if any. We are referred to the transcript of the evidence to determine this question. In addition to the evidence before referred to, the plaintiff testified in substance that what lumber Lang bought and delivered into the millyard, into the plaintiff's possession, he (plaintiff) was to pay for, and had done so; that Lang would write down to him that he (Lang) had so much lumber or logs and had done so much work, and the plaintiff would send him a check to pay for the lumber which he said was delivered in the yard; that when he took the quitclaim deed he took Lang's "interest in everything"; that about the time he took the deed he put Mr. Robinson in charge of his interests there, and also S. A. Hunt at different times. Hunt was produced as a witness by the plaintiff, and testified in substance that he worked for the plaintiff from December 22, 1903, until July, 1904; that he was the plaintiff's foreman in charge of the property at the Lang mill; that he did the scaling of lumber in the millyard, took care of the lumber there, and did the shipping; that within a few days after December 22d, when he was first put in charge, he went through all the lumber in the millyard, including that taken by the defendant, and estimated it "to determine somewhere near what we had of different kinds." Robinson was called by the plaintiff, and testified that he went to work there for the plaintiff December 4, 1903, and remained as foreman in charge inside until some time in March following; that he was there when the defendant took the lumber, and that he helped Hunt make estimates of the piles of planks in question before the defendant moved them. Bert Sheldon testified that he was bookkeeper for Lang until the plaintiff took possession, and after that he worked in the same capacity there for the plaintiff; and, as we have before observed, the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that Lang went away soon after he gave the quitclaim deed, and had nothing to do with that property or business thereafter. Certainly this evidence tended to show that with the taking of the quitclaim deed the plaintiff took the actual possession of all the lumber in the millyard, and was thus in possession when the planks in dispute were moved away by the defendant.

A plan prepared by the plaintiff's witness Hunt, purporting to show four piles of lumber on the west side of the railroad siding running to the Lang mill, numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4, from which plaintiff claimed defendant took lumber, and two piles on the mill platform, numbered 5 and 6, was offered and received in evidence, in connection with the testimony of the witness, to explain and make clear what he was talking about with respect to what lumber was moved and where the lumber which was moved was situated before moving with respect to this siding. Before the plan was admitted the witness testified on cross-examination that between the piles 2 and 3 was a pile of white birch, and that about half its bigness further from the track on the same side "was another pile of hardwood, not a stack, but heaped up, piled up." That the plan shows with reasonable accuracy the situation of the piles marked thereon had previously been testified by the plaintiff. Defendant excepted to its admission because it did not show these other piles and was misleading; that it was not a correct representation of the piles that were there at the time defendant took the planks sued for. The two piles of lumber which the evidence shows were not represented on the plan were not in controversy and could have no bearing on any issue before the jury. There was no dispute as to the location of the six piles represented thereon with reference to each other nor with reference to the spur track. The location of any other piles was wholly immaterial, and their representation on the plan could not have made the testimony of the witness any clearer to the jury. The plan was admitted for a particular purpose, and in the ruling there was no error. The case of Hale v. Rich, 48 Vt. 217, is full authority for this holding.

The plaintiff called B. C. Berry as a witness, who testified that the defendant pointed out to him the stacks of lumber in the millyard, which he claimed he had taken, and placed them in charge of the witness as keeper; that there was one solid or double stack and five others, making six in all, if the double one is called two. After testifying on which side of the track the stacks were, the witness was shown the plan and asked to state if it represented the situation of the stacks that he was put in charge of. To this the defendant's counsel objected; but no exception was taken to its admission, and the question is not before us. In re-examination the witness was asked when, if ever, he first noticed that pile 3 on the plan was moved. Defendant's counsel objected to the witness being allowed to testify by the number on the plan, and excepted to the allowance of the question. The witness answered that he did not know as he could answer that correctly; that it was a matter which he never paid much attention to. We need not consider this exception, since the answer was harmless.

At the close of the testimony the defendant moved for a verdict on the ground that (1) no title is shown in the plaintiff to any of the property which defendant took, removed, and sold; (2) there is no evidence that the plaintiff had rightfully any possession of the lumber which any of the testimony tends to show was taken possession of or moved by the defendant; and (3) there is no evidence in the case tending to show or establish facts entitling plaintiff to recover. The motion was overruled, to which defendant excepted. As we have already seen, the evidence tended to show the actual possession of the lumber in question in the plaintiff at the time the defendant took it. The special finding of the jury that the lumber sold by the defendant was not covered by the lien notes shows that as to that lumber the defendant stood as a stranger. The motion was rightfully overruled, for a person having the actual possession of chattels has a sufficient title thereto to enable him to maintain trover against a stranger for their conversion. Knapp & Worden v. Winchester, 11 Vt. 351; Potter v. Washburn, 13 Vt. 553, 37 Am. Dec. 615.

The court charged the jury, among other things, that "there is no controversy * * * upon the testimony in the case but that before and at the time the lumber was thus taken from the millyard the plaintiff was in full and actual possession of the millyard and of the lumber thus taken away. The testimony shows in substance that on the 3d day of December last the plaintiff took a quitclaim deed from Lang, and that deed on inspection seems to cover, and it is conceded by counsel, as I understand, does cover, the Lang mill and millyard and the appurtenances. I don't think there is anything in that deed showing that any lumber in the millyard was conveyed by it. There is not. I have read it. The testimony further is that on the 4th day of December the plaintiff put men in charge of the mill and the yard, and the testimony further is that pretty soon, and in the month of December, and before the lumber was taken away by the defendant, Lang moved away, went away, so that left the plaintiff in the full actual possession of the lumber in the yard." To this part of the charge the defendant excepted as follows: (1) That the plaintiff was in full and actual possession of the lumber in controversy at the time it was taken by the defendant; (2) that the effect of the quitclaim deed and the possession of the land conveyed to the plaintiff gave him the full and actual possession of the lumber in controversy. Immediately after the above exceptions were taken, the plaintiff's counsel asked the defendant's counsel whether they claimed the "right to go to the jury upon the question as to the truth of what the plaintiff says in respect to putting Hunt in charge, and what Hunt says in respect of being in charge, and what Robinson says in respect of being in charge, of the property, the millyard there." To which the defendant's counsel replied, "We have no testimony on that subject," and, further, that "the legal effect of this testimony is not sufficient to give the plaintiff legal possession of the property." We have already discussed the plaintiff's evidence showing the title and possession of the mill property, including the millyard, in the plaintiff under the quitclaim deed, and his possession of all the lumber in the millyard before and at the time the lumber in question was taken by the defendant, and further discussion of it is unnecessary. We think the legal effect of this evidence, undisputed, is as stated in the charge above quoted, and that the exceptions thereto are without force.

The court further instructed the jury that, there being no controversy but that the defendant did take away lumber there as indicated in the part of the charge above quoted, the burden was upon him to show that he had a right to take it, because by taking it he invaded the plaintiff's possession, and the possession that the plaintiff had was sufficient title as against the defendant, unless he could show a better right than the possessory right of the plaintiff, to which the defendant excepted. But in this there was no error. Actual possession of personal property is enough, prima facie, to sustain an action of trover for its conversion against any one except the true owner or one connecting himself in some way with the true owner. In such circumstances, in order to defeat a recovery, the burden is on the defendant, not only to show a better title in some other person, but also his connection with such other person. White v. Bascom, 28 Vt. 268; Wooley v. Edison, 35 Vt. 214.

The defendant moved to set aside the verdict because (1) it is contrary to the evidence; (2) the uncontradicted evidence in the case shows that a portion of the planks which were taken by the defendant were the planks of Taplin & Rowell, and were the same planks covered by the lien notes; (3) the evidence shows that a large part of the planks which defendant took were planks described in the lien notes of Taplin & Rowell, under which he was acting; and (4) the verdict is excessive and gives the plaintiff damages for taking more lumber than any testimony in the case tends to show that defendant did take, which belonged to plaintiff. The motion was overruled, to which defendant excepted. As we have before seen, the exceptions state that the defendant claimed and his evidence tended to prove that the lien notes before mentioned covered all the 2-inch hardwood planks shipped by Taplin & Rowell to Lang from October 7, 1903, to November 20, 1903, inclusive, and that they covered no other or different hardwood planks, and also that the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the planks which the defendant admitted he took and sold were in fact delivered at the Lang millyard at an earlier date than October 7, 1903, and that they were largely planks that had been piled there as early as the first part of August of that year. Defendant's evidence further tended to show that Taplin & Rowell sold no 2-inch hardwood planks to Lang, except 10,834 feet sold conditionally July 1, 1903, and the planks sold between October 7th and November 20th, inclusive, which were covered by the two lien notes, and that Lang bought no other 2-inch hardwood planks of the same kind and quality from any one else during the summer or fall of that year, and that he bought no 2-inch maple, birch, and beech planks of any one in that year, except from Taplin & Rowell. The plaintiff claimed that Taplin & Rowell did sell to Lang during that summer and fall more 2-inch hardwood planks of the kind and quality in question than above stated, and that Lang must have received other 2-inch hardwood planks of the same kind and quality of some one else during that summer and fall, and claimed that the evidence tended so to show. The defendant denied that the evidence had such a tendency, and we are referred to the official transcript of the evidence to determine it. We have examined the evidence as shown by the transcript and think its tendency bears out the claim of the plaintiff in this respect. The motion to set aside the verdict, as far as it was based upon the claim that it was without evidence, was therefore properly overruled. And to the extent that the motion is based upon the ground that it is against the weight of evidence, the action of the court below was discretionary, and not revisable here.

This disposes of all the exceptions upon which the defendant relies as showing error, and judgment is affirmed.

The defendant has brought a petition for a new trial upon the ground that a part of the jury wholly misapprehended the effect of the charge and rendered a different verdict by reason thereof than they otherwise would. The petition is supported by the affidavits of five of the jurors who sat on the case, and by no other evidence. The law is well settled in this state that the affidavits of jurors who sat on a case will not be received to impeach or set aside their verdict, and that their affidavits to the effect that they misunderstood the law of the case or the instructions of the court come within this rule. Sheldon v. Perkins, 37 Vt. 550; Carpenter v. Willey, 65 Vt. 177, 26 Atl. 488; Tarbell v. Tarbell, 60 Vt. 486, 15 Atl. 104.

The petition is dismissed, with costs.

GOODWILL et al. v. HEIM.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

1 PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING—INTEREST.

Before a settlement of partnership accounts, interest is not chargeable, unless demanded by the equities of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partnership, §§ 120, 121.]

2. SAME.

Where the control of the finances and business of a firm are given a liquidating partner, and he has made no claims on his copartner for interest on moneys withdrawn, none should be allowed in an accounting.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Northumberland County.

Bill by Phillip Goodwill and others against Andrew A. Heim. Decree for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

Charles M. Clement, S. P. Wolverton, and W. H. M. Oram, for appellants. George W. Ryon and Samuel Heckert, for appellee.

ELKIN, J. This case comes before us venerable with age. The original bill was filed March 21, 1879, and from that time to the present the questions involved have been before the masters, the court below, and here for consideration and determination. Most of the original counsel connected with the case have departed this life, and the two principal litigants are now numbered with the dead. It could serve no useful purpose to undertake a review in detail of the complicated partnership accounts extending over a period of about 40 years. This work has been done by expert accountants, and by able counsel representing the parties to the controversy. We are not inclined to disturb the findings of fact nor the conclusions of law stated by the masters and approved by the court below, except in one particular, wherein we believe there was error. When the original account was filed in 1885, the accounting partner was credited with interest on certain sums of money withdrawn by the other partner, as follows, to wit: On $3,119.55 from November 30, 1871, 13 years, 11 months, $2,604.82; on $75 from April 8, 1872, 13 years, 6 months and 22 days, $61.02; on $115.83 from July 8, 1872, 13 years, 3 months and 22 days, $92.51; on $150 from October 8, 1872, 13 years and 22 days, $117.55—total, $2,875.50. We have examined the testimony with care, but have not been convinced that the interest charged is justifiable under the circumstances. The accounting partner had the exclusive control of the finances and business of the firm and had made no demand for a settlement, and no claim for interest on the amounts withdrawn and on which interest was allowed. The general rule is that interest will not be allowed on partnership accounts until there has been a settlement of the same. It is true this court has frequently said that the allowance or refusal of interest in the settlement of partnership accounts depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. Gyger's Appeal, 62 Pa. 73, 1 Am. Rep. 382; Grubb's Appeal, 66 Pa. 117; Jones v. Farquhar, 186 Pa. 386, 40 Atl. 1134; Brenner v. Carter, 203 Pa. 75, 52 Atl. 178; Kelley v. Shay, 206 Pa. 215, 55 Atl. 927. In some of these cases the rule has been recognized that the defendant will not be charged with interest on overdrafts where there is no evidence of an agreement to pay interest, and where it appears that the liquidating partner who was acquainted with the account never made demand on the defendant for settlement or for interest until he filed his bill after the dissolution of the partnership. Interest should not be allowed on partnership accounts before there has been an accounting or settlement of the same, unless under the peculiar facts and circumstances surrounding the case the equities demand that interest be charged. In the case at bar we do not discover such peculiar facts or circumstances as would justify a departure from the general rule. There was no agreement to pay interest between the partners. No demand was made by the defendant for settlement of the account, the payment of balances, or for interest on the same before the bill was filed. Under these facts the masters and the court below erred in allowing the accounting partner, in the account filed in 1885, interest amounting, as above stated, to $2,875.50. This sum should be deducted from the balance found due at that time, and the interest charged upon said sum after 1885, in the later accounts, should also be deducted. All of the remaining assignments of error are overruled.

Decree reversed, and it is ordered and directed that the record be remitted to the court below, to be modified and corrected in accordance with this opinion.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

RAILROADS — MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE — RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF PURCHASER — SUIT BY BONDHOLDERS.

A decree in mortgage foreclosure of a railroad authorized the purchasers to use bonds as purchase money, and the amount due on the bonds was fixed by the court. The purchasers purchased bonds designated in the decree in reliance thereon and applied them on their bid, receiving a deed for the property, and thereafter organized a new corporation and expended large sums of money in the improvement of the property. Held, that bond owners, having notice of the decree and proceedings and of such purchase and payment, had no standing to petition many years thereafter for a change of the decree, so as to correct any inequality among the bondholders.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Perry County.

Bill by the Real Estate Trust Company of Philadelphia against the Perry County Railroad Company and others. From the decree, Edward R. Sponsler and others appeal. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

W. H. Sponsler and James M. Barnett, for appellants. George R. Barnett and William S. Snyder, for appellees.

BROWN, J. On July 1, 1892, the Perry County Railroad Company issued 200 bonds of $500 each, and to secure their payment executed to the Real Estate Trust Company of Philadelphia, as trustee, a mortgage for $100,000 on all of its property and franchises. The bonds bore interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum and were payable 25 years from date, the coupons for the semiannual interest becoming due on the 1st days of January and July. The bonds were all negotiated by the railroad company, and at the time the mortgage was foreclosed were held by 14 different parties. On July 1, 1893, the company defaulted in the payment of interest on 18 of the bonds held by the Pennsylvania Steel Company. On July 1, 1896, it defaulted in payment of the coupons on 143 of the bonds held by the Real Estate Trust Company of Philadelphia, and no interest was ever thereafter paid to either of the said companies, the holders of the bonds up to the time of the foreclosure proceedings. On the remaining 89 bonds, held by 12 different parties, including the appellees, all interest was paid until July 1, 1903. On a bill filed by the Real Estate Trust Company as trustee in the mortgage and as a holder of the bonds of the company, a decree of foreclosure was made on July 20, 1903. By that decree the court below found the exact amount due on each of the 200 bonds, and who held them, and in directing the manner in which the net proceeds of the sale of the property should be distributed among these bondholders the decree was that the proceeds should be appropriated, first, to the payment of all interest due on the bonds; second, to the payment of interest accrued upon the matured and unpaid coupons attached to the bonds; and, third, to the payment of the principal of the bonds in full, if the purchase money should be sufficient for that purpose, and, if not, pro rata, so that no preference, priority, or distinction should be given to any of the bonds. And it was further decreed that at the sale the purchase money might be paid "either in cash, or by owners of bonds secured by such mortgage, in such bonds, to such extent as said bonds shall be entitled to payment in cash out of the proceeds of sale." Subsequently to this decree, and before the day of sale, the appellants purchased 163 bonds from the Real Estate Trust Company, John Wister's estate, and James Boyd, and shortly thereafter the 18 held by the Pennsylvania Steel Company. In pursuance of public advertisement, the property of the railroad company was sold at public sale in the city of Philadelphia on September 14, 1903, to the appellants for $75,000. On September 21, 1903, the Real Estate Trust Company made return of its sale to the court below, and on that day, after a public proclamation in open court, no exceptions having been filed nor objections made, the sale was confirmed to the appellants and a deed ordered to be made out to them. Upon full settlement made by them with the Real Estate Trust Company, by paying to it all the cash required by the terms of sale and turning in their bonds at the value which they had for the purpose of being used as purchase money under the decree of the court, a deed was executed and delivered to them and a receipt given in full for the purchase money. They subsequently formed a new railroad corporation under the act of assembly, taking over all the property and franchises that had been purchased by them, and prior to January 1, 1904, paid out large sums of money in the repair of the rolling stock of the new company and other improvements and betterments. On January 18, 1904, nearly four months after they had paid for their purchase in exact accordance with the decree of July 20, 1903, and received a deed for what they had purchased, the appellees filed a petition, praying for a rehearing of the bill and alleging that the decree of distribution was inequitable, as it ought to have been ordered pro rata upon all of the bonds, based upon the accumulation of principal and interest in each case only from July 1, 1903, the date of the last payment of interest to the petitioners. The status in which the other bondholders had been placed by the default of the company was alleged to be due to their indulgence of it, as a penalty for which their coupons that had matured before July 1, 1903, ought not to be paid. A rehearing was ordered, with the condition that, "in so far as the decree has been executed, the parties who have acted on the faith of such decree shall not be prejudiced by such decree being reversed or varied." The appellants, upon their petition, were allowed to intervene as respondents to the application for the rehearing. It was conducted before a judge of the Eighth judicial district, specially presiding, who, on October 12, 1904, modified the decree of July 20, 1903, by ordering a general pro rata distribution among all of the bondholders, based upon the amount of principal and interest due as one sum in each case, wholly ignoring the rights which had been given the bondholders by the former decree, and upon which the appellants had acted in good faith.

The petition for rehearing was disposed of by the learned judge specially presiding on answer and testimony, but with no regard to the decree of July, 1903. Indeed, it is not referred to in his general discussion, and reference is made to it only in the order modifying it. He disposed of the questions raised as if they had never been passed upon by the court before, and, though his opinion is designated as one on rehearing, from all that can be gathered from it, except its reference to a prior hearing, it could properly be regarded as the original hearing in the case. After reciting that the appellants had become the purchasers of the property and franchises of the railroad company in September, 1903, and had paid the purchase money in full, as already stated, the court found that in pursuance of the permission given by the former decree, and in reliance upon it that the purchase money bid for the property and franchises at the sale might be paid for either in cash or bonds secured by the mortgage to such extent as the bonds should be entitled to payment in cash out of the proceeds of the sale, the appellants without any knowledge of the contemplated proceedings by the petitioners for a rehearing, or that they, or any of them, were dissatisfied with the decree of sale, or any part thereof, in good faith had purchased and become the owners of a number of bonds of the value of many thousands of dollars, for the purpose of using them as purchase money in the purchase contemplated by them, and prior to the filing of the petition for the rehearing, and without knowledge that an application for it was contemplated, used the bonds so purchased in their settlement and payment for the property and franchises of the railroad company, as permitted and allowed by the decree of sale, and that in their plan and contemplation of the purchase of the said property and franchises of the said railroad company they had considered the condition of the tracks and equipment of the railroad company as dilapidated, worn out, menacing, and dangerous, and, in view of the necessity of quick and immediate repair and betterment of the property in the interest and safety of the public, had made the railroad safe by the expenditure of a large sum of money. But in the face of these sweeping findings the rights of the appellants, as fixed by the decree of July, 1903, and upon which they had acted, were ignored, to their manifest prejudice, by the decree made on the application for the rehearing; for, if it is not disturbed, it will compel them to pay additional purchase money after they have received their deed and paid every dollar called for by the decree under which they bought. The question before us is not whether the decree of July 20, 1903, was erroneous in directing that the proceeds of the sale should be applied, first, to the payment of all interest due on the bonds, second, to the payment of interest accrued upon matured and unpaid coupons, and the balance to the payment of the principal of the bonds, but whether, under the admitted facts, just stated, the second decree of October 12, 1904, should be allowed to stand as an equitable one.

An undenied allegation in the answer to the petition for a rehearing is that before the decree of July 20, 1903, was finally made, the Real Estate Trust Company had notified each one of the appellees of the proceedings to foreclose the mortgage and what decree would be asked for. Again, after it was made, and before it was executed, notice was given them on August 14, 1903, that a sale of the railroad property would be held in pursuance of it in the city of Philadelphia on September 14, 1903. No one of them objected to the entry of the decree, to the execution of the order of sale, nor to the confirmation of it by the court after the appellants had complied with all the conditions of the decree. As soon as the property was sold at the bid of $75,000, the appellees knew, or ought to have known, that by the decree, which they had allowed to become final, they would receive much less than the amounts due them on their bonds; but in the period between the date of the sale and its confirmation, when they could have acted, they did nothing. On the contrary, they allowed it to become absolutely confirmed, and permitted the plaintiffs to pay for their purchase in accordance with the decree of sale. Nearly four months after its confirmation and the payment not only of the purchase money by the appellants, but after the expenditure of thousands of dollars by them in the betterment of the property acquired by the new company, a modification of the decree was asked for, with the immediate effect of making the appellants pay more for the property for the benefit of the appellees. Assuming that their complaint as to the decree of July 20, 1908, is just, they had been given an opportunity to protest against it before it was made; again, before it was executed; and later on, before the absolute confirmation of the sale, to ask that it be modified. They did nothing, however, and with their laches and supineness, not only admitted, but unexplained, it would be against every equitable principle if a chancellor should now hear them to the prejudice of others, who, as found by the judge below in modifying the first decree, had acted in good faith on that decree, with not the slightest intimation that those who now complain of it were dissatisfied with it or contemplated any proceedings to have it modified. The decree of July 20, 1908, was fully executed as to the appellants, the purchasers of the property. There was nothing more for them to do under it, and yet, as now modified on the rehearing granted under the equity rule that "parties who have acted on the faith of such decree shall not be prejudiced by such decree being reversed or varied," they are so manifestly prejudiced that attention need not again be called to the wrong done them. The holder of a legal claim may be estopped from asserting it, and an equitable claim may in time, through the conduct of its owner, become inequitable as to those against whom he would press it. When the doors of chancery are knocked at in time, they will open, that the chancellor may hear; but the knock may be too late, as was the appellees'.

The decree appealed from is reversed, and that of July 20, 1908, is affirmed, as fixing the rights of the appellants as purchasers of the property sold; the costs in the proceedings on the rehearing and on this appeal to be paid by the appellees.

REAL ESTATE TRUST CO. OF PHILADELPHIA v. PERRY COUNTY

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Perry County.

Bill by the Real Estate Trust Company of Philadelphia against the Perry County Railroad Company and others. From the decree, the Duncannon National Bank appeals. Dismissed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

BROWN, J. In view of what we have said in the opinion this day filed in the appeal of Sponsler and others from the same decree (January Term, 1904, No. 305, 62 Atl. 25), and of the finding of the court below that neither the Real Estate Trust Company nor the Pennsylvania Steel Company had done anything which precluded it from demanding payment of its matured and unpaid coupons, this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.

ROHRBACH et al. v. SANDERS.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

1. TENANCY IN COMMON—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RECOVERY OF REALTY.

Testator, who died in 1859, devised to his wife and to his son all of his property, to be held for herself and in trust for his son, providing that, if she married again, then all the property should go to his son, and the trust in his favor to be void. The widow did not marry, but died in possession of the real estate in 1891. The son's interest was sold under a judgment against him in 1880. Held, that an action brought 25 years later by the grantee of the purchaser against the committee of the son, who had been declared a lunatic, to recover such property, was barred by limitations.

2. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—NATURE OF ESTATE.

Where testator devised all his property to his wife and his son, to be held for herself and in trust for his son, with the provision that it should descend to the son if the wife married again, she took a defeasible fee-simple estate in an undivided one-half of the real estate, which, when she did not marry again, became an absolute fee simple.

3. TENANTS IN COMMON—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Where a tenant in common for more than 20 years held uninterrupted and notorious possession of the entire property, taking the whole profits exclusively to himself and claiming the whole land, he acquired title by adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Tenancy in Common, §§ 42-49.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Northumberland County.

Action by G. E. Rohrbach and W. R.

Rohrbach against W. J. Sanders, committee of Henry Simpson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Defendant presented the following points:

"(2) That under the will of Henry V. Simpson, Sr., the widow, Sarah A. Simpson, took a fee in the undivided one-half of the whole estate, defeasible upon her remarriage. That event not having taken place, upon her death she was, or her estate was, seised of the fee in the undivided one-half of the premises described in the writ of ejectment. That the sheriff's sale, under the judgment of Daniel Beckley against Henry V. Simpson, Jr., did not pass the interest of Sarah A. Simpson, but only the interest of Henry V. Simpson, Jr., which was the undivided one-half; the sale taking place prior to the death of Sarah A. Simpson." Answer: That point is affirmed, and is I believe, what I have already said to you in my charge.

"(3) When one tenant in common enters on the whole, and takes the profits and claims the whole exclusively for 21 years, the jury ought to presume an actual ouster, though none be proven; and as between tenants in common a legal presumption of ouster arises in favor of one who has been in the peaceable and exclusive possession of the profits of the land for more than 21 years, and the taking of the whole profits exclusively, is evidence from which the jury may draw the conclusion of ouster and adverse possession." Answer: I shall not affirm that in the exact language in which it is drawn. I charge you, however, gentlemen of the jury, that when one tenant in common enters upon the whole, and takes the profits and claims the whole exclusively for 21 years, the jury may presume an actual ouster, though none be proven, and as between tenants in common a legal presumption of ouster arises in favor of one who has been in the peaceable and exclusive possession of the profits of the land for more than 21 years, and the taking of the whole profits exclusively is evidence from which a jury may draw the conclusion of ouster and adverse possession, and, as thus answered, is, I believe, substantially what I have already said.

Plaintiff presented these points:

"(1) Under all the evidence in this case the verdict must be for the plaintiffs." Answer: Refused without reading.

"(3) The words, 'provided, however, that if my said wife should again marry, then I give and devise the property before mentioned to my son, Henry V. Simpson, and his heirs, forever,' operated as a limitation, and not as a condition; and (a) the widow, Sarah Ann Simpson, acquired a life estate under the will, subject to be sooner determined upon her remarriage, with (b) a vested remainder in Henry V. Simpson, the son; and (c) it matters not, for the purpose of the disposition of this case, whether the widow took an estate for life as to the whole, with vested remainder in Henry, or whether the widow took an estate for life as to the undivided one-half, with vested remainder in Henry as to the said undivided one-half, with Henry the owner in fee of the other undivided one-half as an executed trust. The result is the same." Answer: The third point is refused without reading.

"(5) The statute of limitations did not begin to run in this case until the death of the life tenant, Sarah Ann Simpson, which occurred on December 26, 1891, and the defendant's plea thereof in bar of this action will not avail." Answer: Refused without reading.

"(6) The possession of Sarah A. Simpson was the possession of the other tenant in common, and the plaintiffs in this suit will not be barred from sustaining this suit by reason of the suit not having been brought within 21 years from the time of the sheriff's sale to J. B. Reed, but the statute would only run from the time of the death of Sarah A. Simpson, the life tenant." Answer: Refused without reading.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

John F. Schaffer and S. P. Wolverton, for appellants. Geo. B. Reimensnyder and W. J. Sanders, for appellee.

FELL, J. The first question presented by this appeal is what estate Sarah Ann Simpson took under the following clause of her husband's will: "I give and devise unto my beloved wife, Sarah Ann, and to my son, Henry V. Simpson, all my property, both real, personal, and mixed, to be held for herself and in trust for my said son; provided, however, that if my said wife should again marry then I give and devise the property beforementioned to my son, Henry V. Simpson, and his heirs, forever, and the trust thereby created in favor of my son shall after such marriage be null and void." The testator's widow did not marry again, and was in possession of the real estate until her death in 1891, 32 years after the death of her husband. At the trial of an action of ejectment brought by the grantees of a purchaser at a sheriff's sale of the son's interest, the jury were instructed that Sarah Ann Simpson took a defeasible fee-simple estate in the undivided one-half of the real estate, which became an absolute fee simple. This instruction was correct. No intention is disclosed to give a life estate merely, and the words used are apt words for the creation of an estate upon condition. There was no limitation over in the event of the widow not remarrying, and an intestacy as to one-half would result in that event, if the fee was not in her. The devise was of the property itself. It vested immediately, and was in fee, defeasible on the happening of an event which did not happen. In principle the case is not distinguished from Redding v. Rice, 171 Pa. 301, 33 Atl. 330.

The second question is whether the statute of limitations defeated a recovery of the one-half interest of the son. The testator died in 1859. The trust as to the son was a dry trust. His whole interest was sold by the sheriff to the plaintiff's grantors in 1880, 25 years before this action was commenced. During this period of time there was no assertion of title by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title, and the property was in the exclusive possession, first of the widow of the testator until her death in 1891, and then in his son until he was adjudged a lunatic, and afterwards in his committee, who exercised all the rights of exclusive ownership. They occupied or rented the property, received the rents and profits, and appropriated them to their own use, paid the taxes, and made alterations and repairs. The court left it to the jury to determine whether these acts were so inconsistent with joint ownership as to give rise to and sustain an inference of ouster. The instruction on the subject was as follows:

"* * * When one tenant in common enters upon the whole, and takes the profits and claims the whole exclusively for 21 years, the jury may presume an actual ouster, though none be proven, and as between tenants in common a legal presumption of ouster arises in favor of one who has been in the peaceable and exclusive possession of the profits of the land for 21 years, and the taking of the whole profits exclusively is evidence from which a jury may draw the conclusion of ouster and adverse possession." The possession of one tenant in common is prima facie the possession of his co-tenant also, and the mere reception of profits, payment of taxes, and making repairs, without more, will not sustain a claim of ouster or adverse possession. Bolton v. Hamilton, 2 Watts & S. 294, 37 Am. Dec. 509. The claim of exclusive right may be established by proof that one tenant in common has entered on the whole land, and taken possession and occupied the whole, claiming the profits as his own, for 21 years, without acknowledging the claim of his co-tenant. Law v. Patterson, 1 Watts & S. 184. It was said in Fredrick v. Gray, 10 Serg. & R. 182, that where one tenant in common enters on and takes the profits of the whole under an exclusive claim for 21 years, the jury ought to presume an actual ouster, though none be proved. The rule is thus stated in the opinion in Susquehanna, etc., R. R. & Coal Co. v. Quick, 61 Pa. 328. "It is therefore certainly the law that open, notorious, and uninterrupted possession of the whole by a tenant in common for more than 21 years, claiming the whole land as his own, and taking the whole profits exclusively to himself is evidence from which a jury may draw the conclusion of an ouster and an adverse possession.

The distinction is that it does not afford a legal presumption, which would entitle the court to withdraw the question from the jury, and instruct them that they must infer an ouster and adverse possession, if not successfully rebutted."

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

JERMYN et al. v. CITY OF SCRANTON et al.
(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—BONDED INDEBTEDNESS—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

Act March 7, 1901 (P. L. 40), repeals Act June 14, 1887, § 24 (P. L. 398), as amended by Act Feb. 13, 1895, § 1 (P. L. 13), relating to an increase of the bonded indebtedness of cities of the second class and authorizing an election.

2. SAME—ISSUE OF BONDS—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE.

The fact that an ordinance of a city of the second class providing for an issue of bonds does not provide for the payment of the first semi-annual installment of interest is immaterial, where it contains a sufficient levy for the payment of the bonds and interest.

3. SAME—TIME FOR PAYMENT.

Under Act March 7, 1901 (P. L. 40), as amended by Act June 20, 1901 (P. L. 586), relating to the issue of bonds by cities of the second class, bonds for the creation of new debts or for payment of contemplated improvements are payable annually; funding bonds, payable in 5 to 30 years.

4. SAME—TAXATION—CLASSIFICATION OF REAL ESTATE.

Cities of the second class may classify real estate for purposes of taxation, and levy a different rate on each class of property.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Lackawanna County.

Bill by Joseph J. Jermy and others against the city of Scranton and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Edwards, P. J., in the court below:

"The city of Scranton on August 10, 1904, passed two ordinances; one authorizing the issue of bonds in the sum of $38,000 for the purpose of paying the amount assessed against the city for the construction of certain sewers, and the other authorizing the issue of bonds in the sum of $100,000 to provide for the construction of a building to be used as police and fire headquarters, and for other purposes designated in the ordinance. Both ordinances provide for the creation of a sinking fund for the redemption of the bonds, as required by law. Thereupon the city proceeded to print the bonds and to advertise for bids for the purchase of the same. The plaintiffs, claiming that the said bond issues were not authorized under the law, filed their bill of complaint in the present case, and they now pray for an injunction to restrain the city authorities from executing and delivering the bonds specified in the ordinances aforementioned. There are no facts in dispute. Counsel on both sides agree that the case shall be heard and finally disposed of on bill and answer; the only questions raised being matters of law.

"The said issues of bonds are attacked on four grounds, which, in brief, are as follows: (1) They are contrary to the provisions of the first section of the act of February 13, 1895 (P. L. 13), providing that there shall be no increase in the interest-bearing indebtedness of a city of the second class without a vote of the electors. (2) The ordinances authorizing the issue of the bonds do not provide for the semiannual interest falling due January 1, 1905. (3) The provisions in said ordinance, levying three different rates on the three several classifications of real estate as returned by the city assessors, are in conflict with sections 1 and 10, art. 9, of the Constitution. (4) The bond issues offend against the provisions of paragraph 6, § 3, art. 19, of the act of March 7, 1901 (P. L. 40), as amended by the act of June 20, 1901 (P. L. 586). The foregoing grounds of attack are not in the exact order in which they are found in plaintiffs' bill, but they are given by me in the order in which I intend to discuss them.

"1. The act of February 13, 1895 (section 1; P. L. 13): Section 1 of this act of assembly amends section 24 of the act of June 14, 1887 (P. L. 398). The latter section is as follows: 'Any increase of interest-bearing bonded indebtedness of cities of the second class is hereby prohibited, unless the same shall be approved by an affirmative vote of the majority of the qualified electors voting thereat at an election provided for by ordinance of councils.' The Legislature of 1895, having unusual regard for correct grammatical expression, by amendment changed one word in the section quoted, using 'thereon,' instead of 'thereat.' This was the only change made by the amendment. The change was unnecessary, because no court, in construing this section, would permit the error of using one word instead of the other to defeat the plain meaning of the legislative enactment. The fourth section of the schedule contained in the act of March 7, 1901 (P. L. 48), specifically repeals the whole of the act of 1887, excepting sections 1 and 2, thus wiping out section 24 above quoted. Counsel for plaintiffs argues that the act of 1895 (section 1) is still in force, and that therefore no city of the second class can increase its bonded indebtedness in any amount without a vote of the people. We can hardly think that counsel is serious in maintaining this contention. It appears very clear that the only effect of the amendment in the act of 1895 (section 1) was to read into the twenty-fourth section of the act of 1887 the word 'thereon,' instead of 'thereat.' In this particular instance the latter section falls with the repeal of the former. We also call attention to paragraph 5, § 3, art. 19, of the act of 1901, relating to the corporate powers of cities of the second class. The paragraph reads thus: 'To borrow money on the credit of the city, and to pledge the credit and revenues thereof for the payment of the same, to an amount not exceeding two per centum upon the assessed value of the taxable property in said city, and with the consent of the people of the said city, obtained at an election held under the provisions of the Constitution and the general laws of this commonwealth, to increase the indebtedness of such city to an amount not exceeding in the aggregate, seven per centum upon the assessed valuation of the taxable property therein.' In view of the power expressly given by this paragraph to cities of the second class to pledge the credit of the city up to 2 per cent. of the assessed valuation without a vote of the people, what becomes of section 1 of the act of 1895? Both provisions cannot stand. They are absolutely irreconcilable. One or the other must give way, and according to a well-understood rule of construction the latter enactment must prevail. We need not enlarge on this point.

"2. The payment of the interest falling due January 1, 1905: It is claimed that there is no provision for the payment of the interest which falls due on January 1, 1905. Section 8 of the ordinance levies a tax for the year 1905 and every year thereafter to pay the bonds and interest. Counsel for plaintiffs says that the taxes, as a matter of fact, are not collected until late in the year, and that there will be no money in the treasury to pay the first semiannual installment of interest. This is undoubtedly true; but it is equally true that the city has many lawful ways for providing money for temporary purposes. The main question is: Has the city done what the law requires it to do in making provisions for the payment of the bonds and interest? Has it made a levy sufficient for the purpose? The eighth section of the ordinance answers these questions affirmatively. The ordinance has been carefully drawn, and meets the requirements of the law in such cases; but the city is not so helpless in this matter as counsel would have us believe. The interest, even for the whole of the year 1905, may be paid out of the premium bid on the sale of the bonds. We know of no reason why this cannot be done. The amendment to the answer filed by agreement shows that the total premiums exceed one year's interest. Regardless of the particular source from which the city may draw the money to pay the first semiannual interest, it is a sufficient answer to plaintiffs' contention on this point that the city has made all the provisions demanded by law for the payment of all the bonds and interest. It could do no more. We consider this objection as highly technical.

"3. Want of uniformity in the rate of levy: This objection is of a more substantial character than those we have already discussed. The Constitution provides that all taxes shall be uniform on the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax. Counsel for plaintiffs admits the right of the Legislature to classify real estate for purposes of taxation, but denies the right of a municipality to levy a different rate on each class of property. In other words, he admits the principle, but denies the propriety of applying it so as to produce practical results. Unless there is a different rate of levy on the several classes of property, why should properties be classified at all? The point of objection, as we understand it, is that one man pays more than another on the same valuation. In the present case, for instance, the ordinance levies .142 on each dollar of valuation on first class property, .0946 on second class property, and .071 on third class property. All properties in cities of the second class being assessed at their actual value, the result is that three men each owning property worth, say, $5,000, the properties being in each of the several classes, do not pay the same amount of tax on the same valuation. This is undoubtedly true, and such is the result of the practical operation of the rule; but unless some such result is secured it is apparent that the classification of real estate for purposes of taxation is useless. If all properties are assessed at their actual value, and if the same rate should be levied on all properties, why not include all properties in the one class? It is too late in the day in Pennsylvania to question the power of the Legislature to classify subjects of taxation on broad lines and within certain limitations. The reasons for such classification, based upon imperious necessity, are so numerous, and have been so frequently discussed by the higher courts, that it is useless to refer to them now. We shall cite only one case to show that the question before us is definitely and authoritatively settled. Commonwealth v. Delaware Div. Canal Co., 123 Pa. 594, 16 Atl. 584, 2 L. R. A. 798. It is decided that the power to impose taxes for the support of the government, with the power of classification, still belonging to the Legislature under the new Constitution. The selection of the subjects thereof, their classification, and the methods of collection to be provided are matters purely legislative. The power to classify being given, all that is then required by the Constitution is that taxes shall be uniform upon the members of a class, and it is the uniformity of taxation, according to the classification made, which is the matter to be determined by the court.

"The act of 1901, as amended in the same year (see P. L. 586, on page 594), has the following provision: 'To provide for the issuing of bonds; for the application of bonds already issued, for the purpose of funding any and all indebtedness, now existing or hereafter created, of the city, now due or to become due: Provided, that the said bonds shall be payable in not less than five years and not more than thirty years from the date of their issue, and that the same shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding six per centum per annum, with interest coupons attached, payable annually or semiannually, and the said bonds shall not be sold or exchanged for less than their par value and accrued interest.' This provision undoubtedly refers to funding bonds or bonds issued to take up or pay an existing indebtedness. The phrase 'indebtedness hereafter created' must be taken to mean that such indebtedness, if funded by the issue of bonds, is in the same class, and all such bonds should be payable in not less than 5 nor more than 30 years. It is conceded that the bonds in question in the present case are not funding bonds. They are issued for the purpose of providing money for improvements yet to be made. We hold, therefore, that the provision above quoted does not authorize the issuing of bonds payable annually. Where, then, do we find the authority for the issuing of bonds payable annually? The only place it can be found is in article 11, Act 1901 (on page 31), relating to the 'Sinking Fund Commission,' which states that, whenever any new bonds shall be issued by any of said cities, they shall be made payable in annual installments equal to the tax levied therefor, and shall be made payable annually from the funds so provided. It is difficult to escape the effect of the comprehensive and general character of this provision relating to the issue of 'any new bonds.' Counsel for plaintiffs claims that the place of this provision in the article pertaining to the sinking fund commission means that the 'new bonds' referred to are those bonds issued by the city to take up maturing bonds. We do not know what might have been in the mind of the person who drafted article 11, but we do know that we must give effect to the language used. The language is so plain and unambiguous that we cannot change it by any method of interpretation. We think the criticism is proper that the provision belongs logically to some other part of the act of 1901, but we must take this act of assembly as we find it, and give it such a construction that the whole may stand, if possible. If it was the intention of the Legislature to say that any new bonds issued by cities of the second class shall be payable annually, when issued for the purpose of taking up or funding maturing bonds, it should have said so. We have scanned every word and line of article 11, and can find no such intention expressed. Combining the two provisions in the act of 1901, in relation to the issue of bonds, we read them thus: 'Whenever any new bonds shall be issued by any of said cities they shall be made payable in annual installments'; but, 'bonds issued for the purpose of funding any and all indebtedness now existing or hereafter created * * * shall be payable in not less than five years nor more than thirty years.' This, in our opinion, is the present state of legislation relating to the issue of bonds by cities of the second class. Bonds to provide means for contemplated improvements, or for the creation of a new indebtedness, are payable annually. Funding bonds are payable in from 5 to 30 years. It is conceded in this case that the ordinance was regularly adopted.

"Now, October 31, 1904, this case having been heard on bill and answer, and having been argued by counsel, it is adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs' bill be dismissed, at their cost."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

G. M. Watson, for appellants. David J. Davis, City Sol., for appellees.

PER CURIAM. Decree affirmed, on the opinion of the court below. Cost to be paid by appellant.

MILLER v. LEWISTOWN ELECTRIC LIGHT, HEAT & POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

1. ELECTRICITY—NEGLIGENCE OF LIGHT COMPANY.

Where defendant, an electric light company, suspended an arc light at the intersection of several streets, and one of its employes lowered the lamp and left it under the charge of a boy, and a sleigh driven around the corner struck the wires of the lamp, which then struck plaintiff, who was crossing the street, the question of the negligence of the light company was for the jury.

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether a pedestrian was negligent in attempting to cross a street at a place other than the regular crossing is for the jury, in an action for injury caused by a live electric wire.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Mifflin County.

Action by Henry W. Miller, to use of Sarah J. Miller, against the Lewistown Electric Light, Heat & Power Company. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

At the trial it appeared that plaintiff was seriously injured by contact with electric light wires belonging to the defendant company. At a point in the borough of Lewistown where several streets intersected, the defendant maintained an arc light, which on the evening in question had been lowered for repairs. An employe of the company, after lowering the light, left it in charge of a boy while he went to secure a file. During his absence a one-horse sleigh dashed around a corner and struck the wires attached to the lamp. The testimony tended to show that Miller, while attempting to cross one of the streets at a point other than the regular crossing, was struck by the wires and sustained injuries, from which he died after the present suit was instituted.

Defendant presented the following points:

"(4) If the jury believe that it is the custom to lower arc lamps at night on public highways for the purpose of making them operate, and that in this case the lamp, when lowered, was left in charge of the boy, to notify the public of possible danger in the short and necessary absence of defendant's employe, then their verdict must be for the defendant." Answer: This point is denied. The question as to whether leaving the light in charge of the boy was negligence or not is for you to determine, and not for the court; and an electric light company could not have a custom, unless the custom had been established by many long years, so as to become universal and known by all persons, to negligently lower lights at night.

"(6) From all the evidence in the case the verdict must be for the defendant." Answer: This point is denied. It is for you to say what your verdict will be, not for the court.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

A. Reed Hayes, for appellant. W. W. Uttley, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Whether the defendant's conduct in lowering the lamp, or leaving it in charge of a boy, while the wires were down, was negligent, was a question for the jury. There could be no custom of the defendant which would excuse it for exposing the public to what the jury should find was unnecessary danger.

The question of proximate cause was also for the jury. The fact that the horse was going at a rapid pace was not so unprecedented that the jury might not fairly find that the defendant was bound to anticipate and look out for it, and that the chain of events was continuous up to the injury to plaintiff.

As to the plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence, a pedestrian is not necessarily negligent if he leaves the sidewalk and crosses the street at other than the regular crossings. In so doing he may encounter risks that he would not on the sidewalk; but, unless they are manifest, it is for the jury, not the court, to say that his act was negligent.

Judgment affirmed.

LAMB v. ZUNDELL.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Orange. Nov. 25, 1905.)

1. ATTACHMENT—LEVIES—SALE OF PROPERTY—RECOVERY OF PRICE.

Where a deputy sheriff, having levied on certain iron, permitted the defendant in attachment to sell the same, on the purchaser's agreement to pay the price to such officer, the surrender of the officer's special property in the iron was a sufficient consideration for the purchaser's promise to pay, entitling the officer to recover against the purchaser, though his writs had been satisfied out of other property.

2. PLEADING—AMENDMENT TO CONFORM TO PROOF.

In a suit by an officer to recover the purchase price of property levied on, the case having been referred by the parties, it was immaterial that general assumpsit would not lie; the declaration being adaptable by amendment to the facts found.

3. GARNISHMENT—LIABILITY OF TRUSTEE—PLEADING—GENERAL ISSUE.

Plaintiff, having levied on certain scrap iron, permitted it to be sold, on the purchaser's agreement to pay the price to plaintiff. After having made a partial payment, the purchaser was garnished as trustee of the attachment defendant, and, having been adjudged trustee on default, paid the judgment. Held that, plaintiff's writs having been satisfied out of other property, plaintiff, in an action against the purchaser for the price of the iron, was the representative of the attachment defendant, within V. S. 1374, discharging a trustee from demand by the defendant for credits paid by force of a trustee judgment, and allowing him, as against the defendant or his representative, to plead such special matter in discharge under the general issue.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, WATSON, and HASELTON, JJ.

David S. Conant, for plaintiff. C. H. Williams, for defendant.

ROWELL, C. J. The plaintiff, as deputy sheriff, had several writs in his hands against the Bradford Paper Company in favor of its creditors, whereon he attached certain real estate and some scrap iron as the property of the company. Thereafter, and while the attachments were in force, the defendant, to the knowledge and with the acquiescence of the plaintiff, purchased the iron of one Homer, a member of said company, and at the same time it was understood and agreed by the plaintiff, the defendant, and Homer that the money should be paid to the plaintiff, and the defendant then and there agreed to pay it to him, and subsequently did pay to him a considerable part of it, and would have paid the rest had he not been adjudged trustee in a suit against the company and paid the judgment. It appears that the claims of all the attaching creditors whose writs the plaintiff served were fully paid and satisfied by execution sales of the real estate attached, so that the iron was thereby released from the attachments; and this we understand was before this suit was brought.

The defendant objects that the plaintiff cannot recover because the legal right is not in him. But at the request of the defendant, implied, if not expressed, the plaintiff conferred a benefit upon the defendant by allowing him to purchase and have the iron, in which the plaintiff had a special property as attaching officer, and that benefit was a sufficient consideration for the defendant's promise, which was induced thereby, and made to the plaintiff and no one else. But the defendant says that general assumpsit will not lie. It is immaterial whether it will or not, for if not, the declaration is adaptable by amendment to the facts found, without changing the nature of the action, the case having been referred by the parties, and thereby the cause of action.

The defendant did not appear and disclose when he was trustee, but was defaulted and adjudged trustee and paid the judgment, and now seeks to avail himself of that payment under the general issue, to which the plaintiff objects that the defendant should have disclosed, and have pleaded the payment specially. But as the claims of the attaching creditors have been fully paid and satisfied, the plaintiff is suing solely for the benefit of the defendant in the trustee suit, which is the paper company, and to which alone he is accountable for all he recovers here; and so he stands as its representative within the meaning of V. S. 1374, which discharges a trustee from demands by the defendant for credits paid by force of a trustee judgment, and allows him when afterwards sued therefor by the defendant or his representative, to give evidence under the general issue of the special matter in discharge.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for the plaintiff for $18.38, with interest thereon from the commencement of the suit.

JENNETT v. PATTEN.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Chittenden. Sept. 30, 1905.)

1. WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION UNDER STATUTE—CONCLUSIVENESS OF TESTIMONY GIVEN.

Under V. S. 1246, providing that a party to a civil action may compel an adverse party to testify as a witness in his behalf, and may examine him under the rules applicable to the cross-examination of witnesses, plaintiff may call defendant as his first witness and examine him, and may then call and examine other witnesses and show by them what actually took place, although their testimony tends to contradict defendant's testimony, and the court cannot go behind the record and determine the existence of a deliberate plan on plaintiff's part to destroy the credit to be given defendant's testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 1269.]

2. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—MISCONDUCT OF JURORS—CONCEALMENT FROM COURT.

Misconduct of defendant and jurors in conversing about the case at defendant's house on the occasion of an adjournment during the trial is not available to defendant as ground for setting aside the verdict, where he did not call the attention of the court or of his counsel to the circumstance until after the rendition of verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 110.]

Exceptions from Chittenden County Court; Powers, Judge.

Action by Charles Jennett against Henry Patten. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepted. Affirmed.

Argued before POWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, and HASELTON, JJ.

J. J. Enright and R. E. Brown, for plaintiff. Palmer, Foster & Russell, for defendant.

TYLER, J. This action is trespass for an assault and battery. Pleas, not guilty and self-defense. Verdict for the plaintiff. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that he and the defendant met in a barn, where they had a right to be, and that words passed between them, resulting, as the plaintiff claimed, in the defendant's assaulting him. The defendant claimed that he acted in self-defense.

The exceptions state that the plaintiff called the defendant as his first witness and examined him on all points as fully as he would have been allowed to do in cross-examination, if he had been called as a witness in his own behalf. The plaintiff and witnesses called by him were then allowed to testify about the assault, and so far as their testimony tended to contradict the defendant's testimony upon the subjects upon which he had testified it was received under his objection and exception. This evidence was offered and admitted for the purpose of showing what actually took place between the parties, and not to impeach the defendant, although it contradicted the testimony given by him on material points. The right of one party to call the adverse party as a witness and cross-examine him is given by V. S. 1246, which is: "A party to a civil action or proceeding at law or in equity may compel an adverse party * * * to testify as a witness in his behalf, in the same manner and subject to the same rules as other witnesses. But the party so called to testify may be examined by the opposite party under the rules applicable to the cross-examination of witnesses." We cannot go behind the record and find, what the defendant claims, that there was "a deliberate plan made by the plaintiff to disparage, destroy, and render useless the credit to be given to the defendant's testimony." It appears that the plaintiff's daughter and hired boy were the only witnesses of the affray, and they were excluded from the courtroom while the defendant testified. Afterwards these witnesses and the plaintiff himself gave their versions of the occurrence as they claimed to have seen it. In Cox v. Eayres, 55 Vt., on page 28, 45 Am. Rep. 583, it is said: "It is also well settled that a party is not bound by the testimony of his own witness, but is at liberty to show that facts relevant to the issue are otherwise than as he has stated them to be, although the effect of such showing may be to discredit the witness." Wigmore on Ev. § 908, says: "It has been noted (section 897) that a chief reason for the victory of the newer notion was the perception that without it one could not prove the facts of his case, if the first witness called were to testify untruly. From this point of view the discrediting of the witness is regarded as incidental only (because inevitable) to this other and necessary right." It does not appear that the plaintiff's evidence was introduced for the purpose of discrediting the defendant, nor that the plaintiff exceeded his right under the statute. Therefore this exception is not sustained.

After the testimony and arguments were closed, and before the charge was given to the jury, two jurors, on their way to their homes, on Saturday afternoon, called at the defendant's house and at their request were by him shown certain objects and localities which had been testified about in the trial and were material to the issue. They also asked him certain questions, which he answered. After verdict the defendant moved to have the verdict set aside by reason of this misconduct of the jurors, and testimony was taken in support of and in opposition to the motion. It was found that the defendant was in court on Monday and heard the charge of the court, and did not make these facts known to the court nor to his counsel until after the verdict was rendered, hoping, as the court found, "that he would derive an advantage in the result of his case by reason of the information obtained by said jurors as aforesaid." It is unnecessary to comment upon the misconduct of the defendant, or that of the two jurors in violation of their oath and of the emphatic instructions of the court given them on Saturday to hear nothing said about the case nor to receive any information concerning it during the recess. It is sufficient to say that the defendant's omission to call the court's attention to these facts brought the case within the settled rule laid down in Whitcher v. Peacham, 52 Vt. 242. See, also, Scott v. Moore, 41 Vt. 205, 98 Am. Dec. 581; Badger v. State, 69 Vt. 217, 37 Atl. 286; McKinstry v. Collins, 74 Vt. 147, 52 Atl. 438.

Judgment affirmed.

FRENCH v. WHITE.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Washington.
Oct. 25, 1905.)

1. BANKRUPTCY—STOCK IN CORPORATION—PLEDGE—FAILURE TO TRANSFER—REQUISITES.

A debtor deposited with his creditor certificates of stock as collateral. The certificates were neither assigned in writing nor was any transfer made on the books of the corporation. No notice was given to the corporation that the certificates were so deposited, but subsequently an officer was incidentally told of it. Stock was transferable only on the books of the corporation by a surrender of the certificate. Held, that there was no transfer of the stock, either at common law or under V. S. 3689, providing that transfers must be by assignment and delivery, with notice to the corporation, but the same was subject to levy and sale in proceedings by another creditor, and on the bankruptcy of the debtor the stock passed to his trustee, under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 70, 30 Stat. 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8451], providing that the trustee of the bankrupt shall be vested with the title of the bankrupt in property subject to levy and sale against him.

2. JUDGMENT—PROCESS—ATTACHMENT—PERSONAL SERVICE.

Where, in an attachment suit against a nonresident, there was no service on the debtor and no appearance by him, the suit was in effect one in rem, and any personal judgment was void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, § 33.]

3. SAME—PROPERTY IN TRUSTEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

Property which vests in the trustee of a bankrupt under the federal bankruptcy law is not subject to attachment in a state court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 6, Cent. Dig. Bankruptcy, § 238.]

4. AUDITA QUERELA—JUDGMENTS SUBJECT TO REVIEW.

Where a court had no jurisdiction and the judgment rendered is void, audita querela to vacate the judgment and execution thereon is unnecessary.

Exceptions from Washington County Court; Rowell, Judge.

Audita querela to set aside a judgment and execution thereon by William A. French against Stillman C. White. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepts. Reversed.

Argued before TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Hunton & Stickney, for plaintiff. George W. Wing and Gordon & Jackson, for defendant.

WATSON, J. On the 22d day of April, 1899, Henry S. Mackay was adjudged a bankrupt under the United States bankruptcy laws, before the District Court of the United States in the District of Massachusetts, and the plaintiff was appointed sole trustee of the bankruptcy estate. At that time Mackay was the owner of 220 shares of the capital stock of the Vermont Granite Company, represented by two certificates issued to him—one numbered 25 for 90 shares, and one numbered 26 for 130 shares. The Vermont Granite Company is a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and has its principal office and place of business at the city of Barre. Mackay was the owner of this stock as early as in October, 1893, but how much earlier does not appear. After he became the owner of it, he gave to the defendant on the day of their date two promissory notes—one for $6,500, at one year's date, with interest annually, and one for $4,500, at eight months' date, with like interest. At the time of the execution and delivery of these notes Mackay "deposited" with the defendant the certificates of stock—the one for 130 shares as collateral security for the payment of the larger note, and the one for 90 shares as collateral security for the payment of the smaller note. The certificates were not assigned in writing nor otherwise than as above stated. Nor was any memorandum of transfer or deposit made on any books of the company. Neither Mackay nor the defendant ever gave or procured to be given any notice to the company that the certificates were so "deposited"; but in October, 1893, the then treasurer and secretary of the company was incidentally told of it by a person who happened to know the fact. Stock in the company was and is transferable only on the books of the company by the holder or his attorney on the surrender of the certificate. The transfer of the certificates to the defendant was by delivery only. No assignment of them was made.

To render a transfer of shares of stock as collateral security valid against subsequent attaching creditors of the owner, under the statute, the transfer must be "by assignment and delivery," with notice to the clerk, cashier, or treasurer of the corporation, and a memorandum thereof made upon its stock ledger. V. S. 3689. Aside from the statute, without a written transfer of some kind sufficient to pass the legal title, with a transfer on the books of the corporation, or accompanied with power to make such a transfer, as well as a delivery of the certificate, there is no such delivery of the possession of the property as is essential to the validity of a pledge of corporate stock. Jones on Pledges, §§ 151, 152. See Samson v. Rouse, 72 Vt. 422, 48 Atl. 666, and White River Savings Bank v. Capitol Savings Bank and Trust Co., 77 Vt. 123, 59 Atl. 197. Thus under the well-known rules of the common law the word "assignment," used in connection with such pledges, means a written transfer, and it must be understood in the statute above referred to in the same sense in which it is understood at common law. 9 Bac. Abr. (Bouvier Ed.) 238. Since there was no written transfer of the stock in question, there was no pledge either at common law or under the statute, and the question of notice to the corporation is immaterial. It follows that prior to the filing of the petition in the proceedings in bankruptcy the 220 shares of stock might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against Mackay; and under the provisions of the bankrupt law, when the plaintiff was appointed trustee, the title to this stock vested in him by relation at the date of the commencement of the proceedings. Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 70; 30 Stat. 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3451]; In re Appel, 103 Fed. 931, 4 Am. Bankr. Rep. 722.

Some months after the title to the property was so vested in the trustee, the defendant sued out his writ of attachment against the bankrupt, returnable before the county court within and for the county of Washington, in this state, therein commanding that the goods and chattels of the bankrupt be attached to the value of $20,000. The action was general assumpsit and founded on the two promissory notes before described. The writ was in form served by attaching as the property of the bankrupt the said 220 shares of stock. The bankrupt was a nonresident of this state, and at most was given only constructive notice of the suit and attachment. The trustee in bankruptcy was also a nonresident. Neither of them had any notice in fact or knowledge of the suit or any of the proceedings therein. An order for notice to the bankrupt by publication was made, but it is contended that the requirements of the statute in this respect were not complied with. In the view we take of the case before us, however, that question is immaterial and not further noticed. Judgment was rendered in the former case against the bankrupt by default for the sum of $17,698.12 and costs. Execution was issued, and the property attached was advertised for sale thereon. Pending the notice for sale the present suit was brought in the name of the trustee in bankruptcy to vacate the judgment and execution. Since in that action there was no service of process upon the bankrupt and no appearance by him, the case was in its essential nature a proceeding in rem, the only effect of which could be to subject the property attached to the payment of the debt found due to the plaintiff on which the action was founded. As a personal judgment, the judgment rendered was void. Indeed, when regularly obtained, such a judgment is without any binding force, except as to the property attached. Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 65; National Bank v. Peabody & Co., 55 Vt. 492, 45 Am. Rep. 632.

At the time of the commencement of the former case, could the property in question be attached by process from the state court? This is an important question, and, if held in the negative, one that is decisive of the present case. In Mueller v. Nugent, 184 U. S. 1, 22 Sup. Ct. 269, 46 L. Ed. 405, the court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, said: "It is as true of the present law as it was of that of 1867 that the filing of the petition is a caveat to all the world, and in effect an attachment and injunction (International Bank v. Sherman, 101 U. S. 407, 25 L. Ed. 867), and on adjudication title to the bank-rupt's property became vested in the trustee (sections 70, 21c [Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 565, 552, U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3451, 3430]), with actual or constructive possession, and placed in the custody of the bankruptcy court." Since the stock in question, as a part of the bankrupt estate, was in the custody of the federal court, it could not be taken out of that custody by any process from a state court. Property cannot be constructively, any more than actually, in two places at the same time. To give a court jurisdiction in a proceeding in rem, there must be a valid seizure and an actual control of the res under the process therefrom. The attempt to seize the property by attachment was a nullity, and gave the state court no jurisdiction over it. In Stoughton v. Mott, 13 Vt. 175, the action was trespass for taking and carrying away the plaintiff's sloop and a quantity of military stores, arms, etc. After a trial was had on the general issue, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, the suit was dismissed on defendant's motion for want of jurisdiction, and on exception thereto the case was heard in this court. It appeared that the defendant, an officer of the United States, seized and was holding the sloop and arms and munitions of war under an act of Congress, as intended to be employed by the owners thereof in carrying on military operations within the province of Lower Canada, a country with which the United States was at peace. Royce, J., delivered the opinion of the court: "If the action is of a character which necessarily goes to deplete the possession, under the seizure, it cannot be sustained. Such was the case of Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat. 1, 4 L. Ed. 169, being replevin, which could not be instituted to effect without retaking the property from the seizing officer. But if the action is an ordinary one, seeking merely to recover damages, there would seem to be nothing in principle to forbid the pendency of both suits at the same time." The doctrine there laid down is a principle thoroughly established in law. In Buck v. Colbath, 8 Wall. 334, 18 L. Ed. 257, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller, said: It is "a principle which is essential to the dignity and just authority of every court, and to the comity which should regulate the relations between all courts of concurrent jurisdiction. That principle is that, whenever property has been seized by an officer of the court by virtue of its process, the property is to be considered as in the custody of the court and under its control for the time being, and that no other court has a right to interfere with that possession, unless it be some court which may have a direct supervisory control over the court whose process has first taken possession, or some superior jurisdiction in the premises." See, also, Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 583, 15 L. Ed. 1023; Covell v. Heyman, 111 U. S. 176, 4 Sup. Ct. 355, 28 L. Ed.

It follows that the state court acquired no jurisdiction of the res in the former case, and that the attempted attachment of the property and all subsequent proceedings in that action are void. This being so, the property is not affected thereby, and there is no necessity for this action of audita querela to vacate the judgment and execution. The question whether such an action can be maintained in the name of a trustee in bankruptcy in any other circumstances, where the judgment sought to be vacated was rendered against the bankrupt, is not considered.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for defendant to recover his costs.

STATE v. KRINSKI.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Rutland. Nov. 8, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—INTOXICATING LIQUOR ILLEGALLY SEIZED.

On a prosecution for keeping for sale intoxicating liquors without a license, it was proper to admit in evidence liquors which had been seized, irrespective of the legality of the warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 877.]

2. SAME.

On a prosecution for keeping for sale intoxicating liquors without a license, it was not error to admit evidence as to the finding of Jamaica ginger, although evidence had already been introduced regarding the finding of alcohol, as the state was not bound to confine its evidence to the liquor for which it claimed a conviction.

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—EVIDENCE—INCrimINATING CIRCUMSTANCES.

On a prosecution for keeping for sale intoxicating liquors without a license, it was proper to permit the state to show that at the time of the search two men, under the influence of liquor, were wrangling over a bottle, though it further appeared that the bottle only contained soda water.

4. SAME.

On a prosecution for keeping for sale intoxicating liquors without a license, it appeared that bottles purporting to contain Jamaica ginger found on the premises were flask-shaped, and the state chemist testified that there was a standard form of bottles put in the glass manufacturers' catalogues for putting up medicinal Jamaica ginger, and that he had never seen it put up in bottles such as those in evidence, and he also testified that he never saw such a bottle used in a proper pharmacy. Held, that the testimony had a legitimate tendency to sustain the charge.

5. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

On a prosecution for keeping for sale intoxicating liquors without a license, the court instructed that if a preparation found on the premises was a beverage "capable of producing intoxication, and may be used for that purpose, then it is prohibited." The court in its charge first took up the question whether the preparation was a beverage within the meaning of the law, and said that the law did not mean that it must be classed among liquors that are ordinarily used as beverages, but that it was sufficient if the liquid was one which can be used so practically, and further stated that the important question was whether the preparation was kept for the purpose of sale, with intent to sell it as a beverage. Held, that defendant was not harmed by the quoted language, as the evident meaning of the entire charge was that a preparation may in some circumstances be classed with intoxicating liquor, although not ordinarily used as a beverage.

6. SAME—LIQUORS PROHIBITED.

The act of 1902 does not exclude from the term "intoxicating liquor" medicinal preparations, fluid extracts, and toilet articles of which alcohol is the solvent principle.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 146.]

Exceptions from Rutland County Court; Tyler, Judge.

Herman Krinski was convicted of keeping and exposing for sale intoxicating liquors without a license, and he brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, J. WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

R. A. Lawrence, State's Atty., for the State. Butler & Moloney, for respondent.

MUNSON, J. The respondent objected to the production of the articles found in his building, and testimony relating thereto, on the ground that the search in which the articles were seized was made upon an illegal warrant. The court held the evidence admissible, without regard to the legality of the warrant; and this was correct. Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 585, 24 Sup. Ct. 872, 48 L. Ed. 575. The respondent relies upon State v. Slamon, 73 Vt. 212, 50 Atl. 1097, 87 Am. St. Rep. 711, and Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 254, 29 L. Ed. 746; but these cases, however regarded, are not controlling. There is a plain distinction between the seizure and production of papers which are not the basis of the charge and are merely of an evidentiary character, and the seizure and production of property kept for an illegal use.

The respondent objected to evidence regarding the Jamaica ginger, on the ground that evidence had already been introduced regarding the finding of some alcohol. The state was not bound to confine its evidence to the liquor for which it claimed a conviction. The finding of other liquors in the same place would bear upon the question whether the kind relied upon was kept for illegal sale.

The state was permitted to show that at the time of the search two men, under the influence of liquor, were wrangling over a bottle, during which wrangling the respondent came into the room. It appeared, further, that this bottle was seized, and afterwards found to contain only soda water. This evidence was admissible as one of the circumstances of the search and seizure, and as tending to characterize the place and business.

The bottles purporting to contain Jamaica ginger were small, flat, flask-shaped bottles, and there was evidence that the officer found nearly 300 empty bottles of the same kind in the back room of the store. Dr. Wiltse, the state chemist, testified to the differences between the article seized and the standard Jamaica ginger, and stated, further, that there was a standard form of bottle put in the glass manufacturers' catalogues for putting up the medicinal Jamaica ginger, and that he had never seen it put up in bottles of the shape of those put in evidence. He was also permitted to testify, under respondent's exception, that he never saw a bottle of the style and shape of these bottles used in a proper pharmacy, and that glass manufacturers put in their catalogues what they call a "ginger bottle" of a different shape and style. It does not appear that any question was raised as to the witness' competency to testify upon this subject, and we think the matters testified to had a legitimate tendency to sustain the charge.

The respondent submitted several requests as to what constitutes a beverage, and excepted to the court's refusal to comply therewith and to its charge upon that subject, and now argues that the court erred in saying: "If this preparation * * * is a beverage that is capable of producing intoxication, and may be used for that purpose, then it is prohibited." But this sentence must be considered in connection with other parts of the charge. The court first took up the question whether this Jamaica ginger was a beverage within the meaning of the law. And in considering this question, after referring to the evidence in respect to its being used as a beverage, the court said, in substance, that the law did not mean that it must be classed among liquors that are ordinarily used as beverages, but that it is sufficient if the liquid is one that can practically be used as a beverage and be drunk for the purpose of intoxication; that if the preparation was a beverage capable of producing intoxication, and one that could be used for that purpose, then it fell within the list of intoxicating liquors, and the sale or keeping for sale was prohibited. The evident meaning of this is that a preparation of this kind may in some circumstances be classed with intoxicating liquors, and so come within the prohibition, although not ordinarily used as a beverage; and the remainder of the charge makes it certain that it must have been so understood by the jury. For the court then proceeds to consider the purpose for which this article was kept, and states the claim of the respondent to be that he kept it to sell for medicinal purposes and not to sell as a beverage, and declares it to be the leading question in the case whether the respondent kept it with intent to sell it as a beverage, and directs the attention of the jury to the evidence upon one side and the other bearing upon that point. The court said, further, that if they found the respondent had made sales of this preparation to be used as a beverage for the purposes of intoxication, that would be a circumstance tending to show that the stock on hand was designed for the same purpose. Later the court concluded a restatement of the case in these words: "The important inquiry, I repeat, is, was it kept for the purpose of sale, with intent to sell it as a beverage?" It is clear that the respondent was not harmed by the sentence complained of, if the court was right in holding that the liquid in question could be made a beverage under the law then existing.

The respondent insists that it is the manifest purpose of the act of 1902 to exclude from the term "intoxicating liquor" all medicinal preparations, fluid extracts, and toilet articles, of which alcohol is the solvent principle, even though they contain more than one per cent. of alcohol. We think the act was not intended to effect any change of the law in this respect, and that State v. Kezer, 74 Vt. 50, 52 Atl. 116, is still applicable, as regards the purpose of the keeping or sale.

Judgment that there is no error in the proceedings, and that the respondent take nothing by his exceptions.

STATE v. COSTA.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Caledonia. Nov. 20, 1906.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—RETURN TO SEARCH WARRANT.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, the return to a search warrant was not admissible against defendant.

2. WITNESSES—REFRESHING MEMORY.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, the officer who searched defendant's premises might, in testifying, use the return to the search warrant to refresh his recollection.

3. SAME—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, defendant may cross-examine the officer who made the search from the return to the search warrant.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—SEARCH.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, it was not error for the officer who searched defendant's premises to testify that he made the search by virtue of a warrant for intoxicating liquor; the court having charged fully and correctly with regard to reasonable doubt and the presumption of innocence.

5. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESENTATION OF DEFENSE.

Where, on a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, a physician testified that the malt extract found in defendant's place of business was sold and used as a proprietary medicine to a great extent and prescribed by physicians, and the court charged that there was no question but that the malt extract was a legitimate medicine frequently prescribed by physicians and that such a preparation might be manufactured for a lawful purpose and sold as a medicine without violation of law, the tendency of defendant's evidence in regard to the medicinal character of the medicine was scientifically presented to the jury.

6. SAME—EVIDENCE—ALCOHOLIC PREPARATION—OTHER PREPARATIONS—PERCENTAGE OF ALCOHOL.

It was not error to refuse to permit the manufacturer of a malt extract found in defendant's place of business to testify as to the percentage of alcohol in the other medicines manufactured by his firm.

7. SAME—SALES BY OTHERS.

It was proper to exclude testimony of grocers and druggists that they had for a long time sold the malt extract in question openly and visibly.

8. SAME—MEDICINAL USE—USE OF OTHER PREPARATIONS.

It was not error to exclude evidence to show that the malt extract in question was used by the medical profession and by people generally for the same purposes as certain known proprietary articles and that a person could not become intoxicated by the use of such articles.

9. SAME—PERCENTAGE OF ALCOHOL—OTHER INGREDIENTS.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor for sale without authority, it was proper to permit the amount of alcohol and the other ingredients of the extract found in defendant's place of business to be shown.

10. SAME—ISSUES—USE AS BEVERAGE.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor for sale without authority, as respects extracts, tinctures, essences, and compounds having a legitimate use for medicinal or toilet purposes, the question is, not merely whether they contain more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, but also whether the articles are sold to be used as a beverage.

11. SAME—EVIDENCE—PURCHASES—STATEMENTS OF DEFENDANT.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, testimony of a witness that he bought four bottles of the malt extract found in defendant's place of business, and that defendant told the witness that he could not drink it in the store, but must go outside to do so, was properly admitted as tending to show defendant's intent.

12. CRIMINAL LAW—OTHER OFFENSES.

Evidence tending to show that defendant sold a malt extract for use as a beverage in March, 1905, tended to show that he was keeping it for sale as a beverage in June of that year.

13. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS TO PURCHASER.

Evidence tending to show that, when a bottle of the malt extract found in defendant's place of business was purchased, the purchaser asked defendant to open the bottle for him, but that defendant refused to do so, saying that the purchaser must take it away, was properly received.

14. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that, if the preparation kept by defendant was bought and used as a beverage because of the intoxicating ingredient contained in it, it was a beverage and an intoxicating one within the statute, was not erroneous, where accompanied by a correct instruction as to the amount of alcohol that the preparation must have contained in order that it could be deemed an intoxicating liquor, and by further instructions to the effect that, since it had a legitimate use medicinally, its use as a beverage would not render defendant liable, unless he kept it to sell as a beverage.

15. SAME—CONSTRUING INSTRUCTIONS TOGETHER.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, the court instructed: "We do not submit the question—we do not make your verdict depend in any way upon the question—whether it is possible for the ordinary man, or any man, to drink enough of this preparation to intoxicate him." The instruction was followed by a statement to the effect that the statute has fixed the amount of alcohol that it is essential for a preparation to contain in order that it may be deemed an intoxicating liquor, and the court also instructed that, in determining whether the preparation was sold for use as a beverage, all the evidence in the case bearing on the composition of the liquid, the medicinal properties of the ingredients, the percentage of alcohol, its effect or lack of effect in the quantities testified to, and its pleasantness or unpleasantness to the taste, should be considered. Held, that the instruction quoted was not erroneous.

16. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFINING REASONABLE DOUBT.

On a prosecution for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, it was not error for the court to refuse to define the phrase "reasonable doubt," where the definition would not have aided the jury.

17. SAME—NEW TRIAL—STATUTES—TREATING JURY.

V. S. 1232, providing that if a party in whose favor the verdict is rendered during the same term of court gives to a juror in the cause any victuals or drink, or procures it to be done, by way of treat, before or after the verdict, it shall be ground for a new trial, has no application to a criminal case.

18. SAME—CORRUPTION OF JURY.

An accused is to be awarded a new trial where there is sufficient reason to believe that a verdict has been returned against him in consequence of corruption practiced upon the jury-men by an officer or any one else.

19. SAME—EVIDENCE AS TO CORRUPTION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where, on a criminal prosecution, the jury told the sheriff that they should want supper, but before going to supper they returned their verdict, and they were then permitted at the expense of the state to eat the supper, there was nothing in the nature of corruption or impropriety.

Exceptions from Caledonia County Court; Munson, Judge.

Dominic Costa was convicted of keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority, and he brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Frank D. Thompson, State's Atty., and David E. Porter, for the State. Harland B. Howe, for respondent.

HASELTON, J. This was an information for keeping intoxicating liquor with intent to sell the same without authority. The evidence on the part of the state tended to show that the respondent kept a fruit and cigar store "and sold soda and soft drinks," and that June 24, 1905, one A. H. Noyes searched said store and found in the cellar a large quantity of "Red Cross Canada Malt Extract" put up in pint bottles, and that he found three bottles of the same on a shelf in the store, and one bottle in the show window. The time of this search is the time of the alleged offense. Noyes testified under objection and exception that he made the search referred to and found the malt extract while acting under a warrant to search the respondent's store for intoxicating liquor. The objection was that the search warrant and the return thereon were the best evidence. As to the return it is enough to say that in this proceeding it was not admissible against the respondent. Noyes might have used it to refresh his recollection, and the respondent might have cross-examined from it, and if it was inconsistent with the testimony of Noyes the respondent might have made another use of it; but the man who made the search was properly called to testify to the finding of the malt extract and the circumstances in which it was found. One of these circumstances, the finding of a bottle of the extract in the show window, was favorable to the respondent.

But it is urged that the witness should not have been allowed to testify that he made the search by virtue of a warrant to search for intoxicating liquors; that the warrant should have been produced. However the character and sufficiency of the warrant were not in issue. The witness was merely explaining how he came to be hunting over the respondent's cellar and other premises. It is often impracticable for a witness to testify as to his doings without referring in a general way and by its proper designation to some writ, warrant, execution, chattel mortgage, book, or other document; and there is no rule of law which, properly interpreted, makes it error for a witness to do so without producing the document when the contents of the document are not the subject of inquiry and are not material to any question raised. The respondent concedes that the witness might well enough have said that he was at the respondent's store by virtue of a warrant, but urges that the witness prejudiced the respondent by saying that he was acting under a warrant to search for intoxicating liquor. But, if the witness had simply testified that he had a warrant, the respondent might have argued that the jury were left to infer that there was a warrant out for the arrest of the respondent or for the search of his store for some purpose not connected with the very charge for which he was on trial. If the witness had left his testimony in the way in which it is said by respondent's counsel that he should have left it, the respondent might have argued that he was prejudiced in respect to his general character.

It is undoubtedly true that there is danger of prejudice against a respondent because he stands in court under arrest charged with a criminal offense, since it is well understood that under our system he could not be in that situation unless there was some evidence or supposed evidence against him. It is for this reason, more than any other, that the doctrine of the presumption of innocence is maintained in this jurisdiction as something distinct from the doctrine of reasonable doubt. And so in this case the court not only charged fully and correctly with regard to reasonable doubt and the presumption of innocence, but also particularly charged the jury that the facts that the charge for which the respondent was on trial had been brought against him and that he was on trial therefor were not to be taken against him.

The evidence tended to show that the extract, to the finding of which the testimony of Noyes related, contained about 4 per cent. of alcohol and that the respondent kept it for sale, and there was no claim or evidence to the contrary. But the main question in the case was whether the respondent kept this malt extract to sell for medicinal uses only, or whether he kept it to sell for use as a beverage. Several exceptions relate to the claim that the respondent was unduly restricted in proving that the malt extract was a legitimate proprietary medicine which might properly be sold for medicinal uses, and that the tendency of the evidence in that regard was not satisfactorily presented to the jury; but the case shows otherwise. The respondent himself testifies that he was a wholesale and retail dealer in patent medicines, that this extract was such a medicine, and that he did not keep it for sale as a beverage. Dr. E. W. Hitchcock, of St. Johnsbury, gave evidence tending to show that the malt extract "was sold and used as a proprietary medicine to a great extent, that it was generally prescribed by physicians, and that it was used to a large extent as a medicinal tonic." The facts which this evidence of Dr. Hitchcock tended to show were treated as established, for the court charged the jury, in substance, that there was no question in the case but that the malt extract is a legitimate medicine frequently prescribed by physicians and extensively sold in the drug trade. The court charged, further, that "a preparation of this kind may be manufactured for a lawful purpose and be kept and sold as a medicine without violation of law." Indeed, there is considerable more in the charge to the same effect.

The respondent called as a witness one Harris, a member of the firm which manufactures the Red Cross Canada Malt Extract, and he testified to the effect that his firm manufactures various other proprietary medicines, among them Harrisonia, sarsaparilla, and a preparation of beef, iron, and wine. In the course of the testimony of this witness the respondent offered to show "the percentage of alcohol in the other proprietary medicines which his firm manufactured and sold for the same purpose as said extract, and particularly that beef, iron, and wine contained 50 per cent. of alcohol, for the purpose of comparing this extract, which was one of said proprietary medicines, with said other proprietary medicines, and as tending to classify and characterize it as a patent or proprietary medicine." The offered evidence was excluded. By the same witness the respondent offered to show that two grocers and three druggists in St. Johnsbury had for a long time sold this malt extract openly and visibly, "as tending to characterize the article as a patent or proprietary medicine and to show its general use as such." Evidence under this offer was excluded. The respondent also offered to show by the same witness that this malt extract "was compounded and put upon the market to be used and administered for the same purposes and for the same general use as said other proprietary medicines which his firm manufactured." The offered evidence was excluded. These rulings of the court excluding offered evidence from the witness Harris were not erroneous. Evidence as to beef, iron, and wine, Harrisonia, and other proprietary medicines manufactured and sold by the firm which manufactured the malt extract, and of the doings of a few dealers in St. Johnsbury, would have been wholly immaterial, though it might have been misleading.

After Dr. Hitchcock had given the evidence above referred to tending to establish the character of the malt extract as a legitimate medicine, prescribed as such by physicians, and lawfully sold and used for medicinal purposes, the respondent offered to show by the doctor (1) "that this malt extract was used by the medical profession and by people generally for the same purposes as sarsaparilla, Paine's Celery Compound, Peruna, and beef, iron, and wine; (2) that Peruna contained from 50 to 61 per cent. of alcohol, and beef, iron, and wine from 25 to 30 per cent. of alcohol; (3) that a person could not become intoxicated upon Peruna, beef, iron, and wine, or this extract." Each of these three offers was made and excluded separately, but all were made "as tending to compare this extract with other patent or proprietary medicines as to its composition, general use, effect upon the system, and to classify and show its use as a patent or proprietary medicine." But these comparisons would have been irrelevant, and would have had a tendency to get before the jury evidence with regard to various preparations, more or less popular as remedies, in a way that would have had a tendency to lead the jury to decide the case upon erroneous grounds. The court, however, permitted the actual amount of alcohol and of the other ingredients of the extract to be shown, and properly did so, for the character of a liquid containing more than 1 per cent. of alcohol may be such that its use as a beverage is impossible, as is the case with some virulent poisons. The mere fact that a liquid can be and is swallowed does not make it a beverage. Fabor v. Green, 72 Vt. 117, 47 Atl. 391.

So it must be said, in the case of extracts, tinctures, essences, and compounds having a legitimate use for medicinal, culinary, or toilet purposes, that the mere presence, as a solvent, preservative, or otherwise, of more than the proportion of alcohol named in the statute, does not make the preparation one to which the statute applies. In respect to such articles the inquiry is not simply whether they contain more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, but there is the further inquiry whether or not the articles are sold to be used as a beverage. In respect to the sale of such preparations the intent governs. If there is no intent to sell these preparations for other than legitimate uses, there is no offense. If, however, a preparation is capable of being used as a beverage, and is sold or kept for sale with the purpose, intent, or understanding that it is to be used as a beverage, then, if it contains more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, an offense is committed. In this trial the state proceeded in accordance with the views just stated and introduced evidence tending to show that the malt extract in question was kept for the purpose and with the intent of selling it, or some part of it, for use as a beverage.

The state introduced evidence tending to show that in June, 1904, one Petty bought this malt extract of the respondent; that in March, 1905, one Woodward bought four bottles, one Bennett two bottles, and one Besant two bottles; and that on these occasions of purchase and sale the respondent told the purchasers that they could not drink the extract on the premises. Woodward testified that he bought his four bottles for drinking purposes, but that he did not inform the respondent of that fact. But the evidence tended to show that the respondent told Woodward that he could not drink it in the store, that he must go outside to drink it. To the reception of this evidence the respondent objected and excepted, but the evidence was clearly admissible. The intent of the respondent in making the sales to Woodward, which the evidence tended to show, was indicated by the evidence tending to show what the respondent told Woodward about going outside to drink his purchase. It tended strongly to show that the respondent understood that Woodward was buying the extract for bibulous, rather than for medicinal, purposes, and it is immaterial whether he got that understanding from what Woodward said or in some other way. The evidence tended to show that in some way the respondent was aware of the use to which the customer intended to put the malt extract, and that the respondent was also aware that it could be put to such use. The evidence tending to show that the respondent sold this malt extract to Woodward for use as a beverage in March, 1905, tended to show that he was keeping the extract in question for sale as a beverage June 24, 1905. State v. White, 70 Vt. 225, 39 Atl. 1085; Com. v. Cotton, 138 Mass. 500.

Petty's testimony tended to show that he bought the extract of the respondent in June, 1904, and that on one occasion he asked the respondent to open a bottle for him, but that the respondent said, "No," and told him he would have to take it away. The testimony of Petty was taken under objection and exception; but it was properly received. It bore, though more remotely than Woodward's, upon the question of the respondent's intent in keeping the malt extract which he had on hand, as the evidence tended to show, June 24, 1905. The statute in force at the time to which the testimony of Petty related was, indeed, different from that under which the respondent was prosecuted. But the statute of 1902 and that of 1904 were the same in all respects that could affect the intent with which the respondent was keeping and dealing in this extract.

The respondent offered to show that he sold this extract to one Randall for medicinal use in his family. The offer was made on the ground that the offered testimony would tend to characterize the keeping of the extract by the respondent, to show his intent and good faith, and to rebut the evidence tending to show that he had sold the extract to Woodward, Bennett, Petty, and Besant for use as a beverage. But proof that he sold the extract to Randall for a legitimate use was not admissible on any of the grounds stated nor on any conceivable ground. The fact that the respondent embraced an opportunity to make a legitimate sale of the article would have had no bearing upon the issue. The state was not called upon to show that the respondent would refuse to make any but illegal sales, and it would not have aided the respondent if he had shown that he had no scruples against taking the profit of a legal sale.

The respondent took 27 exceptions to the charge of the court. Counsel for the respondent says nothing in his brief about 21 of these, many of which were to very obvious principles of law. We have, however, examined them all, and the parts of the charge to which they relate; for the whole law of the case could not be stated in one sentence, and propositions which seem doubtful, standing alone, are seen to be sound when taken in their connection. We find no error in the charge.

The sentence of the charge about which the respondent chiefly complains is this: "If this preparation was bought and used as a beverage because of the intoxicating ingredient contained in it, it was a beverage, and an intoxicating beverage, within the meaning of the law." But this statement was accompanied by correct instructions as to the amount of alcohol that the extract must contain in order that, in any view of the case, it could be deemed an intoxicating liquor, and by further instructions to the effect that, since it had a legitimate use as a medicine, its use as a beverage would not make the respondent liable, unless he kept it to sell for use as a beverage.

Another sentence of the charge which the respondent complains of was this: "We do not submit the question—we do not make your verdict depend in any way upon the question—whether it is possible for the ordinary man, or any man, to drink enough of this preparation to make him actually intoxicated." But this sentence immediately follows a statement to the effect that the statute has fixed the amount of alcohol that it is essential for a preparation to contain, in order that it may be deemed an intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the law, and the sentence of the charge complained of was entirely correct in its application to the element of the case which the court was then presenting. But this was not all of the case, and so, with careful regard to the rights of this respondent and of others dealing in preparations containing alcohol, the court charged the jury that, in determining whether or not this preparation, such as it was, was kept to be sold for use as a beverage, "all the evidence in the case bearing upon the composition of the liquid and the medicinal properties of the various ingredients, the percentage of alcohol contained in it, its effect or lack of effect in the quantities testified to, whether it is pleasant or unpleasant to the taste, and what is shown regarding its use as a medicine," was for the consideration of the jury. Russell v. Sloan, 33 Vt. 656, Fabor v. Green, 72 Vt. 117, 47 Atl. 391, and State v. Kezer, 74 Vt. 50, 52 Atl. 116, all cited by the respondent, were obviously and rightly treated as sound law and as still applicable to the extent to which the Kezer Case is held to be applicable in State v. Krinski, 78 Vt. —, 62 Atl. 37; that is, the principles laid down in those cases were given such effect as could be given them under a statute which treats a beverage as intoxicating liquor if it contains more than 1 per cent. of alcohol.

The respondent excepted, lastly, "because the court did not tell the jury that the respondent would have a right to sell medicine, if he sold it as a medicine and not as a beverage, even though it contained more than 1 per cent. of alcohol; that the jury should be charged as last aforesaid because 12 laymen would not be liable to understand the charge as given upon that matter." This exception concedes the correctness of the charge in that regard, and there was nothing in the subject-matter or the presentation of it that could possibly have been misunderstood by the jurymen.

The respondent made 14 requests to charge. Some of them were complied with in terms and some in substance, and others were not complied with. Two requests were for a definition of the phrase "reasonable doubt." Neither of the definitions asked for would have aided the jury, and the court properly omitted to give these definitions. State v. Blay, 77 Vt. 56, 58 Atl. 794. The court refused to comply with no request which the respondent was entitled to have followed.

The respondent made a motion to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted. Under this motion the court found that at about a quarter past 5 in the afternoon of the day on which the jury took the case, and during their deliberations, they told the sheriff having them in charge that they should want supper and that the officer immediately ordered their supper. However, at about a quarter before 6, and before going to supper, they returned their verdict into court. The sheriff then told them that, as he had ordered their supper, they could eat it, and accordingly they partook of the supper which had been provided for them. The expense was borne by the state. It was on the ground that this supper was given the jurors by the state as a treat that the respondent moved to have the verdict against him set aside and a new trial granted. The court overruled the motion as a matter of law, and the respondent excepted. The respondent now argues that the motion should have prevailed, and relies upon V. S. 1232, which provides that "if a party in whose favor a verdict is rendered, during the same term of court gives to a juror in the cause, knowing him to be such, any victuals or drink or procures it to be done by way of treat, either before or after such verdict, the same on proof thereof shall be set aside and a new trial granted." But this statute cannot apply, and was not intended to apply, to criminal cases. See Baker v. Jacobs, 64 Vt. 197, 23 Atl. 588. It cannot apply in a case in which the respondent is acquitted, and it cannot apply in a case in which the respondent is convicted, for no officer of the state can make himself an agent of the state in respect to practices forbidden by the state; nor would the fact that the expense attending an illegal act was in some way put upon the state make the government itself a party to the illegal transaction. What is intimated in Carlisle v. Sheldon, 23 Vt. 440, in respect to treating by an authorized agent of a town in a civil suit, has no application here.

But, while the statute relied upon by the respondent has no application in criminal cases, a respondent should be awarded a new trial when there is sufficient reason to believe that a verdict has been returned against him in consequence of corruption practiced upon the jurymen by an officer of the state or by any one else. But here the facts found have no tendency to show corruption, or an attempt at corruption. No. 135. p. 102, Acts 1898, provides that, "when in the trial of a criminal cause in county court a petit jury is kept together by the order of the court, the necessary expenses of the board and lodging of such jury while so kept together shall be borne by the state." This supper was ordered and provided for the jurors, and so the expense of it was incurred, while the jurors were kept together, and there was nothing in the nature of corruption or impropriety in the conduct of the sheriff in letting the jurymen eat the supper which he had provided in pursuance of his duty under the statute. The motion to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted was properly overruled as a matter of law.

Judgment that there is no error in the proceedings, and that the respondent take nothing by his exceptions. Let execution be done.

STATE v. BARR et al.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Caledonia. Oct. 25, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, on a trial under an information containing several counts charging the illegal sale of liquor without a license and counts for keeping and exposing liquor for sale without a license, the state gave evidence showing the several offenses of selling, it was proper to permit evidence of other sales.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 822-825; vol. 29, Cent. Dig. Intoxicating Liquors, § 286.]

2. INFORMATION—SEPARATE COUNTS—ELECTION BY STATE—DUTY TO REQUIRE.

Where, on a trial under an information containing several counts charging the sale of liquors without a license, the state gave evidence showing the several offenses charged, it was error to refuse at the close of the testimony to require the state to elect on which count it would rely for a conviction, though the court ruled that there could be a conviction of no more offenses than there were counts, and that each offense must be found on evidence particularly relating to it.

3. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for crime, officers may testify as to what they learned while making illegal searches of defendant's premises.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 876.]

4. INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY AFTER VERDICT.

An information charging the sale of intoxicating liquors, without specifying the kind of liquors sold, and without negating the circumstances under which cider and wines, included in the words "intoxicating liquors," could lawfully be sold, is sufficient after a verdict of guilty; for it will be presumed the sale found was unlawful.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PERSONS ENTITLED TO RAISE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

Where one convicted of selling intoxicating liquors in violation of the license act of 1902 was not affected by the discriminations in the act with reference to cider and wines, as it did not appear that defendant was convicted of selling either cider or wines, he could not assail the validity of the act on the ground of such discriminations.

Exceptions from Caledonia County Court;
Tyler, Judge.

Eddie Barr and another were convicted of selling intoxicating liquors, and they except. Overruled.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J. and MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Frank D. Thompson, State's Atty., and David E. Porter, for the State. Taylor & Dutton, for respondents.

ROWELL, C. J. This is an information under the license act of 1902. Six counts are for selling and furnishing intoxicating liquor without a license, and two for keeping and exposing for sale without a license.

It was not error to allow the state, after having introduced evidence tending to show six offenses of selling, to introduce evidence of other sales. This precise question was so ruled in State v. Smith, 22 Vt. 74, and in State v. Croteau, 23 Vt. 14, 54 Am. Dec. 90.

But as each sale was a separate offense, it was error for the court to refuse at the close of the testimony to require the state to elect the occasions on which it would rely for conviction under the counts for selling, and to allow the case to go to the jury on all the evidence of sales, although it ruled that there could be a conviction of no more offenses than there were counts and charged that each offense must be found on evidence particularly relating to it. Although that was a question of practice, addressed to the discretion of the court, still that discretion was to be exercised within the bounds of the law, which are pretty well defined in such cases. Hubbard v. Hubbard, 77 Vt., at page 77, 58 Atl. 969, 67 L. R. A. 969. The object of an election being, whether of counts or offenses, to save the prisoner from embarrassment in his defense, the cases say that as a rule it should be made before the prisoner is called upon to put in his evidence. Thus, in State v. Smith, 22 Vt. 74, this court said there is much good sense in what Alderson, J., said in Wigglesworth's Case, that the election ought to be made, not merely before the case goes to the jury, but before the prisoner is called upon for his defense, and approved of that as satisfactory. State v. Willett, 78 Vt. —, 62 Atl. 48. The special circumstances of a case may make it proper to defer election till the testimony is all in. Pointer v. United States, 151 U. S. 396, 14 Sup. Ct. 410, 38 L. Ed. 208. But then it should be made before summing up. Woodford v. People, 62 N. Y., at page 131, 20 Am. Rep. 464. In a prosecution for rape, where several acts of intercourse were proved, the state was allowed to go to the jury on all of them, and held error; for, each act being a separate offense, the state should have been put to elect which it would rely upon. Powell v. State (Tex. Cr. App., Oct. 1904) 82 S. W. 516. It is held in Kentucky that where several separate offenses are proved, though the indictment is general, the state must elect, and cannot submit them all to the jury. Commonwealth v. Illinois Central R. R. Co. (Ky. Ct. App., Oct. 1904) 82 S. W. 381. In Smith v. Commonwealth, 109 Ky. 685, 60 S. W. 531, that court said that the state should not be allowed to prove a number of separate offenses beyond what are charged, and submit them all to the jury, to catch the prisoner in a dragnet of offenses.

It is contended that the several searches of the respondent's premises were illegal, and that therefore it was error to allow the officers to testify to what they saw there while making them, as that was compelling the respondents to furnish evidence against themselves. But this question was ruled the other way in State v. Krinske, 78 Vt. —, 62 Atl. 37. The same thing is held in Commonwealth v. Hurley, 158 Mass. 159, 33 N. E. 342.

Under the motion in arrest, it is urged that, as cider and wine are included in the words "intoxicating liquor" as used in the information, which could be lawfully sold in some circumstances without a license, the information should have negatived those circumstances, or have specified the kind of liquor sold. But, after verdict, the sale found must be taken to have been unlawful, for the presumption is in favor of the legal correctness of the verdict, the contrary not appearing.

It is further urged under the motion that said act is unconstitutional as interfering with interstate commerce, and as being in derogation of the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, in that it in terms discriminates in favor of cider and wine manufactured in this state, and unreasonably discriminates between sales of cider by the barrel and sales in lesser quantities. But, as it does not appear that the respondents were convicted of selling either cider or wine, it does not appear that they were in any way affected by those discriminations, if they existed, and therefore they cannot be heard to contest the constitutionality of the act on that ground. State v. Scampini, 77 Vt. 92, 59 Atl. 201.

Judgment and sentence reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for a new trial.

STATE v. BARDITTI.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Caledonia. Oct. 25, 1905.)

WITNESSES — BIAS — PROOF OF STATEMENTS SHOWING BIAS.

The hostility of a witness to a party against whom he is called cannot be shown by proving oral statements made out of court, unless a proper foundation is laid by inquiring of him, with particularity of time, place, and occasion, whether he made the statements attributed to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 1200.]

Exceptions from Caledonia County Court;
Tyler, Judge.

Giscomo Barditti was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors, and he excepts. Overruled.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Frank D. Thompson, State's Atty., and David E. Porter, for the State. Tayler & Dutton, for respondent.

ROWELL, C. J. While it is always competent to show that a witness is hostile to a party against whom he is called, yet if that hostility is sought to be shown by his oral statements out of court, as it was here, it is not error to require a foundation to be laid by inquiring of the witness on the stand, with particularity of time, place, and occasion, whether he made the statements or not. State v. Glynn, 51 Vt. 577. It not appearing that such foundation was laid, no error is shown.

The court sufficiently charged that each offense must be found in the evidence that particularly related to it. The other questions are like some of those in State v. Barr and Planfetti (Vt.) 62 Atl. 43, and are decided against the respondent.

Judgment that there is no error, and that the respondent take nothing by his exceptions. Let execution be done.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PERFORMANCE OF GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF JAIL.

A municipality, constructing and maintaining a jail, as expressly authorized by V. S. 5302-5304, is exercising a governmental power, and is not liable at common law for negligence to one committed to the jail to await an examination, as expressly authorized by section 5305.

3. DEATH—ACTION FOR CAUSING DEATH—GROUNDS OF ACTION.

Where an intestate would have no right of action if death had not ensued, his personal representative can have none, under V. S. 2451, 2452, providing that a person through whose wrongful act death results shall be liable to an action for damages, if the injured person could have maintained a suit if death had not ensued.

Exceptions from Chittenden County Court; Powers, Judge.

Action by Fred Carty's administrator against the village of Winooski. There was a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the declaration, and plaintiff excepts. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, and HASELTON, JJ.

J. J. Enright and R. E. Brown, for plaintiff. Henry Conlin, H. F. Wolcott, and H. N. Deavitt, for defendant.

WATSON, J. This case is here on exception to the holding on demurrer that the declaration is insufficient. The demurrer is both general and special, but the declaration will be considered with reference to substance only.

It is alleged therein that the defendant is a municipal corporation organized and existing under a charter granted by the Legislature, and carrying on and administering its municipal affairs through a board of trustees, and that pursuant to a lawful vote of the village its trustees constructed, furnished, and maintained at the expense of the village the lockup in question for proper and lawful use in the detention, safe-keeping, and custody of such persons as might by proper authority and legal right be thereto committed. It is further alleged that the plaintiff's intestate was found in such a state of intoxication in the defendant village that he was greatly disturbing the public peace and tranquility, whereupon he was arrested by a police officer of the village in the lawful and proper performance of his duties, and, to restrain the intestate in custody for the purpose provided by law, the officer committed him to the lockup, as he well and lawfully might. Other allegations show that in the construction, furnishing, and maintenance of the lockup the defendant and its trustees were guilty or negligence; that a mattress in the lockup became and was ignited from some cause unknown, and without the fault of the intestate, producing "in said small, close, and unventilated lockup and cell a great volume of heavy smoke," etc., by reason whereof the intestate was "helplessly overcome, smothered, suffocated, and killed."

A town or incorporated village in this state may by vote authorize its selectmen, if a town, or trustees or bailiffs, if a village, to erect and maintain, at the expense of the town or village, within its corporate limits, one or more lockups or jails, and appoint a jailer, who shall perform the duties and be subject to the same penalties imposed on county jailers and receive the same fees. V. S. 5302-5304. And "when process is delivered to an officer to serve, requiring him to commit a person to jail to await an examination or trial before a justice, or for neglect or refusal to make disclosure under the law prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquor, if such order for commitment was made within the limits of a town or an incorporated village maintaining a lockup or jail, such person shall be committed to such lockup or jail and be subject to the restraints and entitled to the privileges provided by law for persons confined in the county jail." V. S. 5305. One of the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty is the governing and regulating of its internal police. Thus the police power, so called, rests at common law, and in this state also, by reservation, in the Constitution. Chapter 1, art. 5. In the absence of constitutional restrictions, this power may be delegated by a state to municipal corporations, to be exercised within their corporate limits; but, whether the power be so delegated or otherwise, it is a governmental function, founded upon the duty of the state to protect the public safety, the public health, and the public morals. Thorpe v. Rutland, etc., R. Co., 27 Vt. 140, 62 Am. Dec. 625; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 19 Sup. Ct. 565, 43 L. Ed. 858; License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. Ed. 258.

Since laws for the preservation of the public peace, quiet, and good order are within the police power, it must follow that when, for the purpose of enforcing such laws, a municipality lawfully constructs, furnishes, and maintains a lockup or jail wherein to confine persons under arrest and awaiting an examination or trial, or for neglect or refusal to make disclosure under the law prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquor, it is but the exercising of the same power; for the whole includes all its parts. But, as acts done within this power are governmental in character, the municipality performing them is not liable at common law for negligence therein. The cases of Welch v. Village of Rutland, 56 Vt. 228, 48 Am. Rep. 762, and Aitken v. Village of Wells River, 70 Vt. 308, 40 Atl. 829, 41 L. R. A. 566, 67 Am. St. Rep. 672, were determined upon the same underlying principle, and are decisive of the one before us. Cases very like this one have been before the courts in other states, and in the absence of statutes creating a liability they have been decided in the same way. Gray v. Griffin, 111 Ga. 361, 36 S. E. 792, 51 L. R. A. 131; Gullikson v. McDonald, 62 Minn. 278, 64 N. W. 812; Davis v. Knoxville, 90 Tenn. 599, 18 S. W. 254; Lindley v. Polk County, 84 Iowa, 308, 50 N. W. 975; Brown's Adm'r v. Guyandotte, 84 W. Va. 299, 12 S. E. 707, 11 L. R. A. 121; White v. Commissioners, 129 Ind. 396, 28 N. E. 846; La Clef v. City of Concordia, 41 Kan. 323, 21 Pac. 272, 13 Am. St. Rep. 285; Kelley v. Cook, 21 R. I. 29, 41 Atl. 571; Blake v. City of Pontiac, 49 Ill. App. 543.

As the intestate would have had no right of action if death had not ensued, his personal representative can have none for the benefit of next of kin. V. S. 2451, 2452; Lazelle v. Town of Newfane, 70 Vt. 440, 41 Atl. 511.

Judgment affirmed, declaration adjudged insufficient, and judgment for the defendant to recover its costs.

WARD v. MARVIN.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Orleans. Nov. 2, 1905.)

1. SALES—RESCISSION BY BUYER—TIME FOR RESCISSION.

Where there are disputed facts involving questions of excuse and discovery of fraud, it is a question for the jury whether a buyer rescinded his contract for false representations by the seller within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 317.]

2. SAME—WAIVER OF RIGHT TO RESCIND.

Where the buyer of a horse, after discovering fraud of the seller, and after being assured by the seller that, if the horse was not as represented, he would make it right, continued to use the horse as his own, he thereby waived his right to rescind the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 299.]

Exceptions from Orleans County Court; Tyler, Judge.

Assumpsit by Charles Ward against Delos Marvin. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepts. Reversed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

J. W. Redmond, for plaintiff. Cook & Williams, for defendant.

POWERS, J. Assumpsit for the recovery of the purchase price of a certain horse, which the plaintiff purchased of the defendant on or about the 15th of April, under the latter's false and fraudulent representation that it was a good, moderate worker, practically sound, not more than eight years old, and suitable to work with a Percheron horse which the plaintiff then owned. Within a day or two after the purchase the plaintiff discovered that the horse was a "puller," and a "whistler" when used as a driver, but thought that it might act better in that regard when put to work. Within a week he found that the horse worked too fast for the Percheron, and that it had various physical defects and vices which seriously impaired its value; but he bought the horse for a work horse, and, thinking that it might work down and improve after being used longer with the Percheron, and so made to answer his purpose, the plaintiff continued to use the animal until the 8th day of May, when he became satisfied that it was not such a work horse as it had been represented to be, and wrote the defendant to that effect. Soon after the parties had an interview regarding the matter, and the defendant told the plaintiff that, if the horse was not as represented, he would make it right. Relying upon this, the plaintiff waited until the 6th day of June, and, nothing having been done by the defendant toward making it right, the plaintiff again wrote him, fixing a time within which the matter would have to be adjusted. On the 20th day of June the parties met and the defendant refused to take back the horse and return the purchase price, and a day or two later the plaintiff formally tendered back the horse and demanded the price. During all this time the plaintiff continued to work and use the horse. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant rested and moved for a verdict upon two grounds: (1) That the rescission and tender back of the property were so long after the discovery of the fraud that as matter of law it was too late; (2) that the plaintiff, after discovering the fraud, made his election to stand upon the contract by continuing to use the horse. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

1. When a person has been induced to buy goods by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the seller, he is entitled either to sue the seller for the fraud, or he may, on discovering the fraud, rescind the contract, and, if he has paid the purchase price, recover it under a count for money had and received to his use, provided he can restore the article purchased in the same state as that in which he received it. But, if he would rescind, he must act promptly, or that remedy will be lost to him. The law does not require him to act upon the appearance of the first indication of fraud, but allows him a fair opportunity to ascertain the extent of the false representations and to test the quality of the article fraudulently put upon him. All the law requires is that he shall act within a reasonable time after the discovery of all the essential elements of the fraud. How promptly one must act to be within this rule of law depends upon the circumstances of each particular case, and when there are no facts involved, but the simple one of the length of time elapsed, it is a question of law. But when disputed facts, involving questions of excuse, discovery of fraud, and like matters, as in this case, are to be passed upon, the question is a mixed one of law and fact, and is for the jury. This is the settled law of this state as established by Whitcomb v. Denio, 52 Vt. 390, Chamberlin v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 252, 9 Atl. 832, and Norton v. Gleason, 61 Vt. 478, 18 Atl. 45, and recently approved in Brinard v. Van Dyke, 71 Vt. 359, 45 Atl. 758. There was nothing in this case to take it out of this general rule, and there was no error in submitting the case to the jury on that question.

2. The second ground of the defendant's motion is more serious. The plaintiff could not treat the contract as subsisting after he discovered the fraud and afterwards avoid it. Upon discovering the fraud, he had his election to affirm or disaffirm the contract.

He could not do both. And, when he has once made his election to affirm, the law requires that he adhere to it. Barrett v. Tyler, 76 Vt. 108, 56 Atl. 534. His conduct in continuing to use and treat the horse as his own after the discovery of all the essential features of the fraud amounted to an election to recognize the contract as binding, and precluded a subsequent rescission. 1 Benj. Sales, § 675; Cookingham v. Dusa, 41 Kan. 229, 21 Pac. 95; Downer v. Smith, 32 Vt. 1, 76 Am. Dec. 148; Barrett v. Tyler, supra. It is urged that the plaintiff was induced to act as he did by the conduct of the defendant. He was induced to delay action by the defendant's assurance that he would make it right if the horse was not as represented, and, so far as the delay thus caused is concerned, it would excuse him, if in the opinion of the jury it was not unreasonable. But he did more than delay. He continued to work the horse, and his continued use of the horse was not so induced by the defendant. There was nothing in the defendant's statement or conduct that can be construed as a permission to use the property during the time negotiations for a settlement were pending. The defendant said he would make it right if the horse was not as represented; and that is all there was to the statement. In working the horse after that, the plaintiff must be held to have acted voluntarily, and, having dealt with the horse as his own after fully discovering the fraud practiced upon him, he waived his right to rescind. Tarkington v. Purvis (Ind. Sup.) 25 N. E. 879, 9 L. R. A. 607. In view of this holding, the other questions raised by the exceptions are unimportant and are not considered.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

LAVALLEY v. RAVENNA.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Rutland. Nov. 2, 1905.)

SALES—CONDITIONAL SALES—DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY—RECOVERY OF PRICE.

Where, on the sale of a horse, a written lien was executed, reciting that the seller was to retain title until the balance of the purchase price was paid, and the horse died before the balance was due, the seller was nevertheless entitled to recover such balance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 1362.]

Exceptions from Rutland County Court; Tyler, Judge.

Assumpsit by Harry Lavalley against Bernardo Ravenna. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepts. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Butler & Moloney, for plaintiff. M. O. Webber, for defendant.

POWERS, J. This is an action of general assumpsit for the recovery of a balance due on the purchase of certain personal property. The parties disagreed somewhat in regard to the precise terms of the contract, but it satisfactorily appears from the record that the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant a team, consisting of a horse, buggy, and harness, receiving in part payment therefor another horse, harness, and wagon, and a certain sum of money, and taking as security for the unpaid balance of the price agreed upon a written lien on all the property so conveyed to the defendant. Soon after, and before any part of such unpaid balance came due, the horse covered by the lien died, without the fault of the purchaser. The seller waited until the full amount of such balance fell due by the terms of the contract, and then brought this suit for its recovery. At the close of the evidence the defendant moved for a verdict on several grounds, which was overruled, to which he excepted.

It appears from the record that the written lien was not formally offered or received in evidence, but it was submitted to the jury and used by the court as though it was a part of the case; so we treat it as the parties treated it at the trial, and regard it as properly a part of the record. It is informal and crude, but the substantial recitals of it are that the property in question was conditionally sold and delivered to the defendant, and that the title thereto was to remain in the plaintiff until the sums therein named were fully paid, that the plaintiff might repossess himself of the property on the defendant's default of payment, and that in such event all payments theretofore made by the defendant should be forfeited. Both parties signed the instrument, but it did not contain a note or other express agreement on the part of the defendant to pay the sum specified. So the question presented, stated broadly, is this: Can there be a recovery for property sold and delivered on condition that the title shall not pass until full payment therefor has been made, when, without the fault of the purchaser, the property is destroyed before the price falls due? This question we answer in the affirmative. It is true that these contracts are sometimes spoken of as "executory," and the purchaser is termed a "bailee," as was done by this court in French v. Osmer, 67 Vt. 427, 32 Atl. 254; but these expressions have reference to the strict legal title to the property, and should not determine the present question, which is one pertaining to an absolute promise to pay. And the defendant's promise to pay was absolute, and was made upon a sufficient consideration; for he got just what he bargained for, the use, possession, and enjoyment of the property, with the right to acquire the absolute title upon payment of the stipulated price, and this was the consideration for his promise. The seller had done all that he was to do to or with the property by the terms of the contract—all that he was to do at all, except to receive the price; and upon that the title passed, without further action on the part of either party. The defendant's promise was in no sense conditioned on the seller's ability to deliver the title. He could not return the property to the seller, and thereby avoid further liability. Appleton v. Library Corp., 53 Conn. 4, 22 Atl. 681; Smith v. Aldrich, 180 Mass. 367, 62 N. E. 381. The authorities are not in harmony on the question herein decided. Tufts v. Griffin (N. C.) 12 S. E. 68, 10 L. R. A. 526, 22 Am. St. Rep. 363; Soda Fountain v. Vaughn (N. J. Sup.) 55 Atl. 54; Burnley v. Tufts, 66 Miss. 49, 5 South. 627, 14 Am. St. Rep. 540; Tufts v. Wynne & Thompson, 45 Mo. App. 42; Cooper v. Organ Co., 58 Ill. App. 248; Hintermister v. Lane, 27 Hun, 497—are among the cases in full accord with the views herein expressed; while to the contrary are Bishop v. Minderhout & Nichols (Ala.) 29 South. 11, 52 L. R. A. 395, 86 Am. St. Rep. 134; Cobb v. Tufts, 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 153; Swallow v. Emery, 111 Mass. 356. The result is that we hold that the defendant is liable for the unpaid balance, notwithstanding the death of the horse included in the sale.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. WILLETT.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Chittenden. Nov. 3, 1905.)

1. INFORMATION—QUASHING—ALLEGATION AS TO TIME OF OFFENSE.

Where the information charged an offense on the 9th day of September, the statement of the prosecuting attorney that he expected to prove an offense in August could not make the date alleged an impossible one, and a motion to quash on such ground was properly overruled.

2. RAPE—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, evidence of acts of intercourse on different days, both before and after the one charged, is admissible.

3. SAME—ELECTION—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where evidence of several acts of intercourse was properly in the case, the matter of election between them is in the discretion of the court, and no exception will lie where an election is required before the respondent is called on for his defense.

4. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where the state's attorney, in attempting to prove a complaint, cautioned the witness not to name the person complained of, and he answered that "she said he had insulted her," this was not erroneous as in effect naming respondent; he being entitled at most to an instruction as to the proper use of the evidence.

5. INFORMATION—VARIANCE—TIME OF OFFENSE.

Unless descriptive of the offense, the time need not be proved as laid in the information.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 548.]

6. RAPE—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where there was evidence tending to prove an alibi, the court properly refused to instruct that, if the respondent had established his absence on the date named by the prosecuting witness on cross-examination as the date of the offense, he was entitled to an acquittal, and left it for the jury to determine whether the state had shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the respondent was where he had an opportunity to commit the offense on the occasion testified to, saying, further, that it was not necessary to find the date.

Exceptions from Chittenden County Court; Tyler, Judge.

Charles Willett was convicted of statutory rape, and excepts and petitions for new trial. Exceptions overruled and petition dismissed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

M. G. Leary, State's Atty., for the State. H. S. Peck and J. J. Enright, for respondent.

MUNSON, J. The information charged an offense on the 9th day of September, and the state's attorney said in his opening statement that he expected to prove an offense in August. The respondent thereupon moved that the information be quashed, on the ground that it alleged an impossible date. It is certain that no statement of a time other than the one alleged could make the one alleged an impossible date under the rules of pleading. The motion was properly overruled.

The court permitted the state to introduce evidence of intercourse had on different days as the basis of an election, and refused to require the state to select the occasion on which it would rely until the close of its case, to all of which exception was taken. The admission of evidence covering several occasions was not error, if, upon an election being made, the evidence relating to other occasions bore upon the issue as finally submitted. In a prosecution for adultery, evidence of other acts of adultery, occurring both before and after the one charged, is admissible. State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202, 24 Am. Rep. 124. The same rule must be applicable in a prosecution for statutory rape. So the evidence of the several acts was properly in the case. The matter of election is ordinarily within the discretion of the court, and it is clear that no exception will lie to the action of the court if an election is compelled before the respondent is called upon for his defense. 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 461, 5; State v. Smith, 22 Vt. 74.

In undertaking to prove a complaint, the state's attorney asked in regard to the nature of it, cautioning the witness not to name the person complained of; and the witness replied, "She said he had insulted her." The witness was then asked, "What did she say had been done to her?" and replied: "She did not say, only that is the way she said it. She said he had insulted her." The answers were objected to on the ground that, in effect, they named the respondent, and exceptions were noted. We do not think the case should be reversed because of these answers. The state was without fault. The question was proper, and the witness carefully cautioned. The witness evidently tried to answer properly. The frame of the answer was such that a successful interruption was impossible. The answer itself did not name the respondent. It could have that effect only because the respondent was on trial and had been testified about. The propriety of allowing an exception in these circumstances has been questioned. The court would at once have instructed the jury as to the proper use of the answer upon a suggestion from respondent's counsel. This removal of the matter from the minds of the jury, as far as it can be done, is all that the respondent is ordinarily entitled to in such instances. The views of the court upon this subject may be gathered from Houston v. Russell, 52 Vt. 110, 117; Frary v. Gusha, 59 Vt. 257, 9 Atl. 549; Lawrence v. Graves' Estate, 60 Vt. 657, 15 Atl. 342.

The respondent moved for a verdict on the ground of a variance between allegation and proof as to the time when the offense was committed. The motion was properly overruled; for, unless descriptive of the offense, the time need not be proved as laid. 1 Bish. New Cr. Proc. 386.

The prosecutrix was at the respondent's house during the four weeks in August. It appears from a short extract of her testimony, incorporated into the exceptions for another purpose, that she testified that the first occasion was after she had been there about two weeks. The exceptions show that the state's evidence tended to establish five or six occasions during the last two weeks in August. The respondent's requests assume that she fixed the first occasion as occurring on Thursday or Friday of the second week, which would be the 13th or 14th, and the last occasion as occurring on Thursday or Friday of the last week, which would be August 27th or 28th. It appears from the charge, which is referred to on the points made by the requests, that she testified to five or six occasions during the second and third weeks, but without undertaking to fix the days of the week or month, and testified, further, that nothing occurred during the first week or the last. The charge goes on to say that she did fix some days in cross-examination, and left it for the jury to say whether she was able to fix the days of the week or the month from memory or was led to give them by the cross-examination. The state elected to stand upon the last occasion testified to, but was not required to name the day.

It appears from the charge that the respondent gave evidence tending to establish an alibi covering the occasions testified to, and the court was requested to charge that, if the respondent had established his absence during Thursday and Friday, August 27th and 28th, he was entitled to an acquittal. The court declined to give this effect to the prosecutrix's answers fixing the day, but left it for the jury to determine whether the state had shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the respondent was where he had the opportunity to commit the offense on the last occasion testified to, saying, further, that it was not necessary for them to find the date. The respondent was not entitled to have the question restricted as claimed. The alibi was not a special issue to be separately disposed of upon a consideration of the evidence bearing solely upon the dates. The question for the jury was whether, upon a consideration of the whole evidence, they were satisfied of the respondent's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Judgment that there is no error in the proceedings, and that the respondent take nothing by his exceptions.

There is also a petition for a new trial. Upon respondent's motion the evidence of a witness for the state, whom he was deprived of the opportunity to cross-examine, is excluded from consideration. The petition is based upon a retraction of the complaining witness, the only witness to the occurrences in question, who now testifies that the story she told on the trial was a fabrication, which she was instructed to tell by her grandmother, and told through fear of punishment. This is contradicted by the testimony of the grandmother. The circumstances in which the retraction was originally made are fully presented in the evidence taken, but it is not necessary to recite them. Upon a careful review of the whole case a majority of the court are satisfied that the respondent was justly convicted.

Petition dismissed.

LYNDON SAVINGS BANK v. INTERNATIONAL CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Caledonia. Nov. 9, 1905.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES—NATURE OF LIABILITY ON INDORSEMENT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where it appeared that, after a note sued on was overdue and one of the makers had been adjudged insolvent, plaintiff employed an agent to call on the managers of defendant corporation, the maker, "to do something about the note," and that as a result of the interview defendants wrote their names on the back of the instrument, and the evidence was conflicting as to what was said between plaintiff's agent and defendants at the time as to the nature of the indorsement, the question of their liability was for the jury.

2. APPEAL — REVIEW — CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The Supreme Court will not review conflicting evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

3. BILLS AND NOTES — INDORSEMENT — CONSIDERATION.

An extension of the time of payment of a note is sufficient consideration for the indorsement of the note by one not previously a party thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 7, Cent. Dig. Bills and Notes, § 539.]

4. SAME—LOANS—PRESUMPTIONS.

In an action by a bank on a note, plaintiff claimed that there had been an agreement between its agent and defendants extending the time of payment, and that, in consideration of such extension, certain of defendants had become parties thereto, signing the same as makers, and defendants insisted that the alleged agreement was not operative until accepted by plaintiff and approved by the inspector of finance. It appeared that plaintiff continued to hold the note for several years after the alleged agreement, without objection by defendants and apparently with the approval of the said official. It also received interest thereon for several years. Held, that it might be presumed that plaintiff's agent returned the note to plaintiff, and that the inspector and plaintiff were satisfied.

5. CORPORATIONS—REPRESENTATION BY OFFICERS — ESTOPPEL TO DENY AUTHORITY OF OFFICERS.

Although the general manager of a corporation had no authority to make an agreement extending the time of payment of a note on which the corporation was liable, yet where he has made such an agreement, and the company has received the benefit of the forbearance, and has ratified it by paying interest on the note for several years after the agreement was made, defendants, when sued on the note, are estopped from denying the authority to make such agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1704.]

6. BILLS AND NOTES—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on a note, evidence considered, and held sufficient to support a verdict finding that plaintiff, by receiving dividends from the assets of one of the insolvent makers, did not thereby release its right to collect the debt from the indorsers of the note.

7. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — AGREEMENT WAIVING LIMITATIONS.

It is competent for the makers of a note to stipulate therein that they will waive the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 63.]

8. BILLS AND NOTES — TIME OF PAYMENT — VERDICT.

Where, in an action on a note, the jury found that an agreement had been made for an extension of the time of payment, that no definite time was agreed upon, and that a reasonable time for such delay was until plaintiff was dissatisfied with the security or until payment was demanded or offered, such finding cannot be considered as making the instrument a demand note in the ordinary legal meaning.

9. BANKS AND BANKING—SAVINGS BANKS—LOANS.

V. S. 4099, providing that a savings bank shall not make a contract or agreement to loan or extend the time of payment of a loan on personal security for a longer time than one year, is not violated by an agreement extending the time of payment of a note until the payee should be dissatisfied with the security or until payment was demanded or offered.

Special assumpsit by the Lyndon Savings Bank against the International Company and others. From a judgment against the International Company and O. C. Miller, and in favor of defendant G. H. Prouty, the International Company and O. C. Miller, bring exceptions. Judgment reversed pro forma, and rendered for plaintiff against the three defendants.

The International Company is a corporation organized under the laws of this state. The writ in this case is dated March 7, 1901, and was served March 11, 1901. The note in suit is for $5,000, dated June 12, 1898, payable to plaintiff, or order, on demand, with interest semiannually, and waiving "all right or claim to the statute of limitations," and signed: "International Co., J. A. Prouty, Pres., H. E. Folsom, Treas." Upon the back appears: "Waiving demand and notice. H. E. Folsom. O. C. Miller. G. H. Prouty." The interest was paid by the International Company semiannually down to July 1, 1898. J. A. Prouty died before this suit was brought, and so is not a party. H. E. Folsom pleaded his discharge in insolvency, and a nonsuit was entered as to him. He was adjudged an insolvent in the fall of 1893. On December 19, 1893, and after Folsom had been adjudged an insolvent, plaintiff sent its agent, L. B. Harris, to Newport, Vt., to see G. H. Prouty, who is a son of J. A. Prouty, and O. C. Miller about doing something in respect of the note in suit. After an interview with said Harris, O. C. Miller and G. H. Prouty wrote their names on the back of said note at Newport, Vt., on December 19, 1893. O. C. Miller was the manager of the International Company from 1886 to September 30, 1898. In the fall of 1898 the International Company became financially embarrassed, and O. C. Miller wrote to each creditor of the company, including the plaintiff, a letter dated September 22, 1898, signed by him as manager, stating that the International Company was insolvent, and calling a meeting of the creditors at the office of the company on September 30, 1898. The letter sent to plaintiff also stated: "Although you have good backers on your note, if convenient, should like to have you present at the meeting." Said meeting of the creditors was held September 30, 1898. At said meeting the creditors elected a committee of three, whom they directed to take charge of the assets of the company, realize upon the same, and divide the proceeds pro rata among the creditors of the company. J. W. Copeland, who was a trustee and the vice president of the plaintiff, was present at said meeting, but did not vote. Before any vote was taken he said to the meeting that he was there as the representative of the plaintiff to note the proceedings of the meeting and report to plaintiff's trustees, and that he was without instructions and should not vote. He reported the action of said meeting to the plaintiff. The stockholders of the International Company, at a meeting duly warned and held for that purpose on October 1, 1898, voted that "the company is insolvent," and that its assets be realized upon and disposed of as directed by said creditors' meeting. The evidence of defendants tended to show that thereafter the International Company delivered to said creditors' committee all its assets, and that each creditor, except the plaintiff, executed and delivered to the International Company a writing agreeing to accept, in settlement of their claims, such sums as might be their due, pro rata, from the proceeds realized by said creditors' committee from the assets of the company.

It appeared from the records of the plaintiff that on October 3, 1898, the plaintiff's trustees voted: "To give the assent of the Lyndon Savings Bank to the proposition that the property of the International Company be put into the hands of trustees to be sold to the best advantage, and the proceeds to be divided between the creditors pro rata; the bank reserving all rights to collect its debt from the indorsers of the note." It appeared that on October 15, 1898, plaintiff, by its treasurer, wrote a letter to the International Company, which was received by O. C. Miller in due course of mail, and which gave notice of said vote of plaintiff's trustees. Defendants' evidence tended to show that about October 1, 1898, the International Company surrendered all of its assets to said creditors' committee, who thereafter converted the same into cash, and paid from the proceeds thereof to the creditors, including plaintiff, a dividend of 10 per cent. on each of the following dates: November, 1898; March, 1899; June, 1900; November, 1900—and a dividend of 5 per cent. on each of the following dates: May, 1901; August, 1901; December, 1902; and September, 1903; that each 10 per cent. dividend so paid plaintiff was $507.50, and each 5 per cent. dividend so paid plaintiff was $253.75. There was no evidence tending to show that O. C. Miller ever paid anything on the note in suit. There was no evidence, except said letter dated September 22, 1898, tending to show that O. C. Miller had in any way, since he wrote his name on the back of said note on December 19, 1893, acknowledged any personal liability on said note, or promised to pay it. Only special verdicts were submitted, and in answer to these the jury found that G. H. Prouty and O. C. Miller were makers; that an agreement was made at Newport, Vt., on December 19, 1893, between plaintiff and the International Company for an extension of the time of payment of the note in suit "until plaintiff is dissatisfied with security"; that on December 19, 1893, plaintiff agreed with O. C. Miller and G. H. Prouty that the time of payment on the note in suit should be extended, if said Prouty and Miller wrote their names on the back of said note, but that no particular time for the payment of the note was stated; that a reasonable time for the payment of said note after said agreement was made was "until payment was demanded or offered"; that it was "doubtful" whether the note could have been collected of the International Company at any time from December 19, 1898, to January 1, 1898; that O. C. Miller and G. H. Prouty were not damaged by plaintiff's omission to collect the note in suit from December 19, 1893, to January 1, 1898; that after October 1, 1898, the committee appointed by the creditors of the International Company managed and disposed of the property of said company, and paid from the proceeds thereof the dividends which were paid to the creditors; that the plaintiff, by its conduct with reference to the property of the International Company, and by accepting the dividends from the committee of the creditors of said company, did not discharge said company from further liability; that O. C. Miller and G. H. Prouty did not sign their names on the back of the note in suit in consideration that the plaintiff would not prove that note against H. E. Folsom's insolvent estate, unless compelled by law to do so.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Cook & Norton and W. W. Miles, for plaintiff. Young & Young, for defendants.

TYLER, J. The note in controversy is described in the opinion in this case reported in 75 Vt. 224, 54 Atl. 191. At the first trial in the county court a verdict was directed for the defendants, which action this court held was error, reversed the judgment, and remanded the case for a new trial. We then held that: "What relation Miller and Prouty assumed to the note by placing their names upon it was a question of fact, and not of law. If they became joint makers, no demand was necessary, and this action was properly brought against them. If they were indorsers, it could not be held as matter of law that they waived demand and notice by placing their names under the name of Folsom, who, when the note was executed, signed it as indorser, waiving demand and notice; and if there was an agreement or understanding between the parties that the time of payment should, in consideration of their signing the note, be forborne, there being no time of forbearance specified, it would mean, in law, a reasonable time. What constituted a reasonable time, in the circumstances, was a question of fact for the jury, and, as against Miller and Prouty, the statute of limitations would begin to run at the expiration of such reasonable time." Quoting further from that opinion: "And it has generally been held by this court that one not before a party to the note, who signs his name upon the back of it in blank, is prima facie a maker, and assumes the same obligations as if he wrote his name upon the face of the instrument. In Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355, 49 Am. Dec. 786, the rule was extended and emphasized, for it is there declared that it makes no difference that the signing is long after the making of the note and while it is in circulation, for the reason, as stated by Judge Redfield, that if the signer consents to be thus bound, and induces others to take the note under that expectation, he will be estopped to deny that fact, and will be treated the same as if he had signed the note at its inception. It was, however, held in that case that, the indorsement being in blank, the real obligation intended to be assumed, whether that of maker, guarantor, or indorser, might be shown by parol evidence. In Bank v. Dorset Marble Co., 61 Vt. 106, 17 Atl. 42, this rule was recognized and reaffirmed."

At the last trial the jury found, by special verdicts submitted to them, that Miller and Prouty, by placing their names upon the note, became joint makers thereof; that an agreement was made December 19, 1893, between the plaintiff and the International Company for an extension of the time of payment, but for no definite time; and that a reasonable time to delay its collection was: "Until the plaintiff was dissatisfied with the security." Another special finding was: "Until payment was demanded or offered." There were special findings that the International Company turned over to a committee all its assets to be divided pro rata among its creditors, that the committee paid over the dividends, and that the company was not discharged from further liability. The defendants Miller and Prouty objected, and were allowed an exception to the submission to the jury of the question whether they signed the note as joint makers, and they claimed that there was no evidence that they were joint makers. They also excepted to the submission to the jury to find whether there was an extension of the time of payment of the note, and claimed that there was no evidence to sustain that finding. The defendants contend that this action was barred by the statute of limitations, that no new promise or acknowledgment was shown, and that the note had not matured when the action was commenced. The case shows that no agreement was made at the time the money was loaned and the note was given that either Miller or Prouty should ever become parties to the note, and it appears that neither of them received any security or indemnity for placing their names upon the back of it. Down to that time the note had remained as it was when made by the International Company, with Folsom as indorser. The plaintiff seeks to hold Miller and Prouty liable by reason of their placing their names upon the note, and claims that they thereby became makers. The defendants claim that they became indorsers or guarantors. The general rule of law is found in the opinion of Redfield, J., in Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355, 49 Am. Dec. 786: "That he who writes his name upon the back of a note, if he were not before a party to it, assumes the same obligation as if he wrote his name upon the face of the instrument; and that, although he does this long after the making of the note, it shall make no difference."

But the question of Miller's and Prouty's liability is not to be determined by this rule of law, but by the agreement made between themselves and L. B. Harris, who went to see them and make an arrangement about the payment or an extension of the note. It appeared that the note was overdue; that Folsom had been adjudged insolvent; that the plaintiff employed Harris to go to Newport and call upon Miller and Prouty "to do something about the note"; and that, as a result of the interview, they wrote their names upon the instrument. The exceptions state that the evidence was very conflicting as to what was said between them, and it so appears by the record; but it is not the duty of this court to reconcile the evidence. As there was evidence tending to show that Miller and Prouty signed the note as makers, the submission of that question to the jury was not error. The weight that should be given to the testimony of the witnesses who testified upon this subject was a matter that rested with the jury. The testimony of Harris tended to show that after Folsom became insolvent the plaintiff sent him to see Miller and Prouty about the note; that he saw them at Newport, and informed them that he came as a messenger from the plaintiff to collect the note, if collection could be made, and, if not, to ascertain their wishes, or obtain instruction about proving this, and another note which the plaintiff held, against Folsom's estate; that he told them that Folsom had said that they (the Proutys and Miller) were, practically, the company; that if they would fix the note, so it would be lawful, and safe in the judgment of the bank, it could run as long as they kept the interest paid and the bank considered the security good; that Miller and Prouty both said that the estate of Folsom should not be charged with the loan, and that they would do anything that he (Harris) or the plaintiff required in respect to fixing the note, so as to make it all right without Folsom's name; that they would put their names upon the note; and that they did so after Harris had taken a little time to make inquiry as to their financial responsibility and expressed his willingness to accept their names. This evidence brings the case within the rule in Sylvester v. Downer. Miller, Prouty, and Folsom disputed the testimony of Harris, but it was for the jury to decide as to the weight of evidence, and this court cannot disturb the verdict. Upon the testimony of Harris, the jury were warranted in finding that an agreement was made between the plaintiff and said company for an extension of the time of payment, which was a sufficient consideration for Miller's and Prouty's acts, in view of their interest in the company. It is held that "consideration does not necessarily depend upon whether the thing promised results in a benefit to the promisee or a detriment to the promisor. It is enough that something is promised, or the exercise of a present right is forborne." Ballard v. Burton, 64 Vt. 387, 24 Atl. 769, 16 L. R. A. 664, and cases cited in the opinion.

The defendants contend that, upon the testimony of Harris, the alleged agreement made by him with Miller and Prouty was not operative until accepted by the plaintiff and approved by the inspector of finance. It may be presumed that Harris returned the note to the bank, and that the bank officers were satisfied with the names upon it that Harris had obtained, for they continued to hold it for years thereafter without objection by them, and apparently with the approval of the state official. They also received the interest upon it semiannually down to July, 1898. Miller and Prouty might well have understood that the note had been accepted. That Miller did so understand it is shown by his note to the plaintiff, written nearly five years later, in which he said, "You have good backers on your note," which words must have referred to Mr. Prouty and himself.

The defendants also contend that the case shows no authority in Miller, conferred upon him by the International Company, to make the agreement through Harris with the plaintiff. It is true that no vote of the company was produced by the plaintiff showing that such authority was given Miller, but it appeared from defendant Miller's testimony that he was the general manager of the company at the time he signed his name to the note, that he held that position from 1886 until the fall of 1898, when all the assets of the company were placed in the hands of a committee, converted into money, and the proceeds distributed pro rata among the creditors; the plaintiff reserving the right to proceed against the indorsers upon its note. It is unnecessary to hold as an abstract legal proposition that, as general manager of the corporation, Miller had power to borrow money to meet corporate debts in due course of business. He testified that he had charge of the funds of the company as general manager, and that it was his duty to pay a note when it came due, "or to look out for it." He evidently understood that he and Prouty had authority to sign this note, and the record shows no dissent by the other directors to his agreement for an extension; neither is there any evidence in the case that tends to contradict his testimony.

But, assuming that Miller and Prouty had no authority to make the agreement, they and the company received the benefit of the forbearance, and the company ratified it by paying the interest upon the note for five years after the agreement was made. That the defendants were estopped from denying Miller's and Prouty's authority was held in the former decision. Grand Isle v. Kinney, 70 Vt. 381, 41 Atl. 130, is an authority upon this point. It was said in the former opinion that it could not be held as a matter of law that the vote taken by the plaintiff, and its receipts of dividends from the committee of the International Company, discharged the company. The proposition of the company to its creditors was that they should accept, pro rata, such amounts as should be received from the company's assets in settlement of their respective claims. The plaintiff, by its resolution, assented to the proposition that the property be sold and the proceeds be divided among the creditors, with a reservation of the right to collect its debt from the indorsers of the note; and the company, through its committee, acted upon this acceptance, and subsequently paid dividends to the plaintiff with the other creditors. That the plaintiff should receive its dividends, reserving the right to collect the remainder of its debt from Miller and Prouty, whom the jury have found were joint makers of the note, was a matter of contract between the International Company, through its committee, and the plaintiff. Miller and Prouty were evidently regarded by the plaintiff as responsible; and it is not presumable that it would have released them upon receiving what could be got from the Company's assets, which Miller had said in his notice to the creditors were insufficient to pay the debts in full. It is noticeable that the plaintiff's resolution omitted the word "settlement," which the committee's offer contained. There was no error in the refusal of the court to set aside the ninth special finding.

It is competent for the makers of a promissory note to stipulate therein that they will waive the statute of limitations. Trust Co. v. Sheldon et al., 68 Vt. 259, 35 Atl. 177. The plaintiff contends that, as the jury have found that Miller and Prouty signed this note as joint makers, they became subject to the clause, "and agree to waive all right or claim to the statute of limitations." But it is unnecessary to decide this question, for the jury found that an agreement was made for an extension of the time of payment of the note; that no definite time was agreed upon, but that a reasonable time for such delay was until the plaintiff was dissatisfied with the security—until payment was demanded or offered.

It cannot be maintained that these findings made this instrument a demand note in the ordinary legal meaning of the term "payable on demand." The jury, in effect, found that a right of action did not accrue upon the note until the plaintiff was dissatisfied with the security and made an actual demand of payment; and this was the agreement according to Harris' testimony. Stanton v. Stanton, 37 Vt. 411; Thrall v. Mead's Estate, 40 Vt. 540; Smith v. Franklin, 61 Vt. 385, 17 Atl. 838; Ins.

Co. v. Batchelder & Son, 62 Vt. 148, 19 Atl. 982. The case shows that demand of payment was made of defendants Miller and Prouty on February 5, and February 19, 1901, and that the suit was brought March 7, 1901. The failure of the International Company in 1898, and the nonpayment of interest after that, were sufficient causes for the plaintiff's dissatisfaction with the security.

The finding of the jury that an extension of time of payment was agreed upon by the parties is inconsistent with the defendants' contention that the other finding should be construed to mean that the note was payable immediately after the agreement was made. According to the testimony of Harris, the note was to run along indefinitely, if the interest was kept paid; the only limitation being the time when the plaintiff should become dissatisfied with the security and call for payment. When demand was made, the plaintiff's cause of action accrued against Miller and Prouty. This answers the defendant's suggestion in the brief of counsel that the agreement was in violation of V. S. 4099, which provides that a savings bank shall not make a contract or agreement to loan or to extend the time of payment of a loan on personal security for a longer time than one year.

Upon the special findings, judgment should have been rendered against both Miller and Prouty. Therefore the judgment for defendant Prouty is reversed, the judgment against the International Company and Miller is reversed, pro forma, and judgment is rendered for the plaintiff against the three defendants, with costs.

GUILMONT'S ADM'R v. CENTRAL VERMONT RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Washington. Nov. 9, 1905.)

1. RAILROADS—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for damages on account of the death of plaintiff's intestate, resulting from an accident at a railroad crossing, it appeared that as deceased approached the track and when within 25 feet of it he looked up and down the track and then up the track a second time, that the track was plainly in sight, that he was acquainted with the locality, that the horse moved slowly, and that he was in full possession of the senses of sight and hearing; such facts making it probable that he hastily measured the distance between the train and the crossing, and thought there was time for him to pass over the track before the train reached the crossing. Held, that he was guilty of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Railroads, § 1080.]

2. SAME—CARE AS TO PERSONS SEEN NEAR CROSSING.

Where it appeared that defendant's train was running about 30 miles an hour, and that, when it was within a distance of 150 to 200 feet from the crossing, the engineer saw plaintiff's intestate with a horse and sled 10 to 15 feet from the crossing, that the horse seemed to stop an instant or two and then started, and that, as soon as the engineer saw deceased approach the train, he shut off the steam, applied the emergency brake, and sounded the danger whistle, doing all that he could to stop the train, no negligence on the part of defendant was shown.

Exceptions from Washington County Court; Stafford, Judge.

Action by Israel Guilmont's administrator against the Central Vermont Railway Company. From a judgment for the plaintiff, defendant brings exceptions. Reversed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

F. L. Laird, M. M. Gordon, and R. A. Hoar, for plaintiff. Hunton & Stickney, for defendant.

TYLER, J. This action is brought by the plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Israel Guilmont, deceased, under the statute, to recover damages to the wife and next of kin on account of the death of the intestate, alleged to have been caused by the wrongful act of the defendant.

The defendant's trainmen were running a regular freight train of 11 cars, on its usual time, between Montpelier and Barre, at about 30 miles an hour. As the train approached a certain bridge, the fireman put in a shovel full of coarse coal, the effect of which was to surround the engine with smoke. The distance from this bridge to a highway crossing which the train was approaching was about 800 feet. After the smoke cleared away, so that the engineer could see ahead as far as the crossing, the distance to it was 150 to 200 feet. When the crossing came into view, the engineer saw the intestate, with a horse and sled, 10 to 15 feet from the crossing, and then it was not apparent that he was about to cross. As soon as he was seen to approach the track, the engineer put on the emergency brake and sounded the danger whistle, but it was too late to stop the train and avoid striking the intestate. He was struck and received injuries of which he soon died. It appeared that he stopped a few minutes at the "Tabor House," which was opposite the crossing and about 100 feet from it, and then, without taking reasonable precautions, drove to the railroad track and upon the crossing in front of the train.

The court held and instructed the jury, without exception by the plaintiff, that the intestate was guilty of contributory negligence; but the court further said to the jury, in substance, that the only question for their determination was whether, after the defendant's servants saw, or ought to have seen, the intestate about to cross and in a position of peril, they neglected the reasonable means at their command which might have saved him from accident. The exceptions leave no open question in respect to negligence by the defendant prior to the engineer's discovering the intestate near the crossing. The only question submitted to the jury was in relation to what occurred after the trainmen saw, or ought to have seen, him about to cross, and whether they used all reasonable means to save him.

The case made by the plaintiff shows that as Guilmont approached the railroad track, and when within 25 feet of it, he looked up and down the track and then up the track a second time; that the track was plainly in sight, and that he was acquainted with the locality; that the horse moved slowly but steadily forward, though to some witnesses he seemed to stop or hesitate for an instant before stepping upon the track, and passed over it unharmed. It also appeared that Guilmont and his sleigh had nearly cleared the track when they were struck by the engine. Guilmont was in full possession of the senses of sight and hearing when he undertook this perilous enterprise. The fact that he looked up and down the track before driving upon it makes it probable that he hastily measured the distance between the train and the crossing and thought there was time for him to pass over the track before the train reached the crossing. Whether this was the case or whether he was oblivious to the danger when he attempted to cross the track, the court correctly held him guilty of contributory negligence.

The crew of the train consisted of a conductor, an engineer, a fireman, a forward brakeman, who was then upon the engine, and a rear brakeman, who was upon the rear car. All these men were in their proper places on the train. The engineer testified, and his testimony was not disputed, that when the engine had passed through the bridge, and the smoke and steam had cleared away, so that he could see to the crossing, he saw Guilmont within 10 or 15 feet of the track; that the horse seemed to stop an instant or two; that as soon as he saw him approaching the track he instantly shut off the steam, applied the emergency brake, and sounded the danger whistle; that he did all that he could do to stop the train; that he could not have stopped it more quickly; and that he did all that could have been done to prevent a collision. The engineer had a right to assume, when he saw the intestate driving toward the track, that he would not drive upon it in front of the train. He owed the intestate no duty until he saw him about to drive upon the track and that he was in peril. As the case shows that the engineer then used all the means in his power to stop the train and avoid the collision, the court erred in submitting any question to the jury. The defendant's motion for a verdict should have been granted.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

BELKNAP v. BILLINGS.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Windsor. Nov. 21, 1905.)

PAYMENT—ACCEPTANCE OF NOTE—EFFECT.

Where, in an action for assault, defendant pleaded that plaintiff accepted a note in satisfaction of the cause of action, it was not error to refuse to charge that, a note given and received in payment for a personal injury resulting from a tort is "prima facie payment" therefore, as a note given and received in payment is payment.

Exceptions from Windsor County Court; Watson, Judge.

Action by Roswell Belknap against Albert Billings. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Affirmed.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Joseph C. Enright and Edward R. Buck, for plaintiff. Davis & Davis, for defendant.

HASELTON, J. This was an action of trespass for assault and battery. The defendant filed four pleas, one of which was that the defendant gave and the plaintiff accepted a certain promissory note in full satisfaction and discharge of the alleged cause of action. To this plea the plaintiff replied that the note therein mentioned was not accepted by the plaintiff in payment and satisfaction of the cause of action in the declaration alleged, but that the note was accepted as satisfaction only on condition that it be paid when due, and that the note was long overdue and remained unpaid. At the June term, 1902, of the Windsor county court this replication was held sufficient on demurrer, and later this court so held. See Belknap v. Billings, 76 Vt. 54, 56 Atl. 174, where the pleadings, which are referred to in the bill of exceptions herein, are stated with sufficient fullness. At the December term, 1904, of the Windsor county court, the case was tried by jury on its merits, and came here on a single exception.

That exception is to the refusal of the court to comply with a request to charge: "That a promissory note given and received in payment for personal injury resulting from a tort is prima facie payment therefore, and a suit cannot be maintained for that tort, whether the note be paid or not." But if a note is, in fact, given and received in payment, it is payment. To say expressly or impliedly that it is merely prima facie payment, when given and received in payment, would be confusing and incorrect, and the court rightly declined to comply with the request. The briefs of counsel have largely to do with propositions other than that embodied in the request which the court did not in terms comply with. In this case, the parties were at issue as to whether the accepting of a certain note was to operate as payment or not. The defendant claimed, and his evidence tended to show, that it was so agreed; but the plaintiff claimed, and his evidence tended to show, that the note was to operate as payment only in case it should be paid when due. The full charge is referred to, and upon examining it we find that the jury were correctly and fully instructed upon the subject-matter which the request was probably intended to cover.

Judgment affirmed.

POMEROY v. KELTON.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Rutland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

QUO WARRANTO—MISCONDUCT OF PETITIONER.

Where, on petition by a private prosecutor for quo warranto to try title to an office, for which petitioner and respondent were opposing candidates, it appeared that intoxicating liquor was, with some system and to a considerable extent, furnished to voters at the election, while the polls were open, in the interest of petitioner and through his connivance, the writ would be denied on the ground of public policy.

Petition by Edward Pomeroy for a writ of quo warranto against Guy O. Kelton to try title to the office of alderman of the Eleventh Ward of the city of Rutland. Writ denied.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

O. M. Barber, E. H. O'Brien, and T. H. Brown, for relator. Buller & Moloney, for defendant.

HASELTON, J. This is a complaint in the nature of a quo warranto, brought by Edward Pomeroy against Guy O. Kelton, asking judgment of ouster of the said Kelton from the office of alderman from the Eleventh Ward of the city of Rutland, and judgment that the complainant was lawfully elected to and is now entitled to hold said office and to exercise the functions thereof. The election brought in review is that held in Ward 11 of the city of Rutland on March 7, 1905, for the choice of an alderman and other officers. At the election 116 votes for alderman were counted for the relator, Pomeroy, and 117 votes were counted for the defendant, Kelton, and the said Kelton was accordingly declared elected.

A large amount of evidence has been taken by which it is clearly established that at the election in question intoxicating liquor was, with some system and to a considerable extent, furnished to voters while the polls were open, and that this liquor was so furnished in the interest of the relator and through his connivance. This being so, the relator does not come into court with clean hands, and the court will not, at the relator's instance, inquire into the matters and things complained of by him. The plying of voters with intoxicating liquor during voting hours, at any election, is contrary to the spirit of our Constitution and laws, and is manifestly obnoxious to public policy. A complaint for a quo warranto is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and it would be unbefitting and demoralizing for this court to act on the complaint of a private relator who stands as a wrongdoer in respect to the very thing in issue. The relator is asking the court to aid him in securing an official position which he sought to obtain on election day by a course having a natural tendency to defeat the free and voluntary choice of the voters. For the court to lend such aid would be a reproach to the law and to the administration thereof. Had this complaint been preferred and prosecuted by the state's attorney for Rutland county, other principles would be applicable, and the duty devolving upon the court might be different from that which we are now clearly bound to perform. State v. Harris, 52 Vt. 216.

The complaint is dismissed, with costs.

MASSUCCO v. TOMASSI.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Washington. Nov. 9, 1905.)

1. BREACH OF MARRIAGE PROMISE—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF DEFENDANT.

In an action for breach of marriage promise, it was not error to permit plaintiff to testify that, when defendant proposed marriage, he stated that he was worth a certain amount of money.

2. SAME—REPRESENTATIONS OF DEFENDANT.

In an action for breach of marriage promise, it appeared that the parties had been married by religious ceremony in Italy at a time when such ceremony did not bring about a valid marriage, and plaintiff testified that, while negotiations were going on between herself and defendant relative to the contemplated marriage, he told her that the reason why a civil marriage was also necessary was in regard to the property, and that marriage by the church alone was not so strong as marriage by both the church and civil authority. Held, that there was no error in admitting such testimony.

3. SAME—CONVERSATIONS WITH PRIEST.

It is not error to permit plaintiff to testify that, while she and defendant were consulting with the priest, defendant asked the priest whether plaintiff could marry, and that the priest said she could, as she was 21 years old.

4. SAME—TESTIMONY OF PLAINTIFF—FAILURE TO MARRY.

It was not error to permit plaintiff to testify that, except the religious ceremony, no marriage ceremony was ever performed.

5. WITNESSES—REDIRECT EXAMINATION—EXPLANATION.

It was not error to permit plaintiff to testify on re-examination, after having testified that she considered herself defendant's wife, that she did not claim to be his legal wife, having been married only in church.

6. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—LAWS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

It was proper to permit an Italian priest to testify that a marriage by religious ceremony alone did not constitute a legal marriage in Italy at the time a certain ceremony was performed; the witness having been shown to be duly qualified.

7. BREACH OF MARRIAGE PROMISE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for breach of marriage promise, it appeared that plaintiff had been married to defendant by a religious ceremony in Italy, which at that time did not bring about a valid marriage, and that thereafter she had lived with him, an instruction that, in considering plaintiff's damages, the jury should have a right to consider the fact of the parties living together as an element of damage, was proper.

8. CONTINUANCE—TRIAL COURT'S DISCRETION.

Questions of continuance, as a rule, rest in the discretion of the trial court.

9. NEW TRIAL—ACCIDENT PREVENTING DEFENSE.

Under V. S. 1662, giving the Supreme Court a right to grant a new trial on petition of either party subsequent to the term at which the original judgment was rendered, a defendant, who was prevented from making a defense owing to the fact that he resided in Italy, and was prevented from attending the trial by sickness and by the death of his father, was entitled to a new trial, inasmuch as such sickness and death might be considered accidental causes.

Exceptions from Washington County Court; Stafford, Judge.

Action by Irene Massucco against Dominico Tomassi. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant brings exceptions. Affirmed.

The defendant excepted to allowing a certain witness to testify that, when defendant came to her with the proposal of marriage, he said he was worth $30,000; to the plaintiff being allowed to testify that, while negotiations were going on between herself and defendant relative to the contemplated marriage, he told her that the reason why a civil marriage was necessary was "in regard to the property," and because marriage by the church alone was not so strong as marriage by both church and civil authority; to the plaintiff being allowed to testify that, when she and defendant together were consulting with the priest about getting married, defendant asked the priest whether the plaintiff could get married, and that the priest answered that, being 21 years old, she could; to the plaintiff being allowed to testify that, except the religious already referred to, no marriage ceremony was ever performed between herself and defendant; to plaintiff being allowed to testify on re-examination, after having testified that she considered herself defendant's wife, that she did not claim to be his legal wife, having been married only in church; to an Italian priest being allowed to testify that a marriage by religious ceremony alone did not constitute a legal marriage in Italy at the time in question, the court having found the witness duly qualified. At the close of the evidence defendant moved for a verdict upon the grounds that "the plaintiff says she was married, and that the priest gave her a certificate; that the parties considered themselves legally married; that she still says she is defendant's wife; that she lived with him as such in Vermont, and having done so under the form of a marriage cannot bring this action; that if it came to her attention and knowledge that the marriage was not legal, and she continued to cohabit with him, she cannot maintain this action; that she only claims that the civil marriage would make it stronger, not that it would not be a valid marriage without it." This motion was overruled, to which defendant excepted. The defendant also excepted to that portion of the charge "as to the relation that existed between the plaintiff and the defendant as an element of damage," claiming that "under the circumstances in which they went to living together it would not be an element." That portion of the charge was as follows: "In estimating the damages, you will consider the rank and condition in which each of the parties stood; you will consider what advantage to her the marriage would have been socially and in a pecuniary way; you will consider what advantage it would have been to her to have him marry according to his promise at the time he agreed to do so, and how much she has lost by his breach of that promise; and, in considering that question, you will have a right to consider, if you find it to be the fact, that she lived with him as his wife, gave herself to him as his wife, in reliance upon his promise to marry her. You have a right to consider that as an element of damage, with the other elements in the case. Damages are intended always as compensation, and it is for you, in your sound judgment, to say what sum of money will fairly compensate the plaintiff for defendant's breach of his promise, so that, so far as money will do it, she will be made whole for his not having done what he said he would do."

The defendant also brought his petition for a new trial, under V. S. 1662, to the Supreme Court for Washington county at its January term, 1905. Said petition was heard on testimony taken and filed at the May term, 1905, together with defendant's exceptions. The opinion states the substance of said petition and of the testimony taken in support thereof.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, START, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Lard & Carleton, for plaintiff. J. P. Lamson and A. M. Sartorelli, for defendant.

TYLER, J. Action for alleged breach of a promise to marry. Upon an examination of the defendant's exceptions we find none of them sustainable as ground for a reversal of the judgment rendered by the court below. It was competent for the plaintiff to show by her own testimony what the defendant told her, and by the testimony of a witness, who claimed to have knowledge upon the subject, what the amount of the defendant's property was at the time of the alleged promise. An Italian priest was permitted to testify that a marriage by religious ceremony alone did not constitute a legal marriage in Italy. In this there was no error, as the record shows that the court first found that the witness was duly qualified to testify upon the subject. See Reg. v. Parry, 14 Eng. Law & Eq. 549; Watson v. Walker, 23 N. H. 472, cited by defendant. Judgment affirmed.

On Petition for a New Trial.

The suit was brought for an alleged breach of promise of marriage. It stood for trial at the March term, 1903, Washington county court, and the defendant came from Italy to make defense; but, the plaintiff not being ready for trial when the case was reached, it was displaced, and the pressure of other business prevented its being tried at that term. At the following September term it was continued upon proof of the defendant's sickness in Italy. Besides, it was not reached in its order. At the March term, 1904, several cases before it having been disposed of, it was second for trial. The defendant's counsel applied to the court to have the trial postponed until a later day in the term, so that the defendant could arrive from Italy; but the court denied the application and held that the trial must proceed. The case was tried in the defendant's absence, and the plaintiff obtained a large verdict. The defendant arrived in court April 10th, after verdict and judgment.

The plaintiff testified at the trial that a few months after the death of the defendant's wife, who was her sister, the defendant went to the village in Italy where she resided with her father, paid attentions to her for some time, and then proposed a marriage with her; that she assented, and, upon the advice of a priest whom they consulted, a church ceremony was performed, upon an agreement between themselves and their promise to the priest that they would be legally married upon their arrival in this country; that soon after their arrival in Montpelier the plaintiff requested the defendant to have the marriage legally performed, but the defendant delayed the marriage on the pretense that he must receive a certain paper from Rome before they could be lawfully married, and that he put off the marriage for a year with this excuse, though she constantly urged its performance; that during this time she lived with the defendant as his wife, worked in his store, kept his house, and cared for his children; that at the end of a year they returned to Italy and lived there in the same relations about 10 months, she urging the marriage and he delaying it with various excuses; that she then left him and returned to St. Albans, in this state, with her sister and her sister's husband, who was the defendant's brother. She denied making any settlement with the defendant, and denied receiving any money from him or from his brother. It appeared that soon after the plaintiff returned to this country the defendant married another woman. Testimony was given in behalf of the plaintiff at the trial tending to show that the defendant was worth $30,000 when he made the promise of marriage.

The material facts set out in the petition and the other affidavits attached are that about six months after the death of the petitioner's wife, in January, 1899, the petitioner, who resided with her father in Italy, wrote a letter to the petitioner, complaining of her father's ill treatment of her and offering to come to Montpelier, where the petitioner resided, and take care of his house and children; that he sent her money with which to pay her fare; that a few weeks later she wrote him that her father had taken the money and she was unable to make the journey; that in March following he went to Italy to visit his parents; that while there he met the petitioner several times, and that it was finally decided that she should return with him to Montpelier; that upon the advice of a priest a religious ceremony was performed prior to their departure, but did not constitute a legal marriage, as both parties understood, and that the priest said they could be married at any time in America; that they arrived in Montpelier early in May of that year; that the petitioner soon developed a violent temper and treated the petitioner and his children rudely, and expressed a wish to leave his house; that she continued this abusive conduct towards him and his children for a year, when, not being able to endure it longer, he sold a profitable business and returned with her and the children to Italy, where they lived together until March, 1901, when the petitioner returned to this state with the petitioner's brother, who, with his wife, was coming here; that before she left he made a settlement with her, by which his brother, who owed him $1,000, was to pay her $600 in settlement; that the brother subsequently paid him $400 and held the $600 for the petitioner by her request, he agreeing to pay her interest thereon; that the petitioner never requested the petitioner to marry her, but refused to marry him and refused to live with him; and that he never lived with her as his wife. The petitioner also deposes that he was not worth more than $5,000 at the time the petitioner left him, and that she knew that fact.

The petitioner's attorney makes affidavit of the following facts in support of the petition: That he had informed his client by letter how his case stood, and that he must be in Montpelier the last of February or first of March; that he replied from Italy that he was not then able to make the journey, but believed he would be in March; that the attorney wrote him again urging him to be there on a certain day; that on March 6th he received a letter from him, saying that he would be there early in April and to hold the case for trial, and expressed a wish to have it tried as soon as it could be got ready after his arrival; that the attorney informed the court of the situation and that the defendant would be here to try the case in April; that the plaintiff's attorneys were willing that it be set at a later day, provided it would not result in a continuance, and that they so stated to the court; that the defendant's attorney showed the court the defendant's letter received by him March 6th.

It appears that the parties are at variance in respect to the promise of marriage, their relations while they lived together, the settlement, and the petitioner's financial means. The petitioner was entitled to a reasonable opportunity to make a defense in the court below. He did not have his day in court, and a large verdict was rendered against him. The question is whether he is entitled to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted him. The petition is not based upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, but upon the claim that the petitioner was, by accident, prevented from making a defense to the action.

Questions of continuance and of assigning cases for trial must, as a rule, rest in the discretion of the trial courts, and we do not revise the action of the court below based upon the evidence that was before it. At the time the trial began the court doubtless had reason to believe that the defendant's alleged sickness was a pretense for a delay. No evidence of his sickness was shown otherwise than by his letters to his counsel, but he now makes affidavit that he was prevented by sickness from making the journey until the last of March, that the death of his father, which occurred March 9th, delayed him, that he should have come here the last of February, as requested by his counsel, had he not been prevented by sickness. If the court had known the facts which now appear in the petition and affidavit that the defendant intended to make defense and would be in court for that purpose before the term closed, we may assume that it would have deferred the trial, certainly with knowledge that the defendant's delay was caused by his sickness and the death of his father. The jury lawfully assessed the damages in view of what they understood to be the defendant's pecuniary ability. It was for this purpose that the plaintiff introduced evidence in respect to the defendant's property. If it is true, and the jury had known the fact, as the petitioner deposes, that he was not worth more than $5,000, it is reasonable to suppose that the verdict would have been for a smaller sum.

The question is whether the case presented comes within V. S. 1662, which reads: "The Supreme Court may grant a new trial in a cause determined by such court, or by a county court, on petition of either party, subsequent to the term of the court at which the original judgment was rendered." The Legislature has placed no limitation upon the power of the court to grant new trials under this section of the statute, nor prescribed the grounds for new trials. The court has repeatedly construed the statute and fixed the boundaries of its power. It is evident that both the Legislature and the court have intended to give a "broad scope" to this power, as was said in Nelson v. Marshall, 77 Vt. 44, 58 Atl. 793. In that case it was held that a party was entitled to a new trial, for the reason that by accident she had been prevented from filing her exceptions within the time required by law. The broad construction there given to this section, aided by the provision of section 1664, clearly entitle the petitioner to a new trial.

Webster defines accident as an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause, and therefore not expected; chance, casualty, contingency. The word has often received judicial construction. In Bostwick v. Stiles, 35 Conn. 198, it is said that it includes, not only inevitable casualties, such as are caused by the act of God, but also those that arise from unforeseen occurrences, misfortunes, losses, and acts or omissions of other persons without the fault, neglect, or misconduct of the party. Alexander v. Bailey, 2 Lea, 639; State v. Lewis, 107 N. C. 978, 12 S. E. 457, 13 S. E. 247, 11 L. R. A. 105. See 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. 272, and notes. In the same line of reasoning are Webster v. Smith, 72 Vt. 12, 47 Atl. 101; and Bradley Fertilizer Co. v. Fuller, 58 Vt. 315, 2 Atl. 162. Rowell, J., in Kopper v. Dyer, 59 Vt. 478, 9 Atl. 4, 59 Am. Rep. 742, aptly quotes from 2 Pom. Eq. § 823, note 1: "Accident is an unforeseen and unexpected event, occurring external to the party affected by it, and of which his own agency is not the proximate cause, whereby, contrary to his own intention and wish, he loses some legal right or becomes subjected to some legal liability, and another person acquires a corresponding legal right, which it would be a violation of good conscience for the latter person, under the circumstances, to retain." In that opinion the writer proceeds to say: "And the chief point of the thing is that, because of the unforeseen and unexpected character of the occurrence by which the legal relation of the parties has been unintentionally changed, the party injuriously affected thereby is in good conscience entitled to relief that will restore those relations to their original character, and place him in his former position."

We think that the petitioner's sickness and the death of his father may properly be considered accidental causes of his failure to appear in court upon the trial of his case, and that he is entitled to a new trial.

Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and a new trial granted.

LEWIS v. JOHN CRANE & SONS.

(Supreme Court of Vermont. Caledonia. Nov. 21, 1905.)

1. PARTNERSHIP—ACTIONS AGAINST PARTNERS.

In an action for negligence brought against defendants "as individuals or as partners," defendants are not entitled to have plaintiff ordered to elect whether he will proceed against defendants as individuals or as partners.

2. TRIAL—OPENING STATEMENTS—DECLARATIONS AS TO LAW.

The action of plaintiff's counsel in stating his contentions as to the law in his opening statement, and in falling into inaccuracy in some of his statements, was not ground of exception, where he expressly disclaimed a correct legal form for his statement, and reminded the jury that they were to take the law from the court, and said nothing of an inflammatory character, and suggested that the claim of defendants would differ from that of plaintiff.

3. PLEADING — DEMURRER — GROUNDS — DUPLICITY.

Duplicity in a count of a declaration is ground for demurrer, but not for a motion to compel an election.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 434.]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a servant, caused by an unsafe hook which sustained one end of a swing staging, evidence as to the kind of staging used was admissible.

5. SAME.

Evidence that the hook was given to defendants on purchasing some ladders at a stated price was admissible.

6. SAME.

Evidence by a blacksmith, who did some work upon the hook, as to the character of the hook and to the effect which his work would tend to have in weakening it, and that he told one of the defendants about the hook, was admissible.

7. SAME.

Evidence of a witness, who was present when the officer served the writ in the case, that she was then shown parts of the broken hook by defendant's wife, and describing the parts so shown to her, was admissible.

8. SAME.

Evidence of a competent blacksmith, who repaired the hook a short time before the accident, as to the ways in which the hook could have been repaired, and that the hook had the characteristics of poor iron, was admissible.

9. EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Evidence of an experienced painter, who had made great use of swing stagings, as to the weight which a hook of the size in question would support, and that he would guaranty that a staging supported by such a hook would hold a certain weight, was admissible.

10. SAME.

Evidence of a carpenter of long experience, as to whether swing staging was safe and suitable for work such as that in question, was properly excluded, where the general safety of swing stagings was assumed by counsel for both parties and the court not to be in issue in the case.

11. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

Evidence as to what defendant would have done with the hook, if he had been told that it was poor iron and not safe, was properly excluded.

12. SAME.

Evidence that defendant was in charge of the inside arrangement of the building on which the work was being done, the injury having occurred while plaintiff was at work on the clapping, was inadmissible to show that defendant was in charge of the clapping, and should have been excluded.

13. WITNESSES—RE-EXAMINATION—MATTERS INVOLVED IN CROSS-EXAMINATION.

A party cannot object to the re-examination of a witness on matters which he himself has brought out on cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 1003.]

14. DAMAGES—PLEADING—VARIANCE—PERSONAL INJURIES.

A declaration alleging injuries to plaintiff's legs, back, and body, but not describing with any precision the parts claimed to be injured, is broad enough to authorize the admission of evidence as to the condition of plaintiff's ankle.

15. APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the objection to evidence of the condition of an injured ankle at the time of trial is that it is not admissible under the declaration, it will be presumed on appeal, in the absence of a showing to the contrary in the bill of exceptions, that the evidence was connected with testimony as to the injuries sustained.

16. EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—PERSONAL INJURIES.

In an action for injuries resulting in a stiff ankle, a physician may testify as an expert as to the nature of the stiffness, the motions and actions that it will impede, its causes, and its character as temporary or permanent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2337.]

17. PARTNERSHIP—ACTION AGAINST PARTNERS—EVIDENCE—RELATIONSHIP OF DEFENDANTS.

In an action for negligence brought against defendants "as individuals or as partners," plaintiff may inquire into the business relations of defendants between themselves, although he declines to elect whether he will proceed against them as individuals or as partners.

18. DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES—EVIDENCE—WAGES.

In an action for personal injuries, evidence as to plaintiff's wages at times shortly before the occurrence of the injury in question is admissible on the issue of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Damages, §§ 237, 498.]

19. TRIAL—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

A verdict will not be directed for defendants, if one count of the declaration is good and there is evidence to support it.

20. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—IRREGULARITIES AFFECTING JURORS' DELIBERATIONS.

In an action for personal injuries, the fact that certain models, which had not been received in evidence, were discovered in the jury room after the jury had retired to consider their verdict, was not ground for setting aside the verdict or discharging the jury, where, immediately upon discovery of the fact, the court called the jury into the courtroom and admonished them, and the jury had agreed upon a verdict for plaintiff before the models got into their possession.

Exceptions from Caledonia County Court; Munson, Judge.

Action by M. A. Lewes against John Crane & Sons. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants excepted. Reversed.

Argued before TYLER, START, WATSON, and HASELTON, JJ.; and reargued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, WATSON, HASELTON, and POWERS, JJ.

Herbert I. Goss and Dunnett & Slack, for plaintiff. J. P. Lamson, for defendants.

HASELTON, J. This was an action on the case in which the plaintiff sought to recover for injuries alleged to have been sustained through the negligence of the defendants. The cause was tried by jury at the June term, 1901, of the Caledonia county court. A verdict was returned for the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered thereon. The defendants excepted.

The defendants were set up in the writ as John Crane, Charles Crane, and George Crane, "as individuals or as partners under the firm name and style of John Crane & Sons." Before the introduction of any evidence the defendants moved that the plaintiff be required to elect whether he would proceed against the defendants as individuals or as partners. But the doctrine invoked was not applicable. The action being what it was, the defendants were not entitled to have the plaintiff ordered to elect in what way he would attempt to connect the defendants. The motion was properly overruled.

In an opening statement to the jury the plaintiff's counsel briefly outlined his claim with regard to the law of negligence. The gist of the statement in this regard was that negligence is a shortage of duty; but some expressions were used which deviated from an accurate definition of negligence. Counsel expressly disclaimed that such statement was made in correct legal form, and at the outset reminded the jury that they were to take the law from the court. There was nothing of an inflammatory character in the statement, and what was said about the law was put forward in a way that suggested to the jury that the claim of the defendants would differ from that of the plaintiff. An exception was taken to the opening statement, but it avails nothing. In so holding there is no intention on the part of the court of giving countenance to the idea that counsel may argue the law to the jury, or read law to the jury, or treat as open questions of law upon which the court has ruled, or in any way seek to have the jury understand that they can do otherwise than to take the law from the court.

At the close of the plaintiff's opening statement the defendants claimed that the plaintiff had alleged more than one cause of action in the same count and moved that the plaintiff be compelled to elect which of such causes of action he would rely upon. The motion was overruled, and the defendants excepted. This motion was properly overruled. If the count in question was bad for duplicity and the defendants desired any ruling or action of the court on that account, they should have demurred. Onion v. Clark, 18 Vt. 363.

The following quotation from the exceptions shows, in brief, what the case on trial was: "The accident occurred November 3, 1899, while plaintiff was working for the defendants on a barn they were building on their premises in Cabot. The negligence complained of was the furnishing by defendants of an unsafe iron hook which sustained one end of a swing staging." Evidence as to the kind of a staging used was received under objection and exception by the defendants; but very clearly nobody could testify intelligibly about the character of the hook in question, unless evidence was received with regard to the kind of a staging of which it formed a part and with regard to its function as a part of such staging.

Evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that in the August next before the accident the defendants purchased some ladders at the price put upon them, which was $7.50, and that at the time of the purchase they were shown the staging hook in question and another, and allowed, if they desired, to take the hooks with the ladders without paying anything in addition to the price put upon the ladders; that the defendants paid the price put upon the ladders and took the hooks with them, and that the hooks were put into a stable and were not used until a few days before the accident. The testimony as to the amount paid for the ladders and as to the throwing in of the hooks was received subject to objection and exception on the part of the defendants. But the fact, if it was a fact, that in the sale and purchase of the ladders the hooks were treated as the testimony tended to show they were, was a circumstance proper for the jury to consider along with the other circumstances which they might find in their efforts to determine what the defendants knew or ought to have found out about the hook in question. The price paid for the ladders, or any other fact about the ladders, taken by itself, was wholly immaterial, as there was no claim or evidence that the ladders had anything to do with the accident. The price paid for the ladders could not have been received and treated otherwise than as an incident of the transaction through which the defendants got the hook in question; and we discover no error in the reception of the testimony on the part of the plaintiff relative to the acquirement by the defendants of the hooks and ladders.

It appeared that the hook in question was procured by the defendants from one Parlin, and there was evidence tending to show that one Wales, a blacksmith, did some work upon the hook during the summer before the occurrence of the claimed injury to the plaintiff, and while Parlin had the use of the hook. Wales was a witness in behalf of the plaintiff, and was permitted to testify to the character of the hook upon which he did the work and to the effect which his work upon the hook would tend to have in weakening it, and that he told one of the defendants about this poor hook. A part of this evidence was received under objection and exception, but all of it was admissible, since, as had been said, there was evidence tending to show that the hook upon which the blacksmith Wales did his work was the hook complained of.

Evidence in the case tended to show that the defendants had no hooks except the two already referred to. In connection with this evidence one Ada Stone, who it appeared was at the defendants' house when an officer went there to serve the writ in the case, was permitted to testify that at that time Mrs. Crane showed the parts of the broken hook, and said witness Ada described the pieces so exhibited, the shape and size of the hook, the angle and location of the break, and the indications of welding. This was not evidence on the part of Mrs. Crane, but was the evidence of a competent witness tending to show the appearance of the parts of the hook in question when she chanced to see them. This testimony of Ada Stone was received subject to objection and exception by the defendants, but there can be no doubt of its admissibility. In their brief the defendants' counsel make no serious contention here, but say: "Perhaps the evidence of Ada Stone was admissible." The exceptions state that "at the trial the defendants were requested to produce the parts of the hook which broke, but did not know their whereabouts." This statement makes it doubly sure that there was no error in the reception of the evidence of Miss Stone.

Charles Preston, a carpenter, was one of the plaintiff's witnesses. It is stated in the exceptions that on cross-examination by the defendants he testified as to "the general danger arising from swing stagings." Thereafter, upon re-examination, he testified, in effect, that he thought the danger that such a staging would swing away from the building might be avoided. This testimony upon re-examination came in under objection and exception on the part of the defendants. But we assume from the language of the exceptions that the defendants had on cross-examination made Preston their witness in respect to the danger arising from the use of swing stagings, and that so they have no ground to complain because during the re-examination of the witness in behalf of the plaintiff he was examined upon that point.

It appeared that the second day before the breaking of the hook it was repaired by one Myers, the repairs consisting in cutting and mending. The plaintiff called Myers as a witness, and the witness told how he mended the hook. Under the defendants' objection and exception he was then asked whether it could have been repaired in any other way by a blacksmith. His reply was: "It could have been patched." Under objection and exception he testified to the characteristics of iron which is not good when it is heated and scarfed. His evidence tended to show that the hook in question had the characteristics of poor iron, and that while the hook was at his shop and after he had mended it he informed the defendant John that the hook was made of poor iron and was unsafe. The exceptions state that the witness Myers was a competent blacksmith. So far as the exceptions show all the testimony of Myers was properly received. It was the testimony of a competent blacksmith tending to show that before the accident he had mended the hook in the only way it could be mended without patching, that he had discovered that it was poor in quality, and that after he had mended it, but before it was taken from his shop, he notified one of the defendants that it was unsafe. His testimony about the ways in which the hook could be mended, in connection with all his testimony, had a bearing upon the condition in which the hook was.

The plaintiff's declaration alleged injuries to his legs, back, and body resulting in inability to labor. Physicians called by the plaintiff testified, under the defendants' objection and exception, to the condition of the plaintiff's ankle at the time of the trial, as to the amount of stiffness that remained, and, as experts, as to what effect the existing stiffness would have on the ability of the plaintiff to get about and work. The objection made to their testimony as to the condition of the plaintiff's ankle was solely that it was not admissible under the declaration. But the alleged injuries made this testimony admissible. It was not necessary to the admission of this evidence that the parts claimed to be injured should be described with anatomical nicety. The testimony as to the condition of the ankle at the time of the trial is presumed to have been connected with testimony as to the claimed injuries, since the bill of exceptions discloses nothing to the contrary, and since the objection was as is above stated. The objection to the testimony of the doctors as to what effect the existing stiffness would have on the plaintiff's ability to get around and work was that the subject-matter was not proper for expert evidence. But it would require an expert to tell the nature of the stiffness, the motions and actions that it would impede, if it would impede any, and the expert evidence was properly received. Whether such stiffness as was found resulted from muscular inflammation, from an injured tendon, from an impairment of the nerves of motion, or from voluntary control thereof by the plaintiff or from some other cause, whether the rigidity was likely to be relieved or to be aggravated by exercise, whether it was temporary or permanent in its nature, were all matters upon which the opinion of experts could properly be taken. What the expert testimony in fact tended to show does not appear from the bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff called one Lewis Gingras, who testified that he had been a painter for many years, that he had made great use of swing stagings in outside painting, that during the painting season eight or nine men employed by him had used such stagings, and that he had used hooks made from $1\frac{1}{4}$ -inch iron as well as others. So far his testimony was of a qualifying character. He then testified to the way in which such stagings were attached to a building, that a staging supported by iron hooks of the size named would hold 1,100 to 1,200 pounds, more or less, that he would guaranty it to hold that much, and that it would be safe to have on one end of such a staging supported by one hook "two or three men at least and the stock." Other painters testified to the same subject-matter. All of this testimony of the painters was received subject to objection and exception on the part of the defendants. We make no criticism here upon the use by Gingras of the word "guaranty." The word was inapt, but the jury could have attached no technical meaning to it. They must have understood it as a strong expression of opinion, and a majority of the court think that the witness was properly testifying, not to the safety of swing stagings in general, but merely to the normal strength of an iron hook of the diameter of the one which broke. In this view the reception of the evidence of Gingras was not error.

The plaintiff called two of the three defendants, and these two testified that all three "were interested in the farm and farming, and were partners under the firm name of John Crane & Sons." The defendants objected to this evidence on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to inquire into the business relations of the defendants, so long as he declined to elect whether he would proceed against them as individuals or as partners. To the reception of the evidence the defendants excepted. At another stage of the trial the defendants renewed their motion to have the plaintiff elect whether he would attempt to hold the defendants as individuals or as partners. The motion was overruled, and the defendants excepted. In all that relates to this matter of election there was no error on the part of the court, and no more need be said in regard to that subject than is found in the opening part of this opinion.

The defendants called one Wood, a carpenter of long experience in putting up buildings, and asked him "whether swing staging was safe and suitable for carpenter stagings for clabboarding a barn." This question was properly excluded. Counsel on both sides, in argument before this court, take the position that the general safety of swing stagings was a matter not properly in the case, and the charge of the court proceeded upon that ground. Besides, the exceptions show no offer in connection with the question. State v. Buck, 74 Vt. 29, 51 Atl. 1087; Fuller v. Valiquette, 70 Vt. 502, 41 Atl. 579.

Subject to objection and exception by the defendants, evidence was introduced by the plaintiff tending to show his wages at times shortly before the occurrence of the injury in question. This evidence bore upon the question of damages, and so was properly received.

The defendant John denied that the blacksmith, Myers, gave him the information testified to by Myers about the hook which broke. In this state of the testimony the defendants asked the said John this question: "What would you have done with this hook if Myers had told you that it was poor iron and not safe?" The question was excluded and its exclusion was proper. The answer would have been mere conjecture.

The plaintiff claimed, and his evidence tended to show, that the defendant Charles supervised the work. The defendants' evidence tended to show that Charles had had no experience as a carpenter except on this job, and that the plaintiff had charge of the work, and that Charles worked under him. As to George, the exceptions recite that: "The evidence tended to show that the defendant George Crane had nothing to do with clapboarding or finishing the barn." In this state of the evidence the plaintiff was allowed, under the objection and exception of the defendants, to introduce evidence tending to show that the questions which came up as to the inside arrangements of the barn, including the location of the stable, were determined by the defendants Charles and George, and not by the plaintiff. It is, in effect, claimed by the plaintiff that this evidence bore upon the question of who was actually overseeing the work of clapboarding which was in progress at the time of the accident. But the evidence had no such bearing. Assuming the fact to be that the defendants Charles and George determined the inside arrangements of their barn, such as the location of the stable and all that the phrase "inside arrangements" imports, this fact had nothing to do with the question of who was superintending the work of clapboarding at the time of the injury. The admission of this evidence was error, and neither from the bill of exceptions nor from the briefs of counsel are a majority of the court led to suppose that the error was harmless.

The defendants called the wife of the defendant John Crane, and offered to show by her several matters material to the case. The offered evidence of Mrs. Crane was excluded, and the defendants excepted. With reference to the rulings of the court excluding the testimony of Mrs. Crane, the bill of exceptions refers to the entire case and makes the transcript thereof controlling. An examination of the transcript shows that the correctness of these rulings could only be determined by a critical examination of shifting, and apparently conflicting, evidence given by the same witness, and by a determination of the attitude which counsel took in regard to the matter of the testimony offered. The subject of her right to testify came up at various times and in various ways and under various claims and concessions on the part of counsel for defendants. This being so, and a reversal being necessary, and the law as to the competency of husband and wife as witnesses being now different from what it was when this case was tried, it is uncalled for and would be unprofitable to decide, and it is not decided, whether, upon any point or in anybody's favor, Mrs. Crane should have been allowed to testify.

Exceptions to a few other rulings relating to evidence, and exceptions to the charge of the court, all of which depended for their correctness upon the view taken of the evidence, are not here reviewed, either because the court was so clearly right as to make discussion unproductive, and therefore superfluous, or because the exceptions relate to matters which in no likelihood would arise on another trial.

At the close of all the evidence the defendants made a motion to have a verdict directed in their favor. This motion was a renewal of a motion made at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and was overruled; the defendants excepting. Several grounds for the motion were assigned; but since a verdict will not be directed if one count is good, and there is evidence to support it, the motion rested upon two grounds, assumption of risks by the plaintiff, and contributory negligence on his part. With reference to these grounds we have examined the entire case, and we find the evidence to be so conflicting as to the conduct of the plaintiff, and as to what he knew and comprehended, or ought to have known and comprehended, about this defective hook, that the motion for a verdict was properly denied.

After the jury had retired, a small model of the barn which had not been received as an exhibit, and a painter's staging hook which had been used in the examination of some witnesses but had not been offered or received as an exhibit, were discovered in the jury room. Immediately thereupon the court called the jury into the court room and admonished them, but did not discharge them from the consideration of the case. The defendants excepted to the action of the court in not then discharging the jury. After the verdict was returned, the defendants moved to set it aside because of the discovery of the model and hook in the jury room. The court then took testimony and found that the jury had agreed upon a verdict for the plaintiff before the model and hook got into their possession, and, without considering the statements of jurymen that the model and hook did not influence them in assessing damages, found that the model and hook could not have influenced the jurymen in determining damages. Thereupon the motion to set aside the verdict was overruled, and the defendants excepted. Everything that the court considered in making this finding is before us, and we hold that the finding was fully warranted. The exception to the refusal to discharge the jury, and the exception to the refusal to set aside the verdict, avail nothing.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION
OF NEW JERSEY et al v.
DE GROTE et al.

VILLAGE OF RIDGEFIELD PARK v.
PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION
OF NEW JERSEY et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. 19, 1905.)

1. GAS—GAS COMPANIES—RIGHTS IN PUBLIC PLACES.

Where the act incorporating a corporation gave it the right to lay gas mains and conduct a lighting business in a certain township, a subsequent statute dividing the township into several townships, none of the original township remaining, could not affect the corporation's rights.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—REPEAL.

Where a village ordinance required the permission of the street commissioner as a condition precedent to the right to lay gas pipes in the streets, but subsequently an ordinance was passed giving a certain corporation the right to lay such pipes, such ordinance containing many conditions and restrictions, but not requiring such consent, the latter ordinance repealed the former.

3. GAS—RIGHTS IN STREETS—STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Act April 8, 1903 (P. L. 1903, p. 359), providing that any corporation authorized to lay or maintain pipes in the streets of any municipality for the distribution of gas may use its pipes or mains within such municipality for the transmission of gas to any other municipality in the streets of which it may have lawful authority to lay or maintain pipes for the distribution of gas, is not unconstitutional.

4. SAME—PIPES AND MAINS.

The statute, having been enacted at a time when consolidations of gas companies had been made throughout the state, is to be construed as authorizing a gas company, within the statute, to lay in the streets of a municipality pipes large enough for the transmission of gas to other municipalities, though such size of pipe is not required for the needs of the municipality in the streets of which they are laid.

5. INJUNCTION—ISSUES.

Where a corporation leased its business to another, and they were both complainants in a suit for an injunction to restrain interference with such business in certain respects, the validity of the lease was immaterial.

6. SAME—COSTS.

Where a gas company had a right to lay pipes in streets of a village without first obtaining the permission of the street commissioner, but the corporation applied for such permission, and while the application was pending proceeded to lay the pipes and sought an injunction restraining any interference with such action, and the village contested the injunction and brought a suit to restrain the laying of the pipes, the corporation was entitled to costs in both proceedings.

7. SAME—VIOLATION—CONTEMPT—PERSONS NOT PARTIES.

Where a corporation obtained an injunction against certain officers of a township restraining them from interfering with the laying of gas pipes by complainant, such persons being enjoined in their individual capacities, and subsequently certain constables attempted to arrest those laying the pipes, copies of the injunction being thrust upon the constables when they were making the arrests, and they took the injunction papers and put them in their pockets and did not read them, they would not be held guilty of contempt of court; it appearing that they acted in good faith.

Suit by the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey and another against John W. De Grote and others, to enjoin interference with the laying of certain gas mains by complainants, and suit by the village of Ridgefield Park to restrain complainants from laying such gas mains. Motion by John W. De Grote and others for a modification of of the former complainants' injunction, and application by the former complainants to punish certain persons for contempt in violating the injunction. Injunction awarded the former complainants, and the motions denied.

Hobart Tuttle and Frank Bergen, for Public Service Corporation and Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County. Luther Campbell and Michael Dunn, for village of Ridgefield Park, John W. De Grote, and others.

STEVENSON, V. C. (orally). I take up the matter of laying the pipes, or the attempt to lay pipes, in the village of Ridgefield Park. There are three separate motions now before this court to be determined.

The first is a motion to modify a writ of injunction issued from this court by order of the chancellor, upon a bill filed by the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, as complainants, against certain persons, six I think, who were charged with interfering with the operation of the complainants in laying large gas mains within the limits of the municipality or village of Ridgefield Park. The injunction issued by the chancellor restrains these six natural persons from interfering with the deposit of these pipes along the streets in the village of Ridgefield Park, and the burying of them. The defendants, the six natural persons, embrace, as I recall the facts, three constables or police officers, or officers of that character connected with the municipality, a justice of the peace, and two members of the board of trustees of the village. These six persons had in an official way interfered with the incumbering of the streets with these pipes. The two members of the public board had to a certain extent instigated the acts that were complained of, which consisted of the arrest of the agents of the complainants who were laying these pipes by the three police officers, and the arraignment and holding to bail of these agents before the defendant, who was a justice of the peace of the county. The defendants having filed their answer have not moved for a dissolution of the injunction, but have moved for a modification of it, which is equivalent to an injunction upon the complainants restraining them from laying these pipes, pending the litigation to ascertain and determine the respective rights of the parties. The complainants thus have enjoined the defendants from interfering with their operations in laying these pipes; the defendants upon filing their answer practically move for an injunction in the cause restraining the complainants from laying their pipes—a somewhat peculiar legal situation.

The next proceeding before this court in relation to this matter is an application on the part of the complainants, the Public Service Corporation and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, to punish three persons for contempt, because of their alleged conduct in the way of obstructing the complainants in the enjoyment of their injunction. That perhaps is not an accurate statement of the exact nature of this proceeding, as will appear further on, although perhaps it is the way in which the proceeding was conceived of by the originators of the movement to have these parties punished for contempt. The three parties are not defendants in the cause. The writ of injunction did not go against them, either personally or by the use of any words which would include them within a class of people whom it was intended to reach and restrain. The application is made to punish these three outsiders, because they did or undertook to do the very acts which interfered with the complainants' operations in laying these pipes, which the defendants in the suit had done or undertaken to do and which the defendants in the suit were enjoined from doing. It is an unusual contempt proceeding in the state of New Jersey, and so far as I know without precedent.

The third proceeding before the court is upon an original bill filed by the village of Ridgefield Park, which for the first time by this bill comes into these contentions, and the object of the bill is to restrain the Public Service Corporation and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, the complainants in the former bill, from laying certain pipes, which are described in the bill, within the corporate limits of the village.

The answer of the six defendants to the bill of the Public Service Corporation and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County takes two positions by way of defense: First, that the complainants have no right whatever to lay gas pipes in and under the streets of the village of Ridgefield Park without the written consent of the officials of the village, which consent is prescribed as a condition precedent to the opening of any street in the village by an ordinance adopted in 1893. Secondly, that such right, namely, the right of the complainants to lay gas pipes in the streets of the village without obtaining the consent of the municipal authorities in writing, is confined to the laying and maintaining of pipes and mains which are reasonably necessary for the supply of gas within the corporate limits of this village, a small village of 2,800 inhabitants. And the answer sets up that as a matter of fact the complainants are not undertaking to lay pipes for the purpose which I have described, but are undertaking to lay immense iron pipes of a diameter of 20 inches, for the purpose of transmitting gas through and under the streets of the village for use in other municipalities where the complainants are engaged in purveying gas. The position is taken by the answer that this is an additional burden upon the streets; that the complainants have no franchise which permits them to lay or maintain such large pipes altogether beyond the necessities of the gas supply to the municipality.

The bill filed by the village of Ridgefield Park—and it must be borne in mind that the two defenses which I have described are set up by the six natural persons who are defendants to the suit of the Public Service Corporation and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County—sets up the rights of course of the municipality, but the municipality is not a party to that first suit. The municipality, the village of Ridgefield Park, in its bill does not seem to take the extreme position which the six natural persons, the defendants, take against the former bill by way of defense. The village of Ridgefield Park asks for an injunction against the Public Service Corporation and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County to restrain them from laying these large 20-inch pipes, because they are not being laid for the purpose of carrying on any corporate business, for accomplishing any of the corporate business of the two companies within the limits of the village, but are being laid for the purpose which I described a moment ago; and, because the defendants are thus endeavoring to impose an excessive and unlawful burden upon the streets of the municipality, and are without the protection of their franchisees, an injunction is asked.

Now, these are the three matters to be determined. They were all argued together. All the affidavits which belong to each proceeding are by consent to be used in the other proceedings. I think at last we have definitely settled what are the motion papers—what are the proofs which are to be considered in determining each one of these motions; and I may say here I understand that the act of 1861, incorporating the Hackensack Gaslight Company, and the act of 1864, incorporating the Bergen County Gaslight Company, are also deemed before the court in evidence.

The first question to be determined in both of these suits is the question whether the complainants, or either of them, now have, or had at the time of the transactions which were the subject-matter of investigation, a right to lay and maintain gas mains within the corporate limits of the village of Ridgefield Park, without obtaining the consent in writing of the official of the municipality designated by the ordinance of 1893 as the official whose written consent must be obtained. As I stated, the six defendants to the bill of the two corporations boldly take the position that the complainants have no right to open the streets and lay gas pipes, without obtaining in each instance the written consent of this designated official, the superintendent of streets. This contention seems to me to be entirely without merit. The right of the complainants or one of them to lay and maintain a gas plant, a plant with gas mains and pipes, under the streets of the village of Ridgefield Park can safely be traced, in my judgment, to two different sources, and possibly a third. It is conceded that the complainant, the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, now holds and exercises all the franchises of the Hackensack Gaslight Company, incorporated in 1861, and the Bergen County Gaslight Company, incorporated in 1864; both being incorporated by special charters which are before the court in evidence in these proceedings.

The charter of the Hackensack Gaslight Company, passed in 1861, incorporates the company (I now quote) "for the purpose of lighting the streets, buildings, manufactories and other places in and adjacent to the village of Hackensack in the county of Bergen." It will be observed that the object is not "the lighting of streets, buildings and manufactories in Hackensack and in other places adjacent." The object is "the lighting of the streets, buildings, manufactories and other places in and adjacent to the village of Hackensack," a somewhat different form of language from that employed in the case of the charter of the Morristown Gaslight Company, which was the subject of examination and determination in the case of Borough of Madison v. Morristown Gaslight Company, 63 N. J. Eq. 120, 52 Atl. 158, in the Court of Chancery, and afterwards in the Court of Appeals as reported in 65 N. J. Eq. 356, 54 Atl. 439. The charter of the Hackensack Gaslight Company further proceeds to empower the company (I now quote) "to lay down gas pipes and erect gas posts, burners and reflectors, in the streets, alleys, lanes, squares, highways and public grounds in the village of Hackensack and places adjacent in the county of Bergen." Here we have a most significant difference of phraseology from that which was employed in the Morristown Case. A grant is made of power to lay down gas pipes in the streets, alleys, highways, and public grounds in the village of Hackensack and in places adjacent in the county of Bergen. I have supplied the word "in," but grammatically it must be supplied; so that the gas company have the power here to lay pipes "in streets, in places adjacent to the village of Hackensack, in the county of Bergen." I may not refer again to the topographical relations of these different municipalities, but the force of this language is apparent when we consider that it is now proved in these causes that the territory of the village of Ridgefield Park is adjacent to the territory of the old village of Hackensack, separated by the Hackensack river. I do not lose sight of the fact that a navigable stream separates these two places, and some questions might arise in regard to the operation of the language which I have read. As I indicated, I do not trace any right of the complainants to the charter, not for the reason which Mr. Dunn has suggested, but for another which I will briefly state.

The Hackensack Gaslight Company, after consolidating with the Hackensack Edison Light Company, became merged in the consolidated corporation called the Hackensack Gas & Electric Company, and this Hackensack Gas & Electric Company being in possession of the franchise which I have described, of maintaining gas pipes under the charter of 1861, whatever its scope may have been, saw fit to apply to the village of Ridgefield Park in 1898 for permission to lay their pipes in the streets and obtained from that village and accepted an ordinance granting it the right to maintain a plant of gas mains in the streets of the village, under a number of conditions which are set forth. The parties entered into a contract for the maintenance of this plant, by which each party received large advantages, and I think it is a very serious question indeed whether the corporation, the Hackensack Gas & Electric Company, having thus dealt with the village of Ridgefield Park and obtained this ordinance, commonly but erroneously called a charter, and having enjoyed the fruits of it and having laid their system of pipes under its provisions, now can come forward and say: "Oh! We had the right all the time to do this very thing, under the old charter of 1861, by which one of our constituent companies, the Hackensack Gaslight Company, on account of the wide language employed in describing the area of its operations, got a right and had a right to do this very thing." For the reasons that I have indicated, I therefore do not place the right of the complainants or either of them to lay and maintain gas pipes in the village of Ridgefield Park upon this charter of 1861; and originally, I may say, counsel for the two corporations did not insist that such a right could be maintained. Subsequently, however, counsel undertook to place the right of the complainants upon this charter of 1861, and therefore I have felt it necessary to dispose of the matter.

The next source of authority to these two corporations, or one of them, to maintain a plant of gas pipes and mains in the village of Ridgefield Park, is the charter of the Bergen County Gaslight Company of 1864. It is conceded that the complainants, or one of them, now enjoy all the rights which the Bergen County Gaslight Company received under its charter. It is necessary therefore to find out what rights to lay and maintain gas pipes were vested in the Bergen County Gaslight Company by this act of 1864. The act incorporates the company (I now quote) "for the purpose of lighting the streets, buildings and other places in the township of Hackensack and its vicinity." It is perfectly plain that under that language the object of the provision is to furnish gas lighting throughout the township of Hackensack, and also in its vicinity. The language is "the lighting of streets, buildings and other places in the township of Hackensack and its vicinity," and here again we have to supply the word "in," so that the phraseology when the word is supplied will be "in the township of Hackensack and in its vicinity." Well, we need not concern ourselves here about the meaning of the word "vicinity," the content of that word, because at the time this charter was passed in 1864 the entire territory of the village of Ridgefield Park was embraced within the limits of the township of Hackensack. In 1871, ten years after this charter was granted, the Legislature divided the township of Hackensack into three townships, and, as I understood it, the whole territory of the original township of Hackensack was cut up into three different townships; there being no portion left, there being no Hackensack township left after this act went into operation. So I understand the contention of counsel. The act is entitled "An Act to divide the township of Hackensack into three townships," and my brief examination of the act itself seemed to indicate that, beyond the title, there was nothing to show that the whole of the territory of the township had been carved up into these three townships. For all that appears from the language of the act as I have hastily read it, there might have been left a portion of the ancient territory of Hackensack township, which after the act went into operation would constitute a Hackensack township; but the title announces that the whole township was subdivided, and such is admitted to be the fact. Now then, counsel for the defendants take the position that the division of this original Hackensack township into three different townships had the effect to limit the extent of the grant to the Bergen County Gaslight Company in this charter of 1864. I think this contention is without support in authority or reason.

In 1864 the Legislature granted to this corporation the right to engage in the business of lighting the streets and houses throughout the entire township of Hackensack as it then existed. The corporation was created upon the strength of that grant. The capital was subscribed and paid in for that purpose. It may be questioned whether the Legislature would have the power subsequently by dividing up the township to limit the operations of a corporation created by this charter. If the Legislature could do that, where could the line be drawn? The township of Hackensack might be left by legislative action composed of one-tenth of the original township or one-twentieth of the original population. The grant of the Legislature, upon which the corporation has been created and on the strength of which the capital had been subscribed and paid in, might become of no value whatever. But there is not any intention discoverable in this legislation of 1871 to affect the charter of 1864. The charter of 1864 gives a right to maintain and carry on the gas lighting business throughout the whole territory of the township of Hackensack as it then existed. That grant is not affected by subsequent legislation which cuts up the territory of Hackensack township, and the mere fact that the Bergen County Gaslight Company had not seen fit to extend its pipes throughout the whole area of Hackensack township is entirely an immaterial circumstance. The money was subscribed and the business entered into upon the strength of this charter, which gave the corporation the right to extend its mains and to extend its business from time to time throughout the entire area described in the charter, the area of Hackensack township. This right could not be interfered with. It is not to be presumed that the Legislature intended to interfere with it. I will say, further, there is not anything in the act of 1871 upon which a plausible argument can be founded that the Legislature intended to interfere with the scope of the grant, the franchise conferred on this corporation by the act of 1864, on the strength of which all this capital was invested. Nothing has been said about abandonment of any portion of the franchise of the Bergen County Gaslight Company, and I do not understand that there are any circumstances in this case that would found an argument that there had been any partial abandonment. These companies are started for the supplying of gas facilities in a prescribed area. It may take generations to cover the whole of that area. They keep on enlarging their plant from generation to generation as the public want increases, and it would be a very singular position to take that this corporation, chartered in 1864 for the purpose eventually of covering the entire area of this great township with a network of gas mains and pipes, when the public want would justify such expenditure, must, within 20 years or 30 years or 40 years or any other prescribed number of years, cover all the area which they intend to cover, and that after a period has elapsed the extension of their mains must cease, notwithstanding the fact that the expansion of the population continues and the public want grows greater and greater and wider and wider. I cannot adopt any such theory as that. It seems to me therefore that the complainants, or one of them, the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, certainly had at the time of the operations complained of, and now has, all the original charter rights of the Bergen County Gaslight Company under this charter of 1864, and that under its charter this complainant company has the right to (and I now read from the charter) "to lay down therein gas pipes and to erect gas posts, burners, and reflectors in the streets, avenues, highways, public grounds, alleys and lanes in the township of Hackensack and its vicinity and to adopt all proper and necessary means to light all dwellings, stores and other places situated therein with gas"; and under our settled rules of construction that right extends over the entire area of the township of Hackensack as it existed in 1864. Upon turning to the act of 1871 again, I observe that it left no township of Hackensack in existence. It divided what was the territory of Hackensack township into three new townships, no one of which bore the name of Hackensack. It would, I think, upon the theory of the counsel for the village of Ridgefield Park, be quite difficult to define the area within which the Bergen County Gaslight Company had power to operate after the passage of this statute. Counsel would hardly venture to go so far as to insist that when Hackensack township ceased to exist this gas company was deprived of its franchise.

The second source to which the right of the complainant, or one of them, may be traced is the ordinance of the village of Ridgefield Park adopted in 1898. It is conceded I believe by both parties in these causes that, under the act of 1893, the village of Ridgefield Park has the power to pass ordinances giving power to lay and regulate or prohibit the laying of water or gas or sewer pipes in the streets of the village. It is proved that the village of Ridgefield Park acted under that grant of power in 1893 and passed an ordinance providing in brief—I shall not turn to it—that no gas pipe should be laid in or under the streets of the village without the written consent of the street commissioner; and the six defendants to the bill of the two corporations, as I stated, take the very bold position that the complainants have no right to lay any pipes without obtaining that written consent. But it appears that in 1898, five years after this ordinance of 1893 was passed, the village of Ridgefield Park, as I stated some time ago, passed an ordinance giving the Hackensack Gas & Electric Company the right to lay and maintain a plant of gas mains and pipes throughout the village under the streets. This ordinance prescribes to a certain extent the conditions under which the streets shall be opened and how they should be closed. It is filled with conditions and terms affecting the rights of the two parties and giving each of the parties great rights. It manifestly deals with and covers the whole business of opening the streets. It therefore, so far as the operations of the Hackensack Gas & Electric Company were concerned, totally repealed the provisions of the ordinance of 1893. It is entirely inconsistent with its provisions. To my mind it is preposterous to argue that, after this ordinance of 1898 had been passed and these great considerations given to the village, these mutual contractual relations entered into, the Hackensack Gas & Electric Company had not the power to open a street in the village, to lay a pipe, to replace a main, without first obtaining the written consent of the superintendent of streets, and perhaps depositing a sum of money in pursuance of the terms of this ordinance of 1893. The two ordinances must be construed together, and the later, the ordinance of 1898, has full force so far as it is inconsistent with the provisions of the ordinance of 1893. My conclusion is that the right of the two complainants to maintain a plant of gas mains and pipes within and under the streets of the village of Ridgefield Park is clear, whether it be placed upon the charter of the Bergen County Gaslight Company of 1864 or the ordinance of the village passed in 1898.

I may say right here, lest I forget it later, that no question is raised in these litigations in regard to the power of the municipality to impose reasonable regulations upon the complainants with respect to the laying and maintaining of these gas pipes. The complainants submit to such reasonable regulations, if there are any which ought to be imposed in view of the fact that the ordinance of 1898 itself very carefully and fully seems to regulate the exercise of the powers which that ordinance granted to the Hackensack Gas & Electric Company. The question which has been debated in this cause is not whether the complainants or either of them have an absolute right free and untrammelled from all restrictions on the part of the village to lay and maintain their gas plant, but whether the village has the absolute right to prohibit the complainants or either of them from excavating the streets, until or unless a written permission is given in each case by the superintendent of streets of the village. No question of regulation is raised in this cause. It is not the power of the village to regulate which is insisted upon here, to reasonably regulate the exercise of rights and franchises of these companies, it is the power of the village under this ordinance of 1893 to prohibit which is insisted upon. I find that no such power exists in this case, for the reasons that I have mentioned.

Now the next question, far more difficult, is the question arising upon both these bills of complaint as to the extent of this franchise, this right of the complainants, or one of them, to lay and maintain a plant of gas pipes under the streets of this village. Conceding that the complainants, or one of them, have full power to maintain a plant of gas pipes in this village for the supply of the village, the question is, have they now a wider right, can they lay and maintain pipes greatly in excess of what are reasonably necessary for the supply of gas for this municipality and the supply of gas to these streets and to the 2,800 people who live within its corporate limits, and can they lay down 20-inch pipes, the main function of which is to transmit gas to other and perhaps distant municipalities, where the complainants are engaged in purveying gas? Counsel for the village and its officers cited the case of Andreas v. Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, reported in 61 N. J. Eq. 69, 47 Atl. 555, where the Court of Chancery held that an electric light company was not authorized to erect and maintain poles and appurtenances thereon in the streets larger than were necessary for the public use. As I recall the case now after this period of delay, it was conceded, or at any rate the court found, that the electric light company had the right to maintain poles and appurtenances attached thereto in the streets of the village which were reasonably necessary for lighting the public streets, but had not no right to erect and maintain larger poles with more numerous arms attached thereto than were necessary for this public lighting; the real object being to enable the company to carry on its private business and supply private lights to private consumers. If I recall the conclusion of the case correctly, the case was held in order that the court might supervise the construction of the poles, or, at any rate, that proceedings might be taken to see that the Electric Light Company was kept within the limits which I have indicated. Well, I think we may concede that, if the sole right of the complainants or one of them to maintain a plant of gas pipes in the village of Ridgefield Park must be based upon the charter of 1864 of the Bergen County Gas-light Company or the ordinance of 1898 of the village, the contention of the village in these cases would have to be sustained. It seems to me that, if a gas company has the right to maintain within a municipality a plant of gas pipes solely for the purpose of supplying the needs of that municipality, when it goes to work to lay enormous pipes in excess of what is necessary for the accomplishment of their corporate purpose and object within the municipality, for the purpose of conveying gas to distant places, they are away beyond the limits of their franchise and the remedy of the village is probably by injunction.

The complainants, manifestly perceiving the force of the objection on the part of the defendants to which I have referred, looked about to find some authority to sustain them in this apparently excessive use of the streets of the village, which the village seeks to enjoin. They cited the act of April 8, 1903, entitled "An act relating to corporations of this state now or hereafter having lawful authority to lay or maintain pipes or mains in the streets or public places of any municipality for the distribution of gas." P. L. 1903, p. 359. The complainants insist that under this statute, if a gas company—and ordinarily a gas company, to constitute an instance of the sort with which we have to deal, would have to be a consolidated company—if a gas company has the right to purvey gas in three or four or a dozen different municipalities and to maintain in each a plant of gas pipes and mains for the supply of that particular municipality, then by virtue of this act of 1903 the gas company may not only transmit gas from one system to the other, but it may unify all these systems and make the pipes in each large enough not only to supply the lighting within the corporate limits of that particular municipality, but also large enough to transmit gas throughout the system. Thus, in case there are six or eight adjacent municipalities in which there are six or eight separate gas companies, each having a franchise under which it had the power to maintain a plant sufficient for the purpose of the lighting business within the corporate limits, if that was the situation, power is given under this act to a corporation formed by a consolidation of these separate companies to maintain pipes much larger than would be necessary in each municipality for the supply of that municipality, to maintain pipes in each municipality large enough to transmit gas to the other municipalities. Now, of course, it is perfectly plain in the case I have put, where you have six or eight adjacent municipalities with six or eight separate franchises of this character all held by one corporation, that the result of the unification of the entire plant is that there would be central mains with great capacity, very much greater than could be necessary under any possible circumstances for the supply of gas in any one municipality by itself.

Counsel for the village of Ridgefield Park makes several objections to this statute, I think several constitutional objections. My recollection is that counsel insisted that the act was a special act, and also that the title was defective. I gave close heed to these arguments of counsel. I shall not undertake to recall them at this late date. I think they are without foundation. The statute is unsalable, it seems to me, from a constitutional point of view. There is a difficulty, however, about the statute which was not the subject of argument, but which has caused me some hesitation. I dislike disposing of the cause upon points that are not raised in argument. This cause was argued with great care, after industrious preparation and with great ability on both sides, still I cannot avoid dealing with the question which appears directly upon the face of this act and is raised by the pleadings. The act provides that any corporation in this state, now or hereafter having lawful authority to lay or maintain pipes or mains in the streets and public places of any municipality for the distribution of gas, may use its pipes or mains within such municipality for the transmission of gas to any other municipality in the streets or public places of which it may also have lawful authority to lay or maintain pipes or mains for the distribution of gas; and then out of abundant caution the act provides: "Provided, that nothing herein contained shall grant to any corporation a franchise to lay down gas pipes for the distribution of gas in any municipality in this state." The act, as I stated, deals with a situation where there are two separate franchises for the supply of gas in two separate municipalities, each franchise carrying with it the right to maintain a plant adequate for the purpose; and the act provides that any corporation in the possession of two such franchises may use its pipes or mains within the corporate limits of each municipality for the transmission of gas to the system maintained in the other municipality. Now the question is whether that gives a right to the corporation to maintain larger pipes in each municipality than those which are required for the supply of gas in that municipality. Does this additional use permitted by the statute carry with it the right to maintain larger pipes than those which are measured by the requirements of the franchise in each municipality? The language of the act is obscure, badly chosen. It would have saved all question if the act had provided that in the situation with which it deals the corporation should have the right at all times to lay and maintain gas pipes not only for the supply of gas within each municipality, but also for the transmission of gas to other municipalities. Practical reasons may be surmised why such plain language was not employed.

I made a very close examination of this act a week or ten days ago, and I am not sure that I can recall now all the points which finally led me to the conclusion that it was the intention of the Legislature to enlarge the franchises of corporations having the power and charged with the public duty of supplying gas to a number and perhaps a large number of municipalities. It is a little difficult to see what the real scope and effect of this act would be if it has not the effect which I have mentioned. Here is a grant to a corporation in the situation of the complainants, or one of them, the situation of the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, to use its pipes or mains within the municipality of Ridgefield Park for the transmission of gas to those four or five other municipalities where the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County has the power to maintain gas mains. The Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County is allowed to use its pipes in the village to transmit gas to these other places. Well now, if that does not confer the right to maintain a pipe or pipes in Ridgefield Park larger than are necessary for the municipal purpose of that city, large enough for an efficient transmission of gas to these other places, what operation has the act? Certainly it is hard to say how the stockholders of the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County could complain if that corporation saw fit to transmit gas through the Ridgefield Park pipes to the pipes in the other municipalities. How could the stockholders complain? How could the village complain? The pipes are there. They are lawfully there. The entire public burden is upon the municipality and its streets. The public burden is not enlarged when those pipes are used to transmit gas to the adjacent village. It is rather difficult to see how there is any practical operation of this statute in protecting the gas company from objections on the part of the village of Ridgefield. Last of all I want to say—not last of all, but last of all according to my present recollection—there is a difficulty in perceiving why this act was necessary in order to save the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County or any other corporation similarly situated from an attack by the Attorney General of the state. I have not really thought this matter out. It is a very fine point indeed. Whether technically there would be any foundation without this enabling act for a complaint of the Attorney General that the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County was misusing its franchises when it employed its pipes in Ridgefield Park, not only for the supply of gas within the corporate limits of the village, but for the transmission of gas to the adjacent village. Whether there is any foundation for any complaint or not, I hardly deem it necessary to decide. It seems to me that to confine the act to such a narrow effect as that would be unreasonable. The Legislature had some other object in view in passing this statute besides legalizing the use of the plant of the Gas & Electric Company in Ridgefield Park, to take this instance, for the transmission of gas to the adjacent village in which the Gas & Electric Company had full power to maintain gas pipes and to supply gas. Now what was the intention of the Legislature?

I think we have a right to regard the history of the state, the history of its industries, the history of its corporations, in dealing with an act like this. It was passed in 1903, at a time when consolidations, especially of gas companies and lighting companies, had been made throughout the entire state. The old system of having separate gas companies, each one supplying a different village or a different town, had been to a very large extent displaced by these great consolidations of which we have striking illustrations afforded by the history of gas lighting and electric lighting in Bergen county set forth in these bills of complaint and these answers. The Legislature recognized the fact that, instead of six separate gas companies each with a gas plant including a gas manufactory and gas holder for each village, a new system had come in, and the six now are consolidated, and instead of six systems of smaller pipes, of comparatively small pipes, each supplied from a separate source, the situation was created in which in order to gain the great economies of consolidation and give the public the benefit of these economies it was necessary to unify the six plants and lay them out as one whole plant with large central mains and then smaller mains, thus making a united system out of what was formerly six separate systems. I think the Legislature recognized the fact, as it existed before the Legislature and before the state at the time this statute was passed, and the Legislature said: "We have this situation existing; we now will enlarge the power, the extent of each franchise and enable the single corporation holding the franchise to use pipes in each locality, in each municipality, not only for the purpose of supplying gas there, but also for the purpose of transmitting gas to the next and to the third and to the fourth and to the fifth and to the sixth municipality." It seems to me that was the intention of the Legislature, however inaptly expressed that intention may be in the language of this act. If that result is not correct, what would be the situation? Did the Legislature mean to leave the consolidated corporation exercising the power and charged with the duty of supplying the gas to six municipalities within the power of each one of these municipalities? Can each municipality exercise the arbitrary power of saying: "You shall not lay down a pipe within our limits larger than is necessary for the supply of gas within our limits? We intend to block and stop and thwart the effects and benefits of consolidation." Is it not plain that, where you have the interests of five or six adjacent municipalities involved, it is not wise, it is not politic that each one of these municipalities should wield any such power? It seems to me, therefore, that the Legislature intended to deal with a matter which was naturally beyond the scope of the authority and power of each municipality. It may be questioned whether the village of Ridgefield Park has any power whatever to grant a corporation the right to run a gas main 20 or 40 inches in diameter through its public streets for the purpose, not of supplying that municipality, but for the purpose of supplying other places with gas. Is there any such power resident in each municipality? The Legislature, however, came in and dealt with the situation which was manifestly beyond the natural scope of the powers conferred upon each municipality. It being a matter of wide public concern the Legislature took hold of it and laid down a rule, and the rule is as I have stated. When you have six separate franchises, each one measured by the requirements of a different municipality, six in all, but you have one corporation possessed of all these franchises and charged with all the duties under each, then the Legislature said: "There has been a physical consolidation. Now we will permit you to practically consolidate your franchises so far as the maintenance of the plant is concerned, to lay large enough pipes anywhere throughout the entire area, not only for the supply of gas within a particular municipality in which such large pipes are laid, but large enough to supply the whole system, large enough to enable the consolidated company to erect and maintain a single manufactory of gas, and thus accomplish the enormous economy which always is accomplished when six separate gas manufactories are suspended and substituted by a single one." Of course, the consumer gets a share of the benefit of this economy.

An argument can be made, which I think would require consideration, that the consolidation act, when applied to gas companies occupying distinct but adjacent territories, confers the power upon the consolidated company to unify the system of gas mains and transmit gas throughout the whole system from a single central station without invoking any aid from this somewhat peculiar act of 1903. If six railroads connecting with each other are consolidated so as to form a single line, the result may be to compel or induce the consolidated corporation, for the successful operation of its consolidated line, to do many acts, to maintain many expensive structures, and employ many instruments for the operation of the railroad, none of which would be germane to the purposes of the original constituent corporations, or constituent railroads. Six separate adjacent gas companies, when consolidated under the statute, cease to be an aggregation of distinct units; they are consolidated into a single gas company. There is force I think in the argument that the legislative scheme of consolidation in the case of railroads in line or gas companies occupying adjacent territories necessarily implies a unification of the properties and plants of the several corporations corresponding exactly with the legal unification of the corporations themselves. I shall not, however, develop this argument or attempt to ascertain its exact force, because we have not to deal with the legal effect of the con-olidation act alone. It is the consolidation act together with this act of 1903 with which we have to deal. Whatever may be the force of either of these acts when taken alone, in my judgment their combined force legalizes in a case like this the substitution of several separate systems of gas mains by a single system supplied from a single source, and therefore naturally, if not necessarily, composed in part at least of very much larger gas pipes than would be authorized by any one of the constituent franchises.

For these reasons which I have endeavored to indicate, I reach the general conclusion that the complainant corporations, or one of them, have the power not only to maintain a plant of gas mains and pipes in the streets of the village of Ridgefield Park, but that they have a right to lay and maintain pipes therein large enough for the transmission of gas to the other municipalities in which they, the complainants, or one of them, have the power and are charged with the duty of purveying gas. I may say here that last night I looked through these papers with some care in order to discover whether it appeared that the complainants, the two corporations, are in fact endeavoring to lay a pipe, this pipe 20 inches in diameter, for the purpose of applying gas to localities beyond the scope of the operations authorized by the act of 1864, the charter of the Bergen County Gaslight Company. There is no doubt from the evidence that the pipes which the two corporations are threatening to lay are larger than are necessary for supplying the village of Ridgefield Park and its 2,800 inhabitants with gas. There is no question about that whatever; but I fail to find any sufficient evidence that the other municipalities for the benefit of which these large pipes are being laid lie beyond the limits of Hackensack township. The affidavit of Mr. Wheaton made some statement but it is mere hearsay. Well, I do not intend to decide the matter. I suppose the burden is upon the village authorities to show that there is an intention on the part of the two complainants to use this situation for an unlawful purpose. There is this fragment of testimony, if it may be called testimony, that one of the officers of the company said something. I gravely doubt whether taking these papers as a whole, if I should re-examine them, I could find that the complainants, the village authorities, have shown that these pipes are larger than are reasonably necessary for the purpose "of lighting the streets, buildings, and other places in the township of Hackensack and its vicinity." I pass this point, however, because my conclusion which I have announced on the main question is sufficient for the disposition of these causes.

One more point, however, remains to be noted. Counsel for the village of Ridgefield Park and these six natural persons, defendants to the first bill that was filed, take the point that the Public Service Corporation is a corporation created under the general corporation act, and that it appears in this case and is alleged on both sides and is admitted that in March, 1905, the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County executed a lease of all its property and all its franchises, except its franchise to be a corporation, to this corporation, the Public Service Corporation, which existed under the general corporation act, and that the Public Service Corporation has no power to exercise the functions of a gas company. I do not have to decide a number of questions which are thus raised, because the lease which I have mentioned has been put in evidence and the lessor corporation, the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, is a co-complainant in the cause. An examination of that lease shows that the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County has a very important and direct interest in the operations which are the subject-matter of litigation in these causes. If there is any defect in this lease, the sooner the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County find it out, the better. If the lease is void, the sooner they resume possession of their property, the better. Meanwhile, the development of their property must go on. Business must be done for the maintenance of the great plant and business which the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County undertook in good faith to lease. The Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County being a co-complainant, an injunction would go in my judgment most properly in this cause for the preservation of the rights of that corporation, just as if no lease had been attempted. Of course it is quite a question whether the Public Service Corporation can take a gas plant and gas franchises by lease and then use and exercise them. It is settled that a corporation under the general corporation act cannot exercise the functions of a gas company even by leave of the municipal authorities. That is settled in the case of Richards v. Dover (N. J. Sup.) 39 Atl. 705. Counsel for the complainants, the two corporations, points out a statute of the state which he claims validates this lease. This statute is entitled "An act concerning corporations," and was approved March 24, 1899 (P. L. 1899, p. 334). It provides that "any corporation of this state, except railroad and canal corporations, may hereafter, with the assent of two-thirds in interest of its stockholders, either in person or by proxy, lease its property and franchises to any corporation and every corporation of this state is hereby authorized to take the lease or any assignment thereof, for such terms and upon such conditions as may be agreed upon, and that any such lease or assignment, or both, heretofore made, are hereby validated." There is a proviso which I need not read. It seems to be conceded that the lease in this case from the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County to the Public Service Corporation received the required assent of two-thirds in interest of its stockholders. No objection to the validity of the lease is made on the ground that such assent was not given. Counsel for the village of Ridgely Park made some objections to this statute, similar I think to those that he made and urged with regard to the act of 1903, authorizing the use of pipes in one municipality for the transmission of gas to another municipality, that it was a special act and that the title was inadequate. Well, I have not examined those objections, but my impression is that they are unfounded. The difficulty about the act as it seems to me, or the question in regard to the act, is whether, when the Legislature has provided and in fact maintains on the statute book a special statute relating to the incorporation of gas companies, imposing special limitations upon them and providing for them a special form of government, through a very large number of directors, much larger than are required for the government of a corporation created under the general corporation act, this statute of 1899, is to be construed to enable a corporation created under the general corporation act, perhaps with three directors only, to accept by lease the franchises of a gas corporation and then exercise these franchises and carry on the gas business. I am very glad that I do not have to consider or decide this question. I avoid it as I feel it is my duty to do, because the decision of it is unnecessary in my judgment. We have here a complainant, as I stated, the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, with the unquestioned power to exercise all the franchises conferred by the charter of 1861 upon the Hackensack Gaslight Company and the charter of 1864 upon the Bergen County Gaslight Company and the ordinance of the village of Ridgely Park adopted in 1898, granting a gas franchise to the Hackensack Gas & Electric Company. Inasmuch as this co-complainant has had all these powers and has them to-day, if it has not by a valid lease transferred them to the Public Service Corporation, we have I think an actor, a complainant in court, whatever views may be taken of the scope and effect of this statute of 1899, entitled to the protection of the court through the instrumentality of an injunction.

The result is: First, in regard to the motion to enjoin the Public Service Corporation and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County from laying its pipes pending this litigation, that the motion must be denied. And, second, in regard to the motion on behalf of the village of Ridgely Park, upon their bill and the answer of the two complainant corporations for an injunction restraining the two corporations from laying mains larger than are necessary for the supply of gas to the village of Ridgely Park and its 2,800 inhabitants, that the motion also must be denied.

Now, in regard to the costs, I note that the bill originally filed by the two corporations, upon which the chancellor granted an injunction, did not set forth, as it was not obliged to do, that the two complainant corporations had applied to the village authorities of Ridgely Park for a permission apparently under the provisions of the ordinance of 1898 to lay the very pipes which they undertook to lay without getting that permission. While that application was pending these corporations, having thus most unmistakably represented to the village authorities that their consent was necessary, went on without their consent to lay these pipes, acting upon the authority of their charter and the ordinance of 1898, which apparently they had conceded was not adequate to sustain them in laying these pipes. Ordinarily a man does not crave permission to do a thing which he has a right to do. If the village had submitted to this injunction, it would have been a question whether any costs would be allowed against them in the suit; but the village did not submit. The village employed counsel and then proceeded to examine all these charters and ordinances, and these counsel advised the village and also these defendants that the corporations had no right to open the streets without the written consent of the commissioner of streets under the ordinance of 1898, and also advised further that the corporations had no right to lay larger pipes than were necessary to supply gas to the village. Well, they have brought these matters here into court by their answer to the bill of the two corporations and by the bill of the village, and, whatever may be the result elsewhere, in this court they have met with defeat. The finding of the court is against them, and therefore it seems to me that the Public Service Corporation and the Gas & Electric Company of Bergen County, complainants in one cause and defendants in the other, are entitled to costs on both motions.

The third matter for determination is the proceeding against three individuals, who are strangers to the two suits with which we have dealt, to have them punished for contempt. I have not had an opportunity to examine the evidence since the day when I expected to deal with it at length. I shall not undertake now to more than indicate in an imperfect way the reasons which have brought me to the conclusion that the three persons, Anton Dosch, Thomas Malley, and J. F. Belkorf, are not guilty of contempt of court in the conduct of which complaint has been made, and have therefore not made themselves amenable to punishment. The proceeding, as I think I stated at the start, is almost and probably absolutely without precedent in the state of New Jersey. We have an injunction here issued against six persons, their officers, agents and servants. As a matter of fact these six persons were all acting in doing the things complained of in an official capacity, but the injunction does not refer to the capacity in which the defendants acted at all. The injunction goes to the six persons and their agents, and enjoins them from interfering with the laying of these pipes. Where the effort is made by a writ of injunction to restrain an indefinite class of persons who are liable, anyone of whom or any number of whom are liable, to be excited to do the things complained of, it has got to be the custom, especially in the Western federal courts, to let the injunction go to certain persons named and then to a class of persons who are described. Sometimes they are described as members of a labor union, or employes of a railroad, or even residents of a city. Well, a great many questions may yet be debated as to the exact legal effect and operation of such injunctions. It is a novel way of bringing in parties to a suit. Whether such description has any other operation and effect than a notice of the injunction may be questioned. I know of no injunction of that character issued out of this court, although possibly in one or two instances such an injunction may have been issued. But in this case no language is inserted in the writ attempting to enlarge the scope of the injunction. Its restraining force is upon citizens of Ridgely Park, gentlemen who are officers of that township. In terms the writ is confined to these six individuals, and restrains them from interfering with the laying of these pipes, and manifestly on its face relates to the personal conduct of these six individuals. Now, it is complained in these proceedings that these three men, knowing of this injunction, went forward as officers of the township and made the same sort of arrests for laying pipes that were the subject-matter of complaint in the bill and to restrain which the injunction had gone against the six natural persons who are defendants.

The question is whether such conduct on their part amounts to a contempt of the process and power of this court. I do not question that the Court of Chancery has power to punish any person for contempt who by his conduct undertakes willfully to thwart the power of the court, or to interfere with and obstruct the service of its process. Where such process is a writ of injunction and the party who does the act complained of is not a party to the suit, he is not punishable for contempt for a violation of the injunction. That is perfectly well settled. He is not enjoined, and he does not violate any injunction. If he is guilty of contempt at all, it is probably a criminal offense and indictable, an obstruction of public justice, and such contempts are not only punishable by indictment, but they are punishable by the power of this court. If such were not the case, oftentimes the process of this court could be defied, and its remedial agencies rendered inoperative by the voluntary unlawful act of individuals who assume to step in and prevent the accomplishment of objects which the court has said shall be accomplished in a suit between parties. The rules of law governing this sort of contempt and the power of the court to punish it are perhaps more fully set forth and discussed than in any other case in the recent English case of Seward v. Patterson (1897) 1 Chancery, 545. In that case, however, the party who was punished was found guilty of aiding and abetting the defendant, who was found guilty of violating the injunction of the court. That is a most important circumstance which does not exist in this case. The English court sustained its power to punish this outsider for taking part in conduct that was violative of its injunction, and it distinctly points out that it did not punish the man for violating the injunction, because no injunction was imposed upon him. They punished him because his conduct tended to obstruct the administration of justice, to thwart the court in its effort to administer justice; but the fact remained that the party thus punished was aiding and abetting a defendant who was found guilty of violating the injunction. In other words, there was in that case a violation of the injunction of the court by a defendant punishable as such, and this outsider's conduct was in the way of aiding and abetting that violation. It will be observed that in the case before this court there is no violation of the injunction. No defendant, no person, charged by this writ with the duty of obeying its mandate has violated the injunction. Three outsiders have come in as volunteers, have done acts which are precisely the same as those acts which were enjoined in the suit. That is all. Well, I do not say that, notwithstanding the absence in this case of any violation of the injunction, persons pursuing conduct such as these three defendants pursued may not be punishable. I do not have to decide this novel point and I feel it is my duty to refrain from doing so because we may concede that the court has such power, and that such power is necessary in order to the administration of justice, in order to the accomplishment of those great beneficial objects secured by the preventive remedy of injunction.

There is great force in the position that, if the complainants in this case obtained an injunction against three police officers of Ridgely Park, after the full force and effect of the injunction had been advertised and widely known and the village and its legal advisers had had opportunity to look into the matter, three other police officers would be guilty of contempt, if they volunteered to do the very things which they knew had been enjoined and which they had every reason to expect the court would enjoin them from doing. There is great force in the argument that, if a second injunction should be got out against the new set of officers, three others who the next day should undertake to pursue the same line of conduct would be liable to proceedings for contempt. If that were not so in the very class of cases to which this belongs, the whole remedial power of the Court of Chancery could be absolutely thwarted by relays of offenders who would come in to do the acts which they knew right well had been enjoined in the case of their brethren, and knew right well would be enjoined again, if opportunity afforded. But before any such power should be exercised by this court, the case ought to be made plain beyond the shadow of a doubt; the court should proceed with the utmost caution in proceedings for contempt in this class of cases. Now, here we have three men who appear to be reputable law-abiding citizens charged with the administration of law in their locality. They acted in this matter without any motive of personal gain, and that is a most important consideration in determining whether parties are guilty of contempt of the power of this court. They acted under a mistaken but honest intention to subserve the public interest, to protect the public right and the public property. They are not defendants, as I said, in the injunction, and I have noted that the injunction was only brought to their notice at the time when they began to do the things complained of, when they were making these arrests. It would be very harsh to say that these three men, these honest constables, who were not lawyers, were bound to take the copy of the injunction, which was thrust upon them in the heat and excitement of the making of these arrests, and read it and arrive at a correct idea of its legal effect and scope, and to discover that they would have to practically obey the injunction although they were not parties to the writ, and because they did not do these things they must be charged with the actual criminal intent to defy the power of the Court of Chancery. I am very sure that I cannot recall all the considerations which occurred to me as controlling this motion to have these men punished for contempt, but I think that I have indicated the leading reasons.

My conclusion is that there was no intentional willful effort on the part of these defendants to thwart the power and process of the Court of Chancery. They acted rashly but they acted in good faith. Of course, if men knowingly do anything the effect of which is unlawful, they are generally charged with intending to do what has naturally followed as the result of their conduct; but in punishing for contempt I think generally there must be an evil mind in order to find a criminal intent, and that is what I think is necessary in this case. There must be an actual intent to do wrong, an actual intent to thwart the power of the court. I do not find such an intent in this case, and therefore reach the result that the three defendants are not guilty. I think in relation to this matter of contempt there should be no order for costs. The defendants are found not guilty of actual intent to defy the power of the court, but they are not without blame. There is no question about that. They took the injunction papers and put them in their pockets. They refrained from reading them. A strong argument can be made that they are guilty of very rash and imprudent conduct, which warranted the proceedings which were taken to have them punished for contempt, and therefore I think I will make no order for costs.

THOMPSON et al. v. DYER et al.
(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Oct. 14, 1905.)

1. GARNISHMENT—TRUSTEE PROCESS—DISCLOSURE OF TRUSTEE—COSTS.

One summoned as trustee of the principal defendant in an action should file his answer, and submit to examination at the return term. If he fails to do so without reasonable excuse, he is liable to the plaintiff for all costs afterwards arising in the suit, if the judgment in the action be for the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Garnishment, § 377.]

2. SAME—PLEA.

The usual formulary statement, even if upon oath, that at the time of the service of the writ upon him, the person summoned as trustee did not have in his hands any goods, effects, or credits of the principal defendant, is not the disclosure (the discovery), but is in the nature of a plea, to be sustained or overruled according to the evidence adduced in the disclosure, or otherwise.

3. SAME—DISCLOSURE.

The disclosure of a person summoned as trustee must be complete and explicit, containing statements of facts, and not conclusions of law. Every statement that he desires to have considered as evidence must be direct, and, under the sanction of his oath, at least that he believes it to be true.

4. SAME.

In making his disclosure, the trustee may refer to books, papers, etc., and thus make their contents part of his disclosure, but the reference must be so definite and specific that the court may know from the disclosure alone what is referred to.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Garnishment, § 269.]

5. SAME.

He may refer to and adopt the statements of others made to him or in their testimony, but in such case he must make oath that such statements are true, or that he believes them to be true.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Garnishment, §§ 268, 269.]

6. SAME—ACCOUNTING BY TRUSTEE.

When it is made to appear that before the service of the writ upon him the trustee had in his hands goods, effects, and credits intrusted to him by the principal defendant, he must fully and particularly account for all such, if he would avoid being charged generally.

7. SAME—ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—LIABILITIES OF ASSIGNEE.

One who accepts an assignment as assignee for the benefit of creditors becomes the trustee of the assignor as to all goods, effects, and credits so assigned, even though he does not take actual personal possession of them. He will be charged as such trustee unless he fully accounts for them.

8. SAME.

The fact that all such goods, effects, and credits so assigned were taken possession of by an attorney appointed by the assignee, and that such attorney undertook the sole management of them under the assignment, does not relieve the assignee from liability to be charged as trustee. All the acts of the attorney in the premises are presumably his acts.

9. SAME—DISCLOSURE.

A statement, even upon oath, by such attorney, showing a full accounting for all such goods, effects, and credits, cannot be considered upon the question of charging the assignee as trustee, unless the latter makes such statement a part of his disclosure under his oath that at least he believes it to be true, or unless an issue has been formed by some appropriate allegation.

10. SAME—STATEMENT AS EVIDENCE.

A statement in a trustee disclosure is evidence, and not an allegation under the statute. Rev. St. c. 88, §§ 30, 31. The allegation which must be made to let in evidence other than the disclosure must be additional to, outside of, the disclosure proper.

11. SAME — INSUFFICIENT DISCLOSURE — EFFECT.

In this case the trustee admits that before the service of the writ upon him he had accepted an assignment of certain goods, effects, and credits of the principal defendant, and it is held:

(1) That the statement of his attorney, though upon oath, and in the form of a deposition, cannot be received as evidence for want of the statutory allegation by either party.

(2) That it cannot be considered as a part of the trustee's disclosure, though referred to in it, because the trustee has not made oath that such statement is true, or that he believes it to be true.

(3) That the trustee's disclosure is not sufficiently direct, full, and explicit to relieve him from liability as trustee.

(4) That he must be charged generally, the amount to be determined on scire facias when he may make further disclosure, and perhaps be then relieved except from costs.

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Washington County.

Action by Cyrus Thompson and others against Minnie A. Dyer. Frank L. Shaw was served as trustee.

Assumpsit on account annexed for merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiffs to principal defendant previous to October 6, 1899, amounting to $276.11, and interest thereon to date of writ, amounting to $6.43, the total amount of the account annexed being $282.54.

Frank L. Shaw of Machias was alleged in the writ to be trustee of the goods, effects, and credits of the principal defendant.

Service was duly made on the trustee on February 9, 1900. The writ was returnable to the April term, 1900, of the Supreme Judicial Court in and for Washington County, and was duly entered at said term. The principal defendant was duly defaulted.

No disclosure was filed by the trustee at the return term, and the trustee, although a resident of the county of Washington, in which the writ was returnable, neglected without reasonable excuse to appear and submit to examination at the return term.

No disclosure was filed by the trustee until the April term, 1901, of said court. At the April term, 1902, of said court said trustee filed a further disclosure, and at the April term, 1903, of said court said trustee filed a further disclosure. At the hearing on these disclosures, the deposition and "additional statement" of W. R. Pattangall, attorney for the trustee, were offered, and received in evidence against objection. Upon said disclosures, deposition, and "additional statement," the presiding justice discharged the trustee, although without costs. Thereupon the plaintiffs excepted to the rulings and decision of the presiding justice. Exceptions sustained.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, and POWERS, JJ.

J. H. Gray and Albert S. Woodman, for plaintiffs. W. R. Pattangall, for defendant and trustee.

EMERY, J. The contest in this case is wholly over the liability of Mr. Shaw, summoned as trustee of the principal defendant. The writ was served upon him February 9, 1900, returnable at the next April term of court in Washington county, where Mr. Shaw resided. He filed no disclosure, nor did he appear and submit to examination at that term, and nothing appears to have been done in this case until the April term, 1901, when Mr. Shaw filed the usual formulary statement that at the time of the service of the writ upon him he had not in his hands any goods, effects, or credits of the principal defendant, and thereof submitted himself to examination upon oath. It does not appear that any notice of this was given the plaintiff or his attorney, as required by court rule xii (20 Atl. xiv). Butler v. Starrett, 52 Me. 281. Under these circumstances, this statement or "denial must be considered in the nature of a plea, which is to be sustained by answers to interrogatories propounded by the plaintiff." Toothaker v. Allen, 41 Me. 324. The person summoned as trustee is not to determine the question of his liability. Id.

The principal defendant was defaulted, and the case remained on the docket with nothing further done, so far as appears, until the April term, 1902, when Mr. Shaw filed what is called in the report "a further disclosure," consisting of questions and answers. It is not stated which party put the questions, but from their character it would seem that they were put by Mr. Shaw's own attorney. Nothing further appears to have been done till the April term, 1904, when, the judgment of the court upon the question of his liability as trustee being asked, Mr. Shaw offered as an additional disclosure a statement of information received from his attorney as to his (the attorney's) doings. This statement was received, and presumably considered, against the plaintiff's objection. Mr. Shaw also offered as evidence to be considered the deposition of his attorney, which was admitted against the plaintiff's objection.

The first question is whether this statement of Mr. Shaw can be considered as a disclosure, or as evidence in determining the question of his liability as trustee. We think it cannot, for the sufficient reason that it is merely a statement of what a third party had told him. It contains no allegation of fact purporting to be within his own knowledge. If offered as a deposition upon an issue formed, no part of it could be read in evidence for that obvious reason. True, a person summoned as trustee may incorporate in his disclosure the statements of another made to him, but to give them any force, or to have them considered, he must adopt them as his own statements on oath, or must at least declare on oath his belief in their truth. Willard v. Sturtevant, 7 Pick. 194; Kelly v. Bowman, 12 Pick. 383; Parker v. Wright, 66 Me. 392. In this disclosure is no such incorporation or adoption, nor any allegation in the disclosure or the jurat that Mr. Shaw believes the statement to be true. The jurat is simply "subscribed and sworn to." This is merely an oath that the statements were made to him, not that he believed them. The law attributes great weight to the disclosure of a trustee properly made, and hence the plaintiff is entitled to have the conscience of the trustee thoroughly searched, in the fear of spiritual and temporal penalties for perjury. If a trustee be allowed to introduce into his disclosure the statements of others made to him, without making oath at least that he believes them to be true, the plaintiff has no benefit from the conscience of the trustee.

The next question is as to the admissibility in evidence of the deposition of the attorney, Mr. Pattangall. We think it was not admissible. Formerly nothing was admissible unless contained in the disclosure, or made a part of it under the oath of the trustee. Hawes v. Langton, 8 Pick. 67. The statute (Rev. St. c. 88, § 30) now provides that either party "may allege and prove any facts material," etc. Such facts must be alleged in some statement or plea before evidence of them outside of the disclosure can be received. Pease v. McKusick, 25 Me. 73; Schwartz v. Flaherty, 99 Me. 463, 59 Atl. 737. In this case there was no issue raised upon which any evidence outside of the disclosure could be received. Nothing in the disclosure had been denied by the plaintiff. No fact outside of the disclosure had been alleged or set up by either party. No question of fact had been put in issue. The only question was, what conclusion of law followed from the answers and statements made by Mr. Shaw under the sanction of his oath, leaving out of the account all statements not supported by his oath? The court, as well as the parties, was confined to those sworn answers and statements. Rundlet v. Jordan, 8 Me. 47; Chase v. Bradley, 17 Me. 89 (on page 94); Minchin v. Moore, 11 Mass. 90.

It is suggested that the statements in the disclosure may be regarded as an allegation under the statute. We do not think such statement is the allegation contemplated by the statute. The term "allegation" has a fixed technical meaning in law. It is a term in pleading, not a term in evidence. Allegation is not contained in the evidence, but precedes it. Allegation is the formal averment of a party setting forth the issue, and what he proposes to prove. Schneider v. Rochester, 160 N. Y. 172, 54 N. E. 721; Cent. Dict. The disclosure (the answers of the trustee to interrogatories) is not an allegation by way of pleading; it is a discovery. If the trustee desires to introduce the statements of other persons as evidence, he must make them a part of his disclosure by reciting them or identifying them, and by making oath that they are true, or, at least, that he believes them to be true, or else he must first make the statutory allegation by way of pleading. The allegation required is distinct from the disclosure. This is made clear by the language of the next section of the statute (section 31), which says: "Any question of fact arising upon such additional allegations," etc. This language indicates a separate, additional allegation in the nature of a plea. Again, no issue of fact to be tried under section 31 can be raised by any statement in the disclosure, since that statement it to be taken as true until overcome by allegation and evidence to the contrary. If no such allegation be made (and none was made in this case), there is no occasion for additional evidence. It is difficult to see how an issue of fact can be framed for trial under section 31, upon uncontradicted statements in the disclosure.

It is again suggested that the following statement in the disclosure makes the deposition of Mr. Pattangall, the attorney, a part of the disclosure, viz.: "So far as I know, the money was all received by W. R. Pattangall, to whose testimony I would refer you for the facts of the case." In the first place, Mr. Shaw does not state that Mr. Pattangall's testimony is true, or that he believes it to be true, neither in the disclosure proper nor in the jurat, which latter is simply "subscribed and sworn to." In the second place, the reference is too indefinite. The testimony alluded to is not annexed to the disclosure, nor referred to as an exhibit. Mr. Shaw does not state what that testimony is, nor where it can be found. He in no way identifies it, and anything made a part of a disclosure must be identified. Willard v. Sturtevant, 7 Pick. 194. It does not appear that the testimony had then been given. It might be testimony to be given. It does not appear that the testimony had been filed or even reduced to writing. There is nothing to show what testimony of Mr. Pattangall is to be read as a part of the disclosure. It is a fundamental rule in such procedure as this that the disclosure of a trustee must be full and complete in itself; that the trustee must in his disclosure incorporate, annex, or distinctly identify any paper or statement he desires to be considered, so that the court will need no other identification. For these reasons, we think the deposition of Mr. Pattangall cannot be regarded as a part of the disclosure.

The supposed disclosure and the deposition of Mr. Pattangall, offered at the April term, 1904, being thus held inadmissible, the next question is one of law, viz., whether upon the answers and statements in his disclosure at the April term, 1902, supported by his oath, Mr. Shaw is chargeable as trustee. In that disclosure he states that, prior to the service of the writ upon him, the principal defendant, Minnie A. Dyer, then owning and possessing a store, a stock of merchandise, and also accounts due her from various parties, made to him a written assignment of all her attachable property for the benefit of her creditors. This assignment Mr. Shaw accepted and signed. The instrument of assignment, dated October 6, 1899, was expressly made a part of the disclosure as "Trustee Exhibit 1." By its terms, Mr. Shaw engaged to sell and dispose of all the assigned property, collect the accounts, and make proportional distribution among such creditors of Mrs. Dyer as should become parties to the assignment, and pay the surplus to Mrs. Dyer.

Upon this statement, taken by itself, Mr. Shaw would be chargeable as trustee of Mrs. Dyer, the principal defendant, since by the assignment goods, effects, and credits of Mrs. Dyer "were intrusted to and deposited in his possession." Ward v. Lamson, 6 Pick. 358; Morse v. Bebee, 2 Allen, 466; Whitney v. Kelley, 67 Me. 377. It placed the burden on him to clear himself from liability, and to do so by clear, full, and direct statements. Haynes v. Thompson, 80 Me. 125, 128, 18 Atl. 276. "No presumption is to be made in his favor." Ripley v. Severance, 6 Pick. 474, 477, 17 Am. Dec. 397. "Every doubtful statement is to be received as indicative that he could not truly make one which would relieve the case from doubt." Lamb v. Manufacturing Co., 18 Me. 188. "The burden of discharging himself by clear and definite statements devolves upon the trustee." Whitney v. Kelley, 67 Me., at page 379. See also, Fertilizer Co. v. Spaulding, 93 Me. 97, 44 Atl. 371.

Recurring again to the contents of the disclosure, Mr. Shaw simply states that, despite the assignment and his engagement under it, none of the property ever came into his possession or under his control. His statement is as follows: "I never took possession of any of the property, but immediately after receiving the assignment, I, together with Minnie A. Dyer, employed Messrs. Pattangall & Leathers as attorneys, and we left Minnie A. Dyer's matters entirely with them. About the disposal of the personal property and the accounts, I know nothing. * * * I personally never received any money under or by reason of the assignment."

The fact thus stated does not relieve Mr. Shaw from his liability he incurred to Mrs. Dyer and her creditors under the assignment. Messrs. Pattangall & Leathers were his agents, appointed by him, though with Mrs. Dyer's approval. Their possession of the property was his possession. Their acts over it were his acts. By the assignment of Mrs. Dyer, goods, effects, and credits were "intrusted to and deposited in his possession." By permitting or directing his agent or attorney to take possession and dispose of them, he has not divested himself of his liability to account for them. Ward v. Lamson, 6 Pick. 358. True, if the agents in this case proved faithless, it might perhaps be a defense for Mr. Shaw against Mrs. Dyer that she had approved of their appointment; but no such thing is stated in the disclosure. So far as appears, the attorneys still have all the property, or its proceeds. It was Mr. Shaw's duty to know and inform the court what had been done by his agents in the premises.

The result is that, upon the disclosure to which we are confined, Mr. Shaw must be charged generally as trustee. If in fact he had no goods, effects, or credits of Mrs. Dyer in his hands, either actually or constructively, at the date of the service of the writ upon him, he has not yet shown it by legal evidence adduced in the manner provided by law. He has not yet stated discharging facts in his disclosure, nor has he yet opened any door for the statements of other persons. Upon scire facias, he will undoubtedly have the opportunity to make as full and clear and detailed a disclosure as may be required, or as he may desire, and to make the statements of Mr. Pattangall a part of that disclosure, or to open a door for their admission otherwise. If it shall then appear that he is not really chargeable, he will be discharged. No injustice will be done him if he will take the course prescribed by the law for bringing the facts before the court.

The last question presented by the exceptions is that of costs. Rev. St. c. 88, § 19, provides as follows: "Sec. 19. If a person resident in the county in which the writ is returnable, is summoned and neglects to appear and submit to examination at the return term without reasonable excuse, he is liable for all costs afterwards arising in the suit to be paid out of his own goods or estate if judgment is rendered for the plaintiff; unless paid out of the goods or effects in his hands belonging to the principal." Mr. Shaw was resident in the county, but did not appear and submit to examination at the return term. This neglect was adjudged by the presiding justice to be "without reasonable excuse." Being charged as trustee, he must also be adjudged liable for costs arising after the return term, if judgment be finally for the plaintiff.

The judgment of the court is:

Exceptions sustained.

Trustee charged generally. If plaintiff recovers judgment, he shall recover against trustee costs arising after the return term.

STATE v. DUANE.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 15, 1905.)

1. SEARCHES AND SEIZURES — DESIGNATING THREE PLACES IN ONE WARRANT.

A single search warrant cannot be lawfully issued to search more than one place. If the warrant contains a description of more than one place to be searched, it is invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Searches and Seizures, § 2.]

2. SAME — WARRANT — DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES.

When a warrant in describing the place to be searched, describes, as it reads, three places, each occupied by a different person, though all three places are adjoining, the court cannot read into the warrant words not therein written, to show the other two places were named simply as boundaries of the place occupied by the respondent.

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS—COMPLAINT—SEIZURE—DEMURRER.

A demurrer to a complaint and warrant will reach defects in the warrant, as well as those in the complaint.

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Lincoln County.

James A. Duane was convicted of keeping liquors for unlawful sale.

Under the provisions of section 49 of chapter 29 of the Revised Statutes, on a complaint made by W. R. Walter, a Lincoln county trial justice issued a search and seizure warrant, commanding the officer to search the premises therein designated for intoxicating liquors alleged to be kept therein, and intended for unlawful sale by defendant, Duane, and, if any such liquors were found, to seize the same, and arrest the defendant. The officer made search, as commanded, found certain intoxicating liquors, arrested the defendant, and brought him before the trial justice for trial. The trial justice, upon hearing, found the defendant guilty of keeping and intending the liquors for unlawful sale, and ordered the defendant to pay a fine of $100 and costs. The defendant appealed. In the appellate court the defendant demurred to the complaint and warrant. The demurrer was overruled by the presiding justice, and thereupon the defendant excepted. Exceptions sustained.

Argued before EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR JJ.

John W. Brackett, Co. Atty., for the State. Wm. H. Miller, for defendant.

EMERY, J. The use of what is known as "general warrants" for search had become so oppressive under royal authority, the people of Maine, in common with those of other states, undertook to safeguard themselves against them by the constitutional provision that "no warrant to search any place or seize any person or thing shall issue without a special designation of the place to be searched." Const. Me. art. 1, § 5; Rev. St. c. 133, § 14. In the warrant in this case the "special designation of the place to be searched" is as follows: "A certain building, and its appurtenances thereunto belonging, known as Hotel Davis, used and occupied by said Duane [the respondent] as a dwelling house in part and in part as an inn, situated on the south side of Main street, in the village of Waldoboro, in said Waldoboro, and the premises occupied by Edwin O. Clark on the east side, and the premises occupied by Gardiner J. Nash on the west side, of said building." The return of the officer on the warrant is this: "By virtue of the within warrant, I have entered the within described premises and searched the said premises," etc.

As it reads, the warrant assumes to authorize and even direct a search of three distinct premises, each occupied by a different person. This makes it a species of general warrant. If a magistrate can lawfully issue a single warrant upon a single complaint to search three distinct premises, each occupied by a different person, he can lawfully issue a single warrant for the search of any number of premises each occupied by a different person. This would practically be a return to that system of general warrants so emphatically forbidden by the Constitution and statute. This court, in State v. Robinson, 33 Me. 584, in speaking of search warrants, said (per Shepley, C. J.): "That cannot be considered a special designation of the place [to be searched] which if used in a conveyance would not convey it, and which would not confine the search to one building or place." We think this the true interpretation of the Constitution and statute.

The counsel for the state contends that really only one place is described in the warrant (the Hotel Davis), and that the Clark and Nash premises were named simply as boundaries of the hotel lot on either side. Unfortunately for this contention, there are in the warrant no words such as "between" or "bounded by," or other words indicating that the Clark and Nash premises were boundaries merely, and were not to be searched. Those premises cannot be excluded from the scope of the warrant without reading into the warrant important words not found there. Even if such words could be read into such a description in a deed without having the deed reformed in equity, they cannot, under any rule of criminal pleading, be read into so sharp and summary a criminal process as a search warrant.

The demurrer is to the warrant, as well as the complaint, and we think it must be sustained.

Exceptions sustained.

Demurrer sustained.

Warrant adjudged invalid.

WINSTED SAVINGS BANK v. TOWN OF NEW HARTFORD et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—ORDERS—INTEREST.

Where it was intended by the parties that loans evidenced by school orders stating no time of payment should be carried by the plaintiff as continuing obligations, and a collateral agreement was made fixing the interest thereon, the orders drew interest at the contract rate until plaintiff demanded payment, brought suit, or the orders were paid.

2. SAME—INTEREST AFTER MATURITY.

Where school orders, payable on demand by virtue of a collateral agreement, drew only 4 per cent. interest before maturity, the holder, after having brought suit thereon, was entitled to recover damages at the rate of 6 per cent. from the commencement of the action to the date of the judgment.

3. SAME — CONSOLIDATION OF DISTRICTS — DEBTS—LIABILITY OF TOWN.

Gen. St. 1888, § 2198, authorizes each town at its option to abolish the school districts and parts of districts therein and assume the management and control of the schools, and constitute itself a single consolidated school district. Section 2198 declares that on the affirmative vote of the town to abolish the school districts therein, etc., it shall assume the property of such districts and be responsible for their debts. Held, that on the abolition of the school districts in a town, the town became absolutely liable for the debts of the districts, though there was no equitable adjustment of property rights and liabilities as between the taxpayers of the several districts, etc., as provided by sections 2198, 2206; such provisions being mere details for the equitable completion of the consolidation, and not conditions precedent to its accomplishment.

4. SAME—EQUITY—ESTOPPEL.

Where a town neglected to make a needed adjustment of property rights and liabilities as between taxpayers of several school districts in the town, which were abolished on the town constituting itself a single consolidated school district, as provided by Gen. St. 1888, §§ 2198, 2206, the town, after returning to the district method of maintaining its schools, was not entitled to object to the payment of interest on indebtedness of one of the districts abolished during such abolition, because such payment would be inequitable as against taxpayers of other districts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Litchfield County; Milton A. Shumway, Judge.

Action by the Winsted Savings Bank against the town of New Hartford and others to recover money loaned defendant school district as evidenced by four school orders. A cross-complaint was filed by defendant district against defendant town, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff as against the district, and on the cross-complaint in favor of the district against the town to recover certain interest, from which plaintiff and the town appeal. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal and affirmed on the appeal of the defendant town.

Prior to October 4, 1897, there were in the defendant town of New Hartford nine school districts and three parts of districts. In each of said districts and parts of districts was a schoolhouse and other school property belonging to the respective districts. Three of the districts had outstanding liabilities. The defendant school district was one of them. Its indebtedness was $6,500, represented by four orders originally purchased and now held by the plaintiff, and each of the following tenor, to wit: "New Hartford, Conn., Nov. 15, 1886. Treasurer North End School District: Pay to the order of Winsted Savings Bank two thousand dollars, for Renewal Construction Acct. Orders. F. A. Jewel, George E. Bancroft, District Com. Accepted Nov. 15, 1886. Geo. A. Spencer, Treas." Upon these orders $1,500 principal had been paid. When these orders were taken by the plaintiff and the loan thus made, the parties agreed that the interest thereon should be at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. Interest at said rate was paid semiannually to November 15, 1898. No other payments of principal or interest have been made. The indebtedness of the other districts amounted to $600. At the annual town meeting of said town, held on October 4, 1897, it was voted that the school districts of the town should be consolidated. The town thereupon assumed the exclusive control of the property of the several districts and the exclusive management of the schools, the maintenance of which it thereafter continued at its expense for five years. At the annual town meeting in October, 1898, it was voted "that any adjustment of school property deemed advisable under present consolidation of districts be left with the town school committee and the selectmen." Pursuant to this vote and by authority of the chairmen of the boards named, an appraisal of all the buildings belonging to the several districts and parts of districts was made. No further action was ever taken in the direction of an adjustment as provided in section 2198 of the Revised Statutes of 1888, then in force, and no transfer of property by the districts to the town was ever made. At the annual town meeting in October, 1902, it was voted to abandon town control and re-establish the pre-existing school districts, and thereupon the several districts resumed their former functions and possession and control of the property owned by them before consolidation was voted. During the following February, the selectmen and town school committee met for the purpose of adjusting all claims between the town and districts, and decided that the property of the districts was in as good condition as before the town assumed its control, and that the town had no claim against the districts for repairs or improvements. The town never took any action assuming the liabilities of said districts other than that recited, and the defendant district never requested the selectmen to pay its said indebtedness to the plaintiff, or any part thereof, or the interest thereon, or to assess the amount thereof against the district on the grand list. In 1903 the two districts which had the $600 of indebtedness paid the same, together with all accumulated interest. No question was made as to the legality of the action taken by the town. The answer of the defendant district contained a cross-complaint which set up the facts connected with the consolidation, and asked, by way of equitable relief, that, in the event that judgment should be rendered against it in favor of the plaintiff or against both defendants, the portion of said judgment which each defendant as between themselves should pay should be determined and adjudged. The court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant district to recover the principal sum due upon said orders, with interest at 4 per cent. from November 15, 1898, and in favor of the defendant district against the defendant town to recover the amount of interest for the five years of consolidation, to wit, $1,300.

Samuel A. Herman, for appellant Winsted Savings Bank. Wellington B. Smith and Frank B. Munn, for appellant town of New Hartford. Donald T. Warner, for appellee North End School Dist.

PRENTICE, J. (after stating the facts). The plaintiff complains that the amount of its judgment is too small, in that interest upon the principal sum was computed at 4 per cent., and no more, for the whole period of time from November 15, 1898, the date to which interest had been paid, down to the date of judgment. It contends that interest at the rate of 6 per cent. should have been allowed as damages from either said November 15th or the date of the service of the writ. As no time of payment is stated in the orders, they were in legal effect payable on demand. Bacon v. Page, 1 Conn. 404; Raymond v. Sellick, 10 Conn. 480. As demand obligations they were, as between the parties, due and payable immediately. Curtis v. Smith, 75 Conn. 429, 53 Atl. 902. The date fixed in the instrument for payment may not, however, be that when payment is in fact intended. Hubbard v. Callahan, 42 Conn. 524, 19 Am. Rep. 564. The intent governs and creates the real contract. Seymour v. Continental Life Ins. Co., 44 Conn. 300, 28 Am. Rep. 469. In this case the intent of the parties that the loans evidenced by these orders should be carried by the plaintiff as continuing ones, and that the collateral agreement which was made as to the interest should continue to fix the interest rate until such time as one of the parties should exercise its right to terminate that contractual situation by demand or suit, on the one hand, or payment on the other, is apparent. The contract must therefore be regarded as one to that effect. To hold otherwise and permit the plaintiff to receive a higher rate of interest, whether in the form of damages or of interest proper for any period prior to the time when it took appropriate steps to put an end to the relation it had by express agreement created, would be to violate the plain intent of the parties. There is no rule of law which compels such violation. Seymour v. Continental Life Ins. Co., 44 Conn. 300, 28 Am. Rep. 469; Hubbard v. Callahan, 42 Conn. 524, 19 Am. Rep. 564. The first act to which the finding fixes a date by which the plaintiff, through appropriate action, sought to declare its termination of the long existing status, was the commencement of the present suit. The court therefore did not err in computing interest at the agreed rate of 4 per cent. for the time preceding the date of the service therein. Jencks v. Phelps, 4 Conn. 149.

With respect to the time subsequent to the beginning of the action, different considerations in part control. The recovery for this period is in the nature of damages for the breach of contract. Sellick v. French, 1 Conn. 38, 6 Am. Dec. 185. Parties may, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, agree as to the basis upon which the assessment shall be made. Hubbard v. Callahan, 42 Conn. 524, 19 Am. Rep. 564. As to what the rule should be in the absence of such an agreement or controlling statutes the decisions in different jurisdictions differ. Unfortunately those in our own do not leave some aspects of the subject free from doubt. It seems to have been well settled that, where the agreed rate of interest was higher than the legal rate, the agreed rate would be used as the measure of damage after breach. Beckwith v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co., 29 Conn. 268, 76 Am. Dec. 599; Adams v. Way, 33 Conn. 419; Hubbard v. Callahan, 42 Conn. 524, 19 Am. Rep. 564. With respect to a reverse situation, the cases are by no means explicit or satisfactory. Some quite plainly indicate the conclusion that the legal rate would be used. Fisher v. Bidwell, 27 Conn. 363; First Eccl. Soc. v. Loomis, 42 Conn. 570. Others, reference being had especially to the first two cited to the proposition that the conventional rate would be adopted where it is higher than the legal, are susceptible of a contrary inference. They may, however, be readily distinguished by limiting their doctrine, as Judge Loomis in Hubbard v. Callahan, supra, stated it, as intended to be applied to cases of the kind then under consideration. The reason for the position assumed in these cases is forcibly suggested in the first of them, where it is urged that the borrowers could not have been expected to derive a benefit in the rate of compensation from their breach of contract. The court was not disposed to lay down a doctrine which would result in a reward to wrongdoers for their wrongdoing. Beckwith v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co., 29 Conn. 268, 271, 76 Am. Dec. 599. A reversal of the conditions puts a changed aspect upon the situation. Justice and equity no longer call for a continuance of the agreed rate after breach. On the contrary, they call for some rule which will not permit one, after the dishonor of his contract, to compel its unwilling continuance until judgment can be obtained at a rate lower than what the law regards as the ordinarily fair one, and as low as the obligee was satisfied with before the dishonor. The aim of the law is to award as damages what will be fair compensation. The legal rate of interest is under ordinary circumstances chosen as the measure of this compensation for the wrongful detention of money as furnishing a convenient and presumably fair and equitable rule. Beckwith v. Hartford P. & F. R. Co., 29 Conn. 268, 76 Am. Dec. 599; Fisher v. Bidwell, 27 Conn. 363. A lesser rate which one might be willing to accept under favorable conditions could scarcely be presumed to be a just one to force upon him ad invitum and under changed conditions, which he could not be assumed to have contemplated when his agreement was made. We are of the opinion that reason and justice alike support the view that one who is unlawfully deprived of money which is his due should, statutory provisions to the contrary aside, be entitled to recover as damages for the unlawful detention interest at not less than the legal rate, unless he has otherwise agreed. Section 4600 of the General Statutes of 1902, following an act first passed in 1873, provides that "interest at the rate of six per cent. a year, and no more, may be recovered and allowed in civil actions, including actions to recover money loaned at a greater rate, as damages for the detention of money after it becomes payable." It is unnecessary to determine the full scope and effect of this provision. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to observe, not only that nothing in it can be held to militate against the plaintiff's right to recover at the rate of six per cent. since action brought, but also that its terms comport with such recovery, even if they do not expressly sanction it. The court therefore erred in not including in the damages awarded the plaintiff interest upon the principal sum at the rate of 6 per cent. from the date of the commencement of the action to the date of judgment.

The defendant town complains of the judgment rendered against it in favor of the defendant district for the recovery of the amount of the interest for the five years during which the vote of consolidation was in force. The reasons for this complaint are in the record stated in various forms. They are in substance, however, only two, to wit: First, that the town never assumed the property of the district and never became responsible for its obligations; and, second, that the imposition of this interest charge upon the town would be unjust to the taxpayers in other districts and inequitable as between those concerned. The first of these claims is based upon the propositions that neither the vote of consolidation nor that vote followed by the actual assumption and use of the property of the districts in execution of the vote sufficed to vest the town with the districts' property and render it responsible for their debts. The contention is that such a vesting and responsibility could only result either from an express assumption, the agreement of the parties, or a compliance with some or all the provisions of chapter 130 of the Revision of 1888, relating to the adjustment of property and obligations as provided in section 2198 and to the payment of debts as provided in section 2206. The statutes are not to be so interpreted. To each town was left the option to abolish the school districts and parts of districts therein, assume the management and control of the schools, and constitute itself a single consolidated school district. Gen. St. 1888, § 2193. It was provided that upon the affirmative of a town it should assume the property and be responsible for the debts of the districts. Gen. St. 1888, § 2198. The meaning and effect of this enactment is manifest. By force of it the action of a town which accomplished the abolition of the districts, the assumption and control of the schools, and the creation of a single union district was also made to accomplish the assumption of the property of the districts and of the liability for their debts. The provisions of section 2198, looking to an equitable adjustment of property rights and liabilities as between the taxpayers of the several districts, and those of section 2206 regulating the payment of certain claims and demands upon the abolished districts, related to proper details in the convenient and equitable completion of the work of consolidation, but they were not in any way made conditions precedent to the accomplishment of the essential results of abolition of existing districts, assumption of school control, constitution of town district, and devolution of district assets and liabilities.

It is contended that this construction rendered it possible for a town to appropriate the property of a district and make no proper compensation therefor by the statutory method of an appraisal and adjustment by a tax levy or otherwise. We have no occasion to decide whether such a possibility existed. If, however, the statutes failed of completeness in this regard through the substitution of the word "may" in the place of the original "shall" of the act of 1865, it yet remains that the other language of the statutes and their history and general scheme leave little room for doubt that the construction we have given is the correct one. Pub. Acts 1865, c. 112, p. 107; Pub. Acts 1866, c. 102, p. 90. The claim that a judgment against the town for this interest would be inequitable in its effect upon the taxpayers in the several districts is one to which the record gives no sufficient support. The facts which are said to indicate that result are that all of the districts had property, that all, save two in addition to the defendant, had no liabilities, and these two insignificant ones in comparison with those of the defendant, that these two have since the resumption of district control paid their debts and interest, and that there never was an appraisal, estimate, and adjustment of assets and liabilities to determine the equitable status of the several districts and equalize the burden upon their taxpayers as prescribed in section 2188. None or all of these facts tend to show that the judgment would lead to an inequitable distribution of burdens, as the town's brief assumes. The most that can be claimed of them is that they indicate such a possibility. What the fact is cannot be told from the facts upon this record. If inequity would result, the fault lies at the door of the town and its authorities who did not in 1897 take the statutory steps which would have created an equitable status under the new conditions then created. The law provided a way to that result. The town authorized its officials to take the necessary action. An appraisal was made by these officials. They went no further. It is fair to assume that this failure to complete the course contemplated by the statute was due to a decision that the existing condition required no action to render it an equitable one for the future; in other words, that the relation of the assets to the liabilities of the several districts and of the excess of the assets of each to the grand lists of each and of all was one which represented a fair distribution of the contribution to the joint fund vested in the town for school purposes by the consolidation. If the then status and conditions were equitable for the purposes of permanent consolidation, then it is equitable to all concerned that the town should bear the burden determined thereby, and an imposition upon it of the interest of any and every portion of the debts of the several districts for the period of consolidation becomes precise equity. The claim of the town, that there would be inequity in such a course, involves the proposition that it was seeking to do inequity when, in 1897, it failed to carry out an equitable adjustment. If by its own wrong it neglected to make a needed adjustment in order that an equitable status should be created, it is in no position now to take advantage of it. It is in no position to appeal to unproven possibilities. It cannot complain, if, in the absence of contrary proof, it is held to the fair presumption from its acts, judged upon the theory that it did its duty. The fact that two of the districts have volunteered to pay the small amount of interest which matured upon their indebtedness during the consolidation period cannot, of course, operate to deprive this defendant district of its rights.

The brief of counsel for the town assumes that if liability for the debts of the district rested upon the town during the five years of consolidation, and its claim of inequity was not well founded, the judgment against it was justified. This assumption is correctly made. Under the circumstances indicated, which are, as we have seen, those which exist in the case, the equity of the judgment is clear. The town as the result of its own action took to itself all the property of the district and became responsible for its indebtedness. During the five years which followed, it used and had the benefit of this property and was bounden to pay this indebtedness. Obligation for the indebtedness carried with it obligation for the interest thereon, and the duty to pay it as it matured. Had the town performed this duty and promptly met its obligation in this regard, the interest in dispute would have been paid. As payment thereof was not made at maturity, suits therefor might have been successfully maintained against it. Had payment been made or enforced, it would scarcely have been contended that the town could now recover back its payments. Upon what theory ought it now to be in a better position as the result of its nonperformance of its legal duty? Had the consolidation status remained permanent, it is quite clear that the town would have paid the debt and interest without questioning. In what respect does the return to the district system change the equitable situation as to the interest earned prior thereto? When the return was made, the district received back its property unaugmented and is held liable for the pre-existing debt. Upon what principle is it to be said that this indebtedness may be justly increased? When the town took over the property of the districts and became obligated for their debts, what it really got in each case was the excess of property over liabilities. When the former system was resumed and the property and pre-existing debts remained unchanged, the purpose of the law was that it should restore each district to the status quo. If we assume, as we have seen we must, that the excess of property in the case of each and all of the districts represented an equitable proportional contribution to the joint net property vested in the town by the consolidation, then it follows that if the town, while taking and using the property of any district, were permitted to ignore its debts, it would be given an inequitable advantage, and that, if any district receiving back unaugmented property is to have cast upon it an increment of obligations, it is not being restored to the status in which the consolidation movement found it. The brief on behalf of the town presents the claim that the court charged the town interest for five years, when under the pleadings only four years should have been allowed. Neither the claims below nor the appeal furnish any basis for this construction.

There is error upon the plaintiff's appeal, and no error upon the appeal of the town of New Hartford, and the cause is remanded for a correction of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the north end school district, conformably to the conclusions herein stated.

STATE v. MARLEY.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Nov. 7, 1905.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALE—TOWN AGENT—DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY.

Gen. St. 1902, §§ 2722, 2726, provide that in a no-license town of not more than 5,000 inhabitants its selectmen shall appoint an agent to sell intoxicating liquors for specified uses only, to hold office for a year, and that an account of the liquor so sold shall be kept, etc. Held, that a town agent appointed under such sections had power to appoint suitable subagents necessary to aid him in carrying on the agency, and to delegate to them authority to make sales in conformity with the statutes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Litchfield County; John M. Thayer, Judge.

William Marley was convicted of illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and he appeals. Reversed.

Leonard J. Nickerson, James P. Woodruff, and Elbert P. Roberts, for appellant. Donald T. Warner and Frederic M. Williams, for appellee.

TORRANCE, C. J. Upon the trial below the evidence for the state tended to prove that the defendant, a clerk in Crutch's drug store in Litchfield, at said store, upon two different days had sold, in September, 1904, without a license so to do, whisky to one Burke, to be used as a beverage. The defendant, in his defense, having testified that he was a licensed pharmacist, who as such had been, since 1896, employed in said store as chief clerk, offered to prove the following facts: That during the month of September, 1904, Litchfield was a no-license town; that Crutch was its duly qualified town agent for the sale of intoxicating liquors; that said drug store was the place designated for the sale of such liquors; that the sales charged in the information were made by the defendant in the absence of the agent, under a general authority from him to make, in the absence of the agent, such sales as the agent could himself make, if present; that the sales in question were made upon the statement of the purchaser that the liquor sold was to be used for medicinal purposes only; that such sales were immediately entered upon the town agent's books as sales for medicinal purposes; and that the defendant in making said sales acted in good faith, and in the belief that he had the right to make them as the clerk and servant of the town agent. The court ruled that the town agent could not delegate to any one else his authority to make sales of spirituous and intoxicating liquors at said store, and for this reason excluded the offered evidence.

Whether the court erred in so ruling depends upon the construction of the statutes relating to town agents of the kind here in question. These statutes, found in sections 2722 to 2726 of the General Statutes of 1902, in substance provide as follows: In a no-license town, of not more than 5,000 inhabitants, its selectmen shall appoint a suitable person as the agent of the town for the purchase and sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors, for certain specified uses only. Such agent is to hold office for one year, is to give bond for the faithful discharge of his duties, and is removable at the pleasure of the selectmen. He can sell liquors only at a place designated by the selectmen, for the uses specified only, at not more than a specified percentage above the cost price. The net profit of all his sales is to be paid over to the town. He is to receive for his services a fixed compensation, not to be increased or diminished by any increase or diminution of his sales. He is to keep an accurate account of all his sales, specifying the kind, quality, and price of the liquors sold, the name and residence of the purchaser, and the use for which the liquor was sold as stated by the purchaser. This account is to be open at all times to the inspection of the selectmen, and certain other designated officials; and the purchaser is made liable to fine and imprisonment for intentionally making to the agent any false representations "regarding the use to which such liquors are intended to be applied." This legislation, in regard to towns that have voted for no license, appears to have a two-fold object in view: (1) To provide an agency in such towns for the sale of liquor for certain harmless uses; (2) to prevent at such agency the sale of liquors for any harmful uses inconsistent with the vote of the town in favor of no license. To accomplish the first object the town is bound to provide a place where all those in want of liquors for the harmless specified uses can freely buy them at all reasonable times, subject only to such limitations and restrictions, as are imposed by law.

These provisions clearly evince, on the part of the Legislature, not only an intent that an agency for the sale of liquors for the uses specified shall be established and maintained, but also that such agency shall be open and available at all reasonable times to those who in good faith desire to purchase liquors for such uses. Now the town agent cannot be expected to be personally present at the agency at all times when it should be open; and to hold that he cannot authorize a suitable person to make sales for him in his necessary absence, on account of sickness or other reasonable cause, is to defeat in a measure the legislative intent, and put those entitled to purchase at the agency to inconvenience and, perhaps, loss. The object in establishing such an agency cannot be fully attained, except by holding that the agent may make such an appointment. It may be conceded, as claimed by the state, that the performance of the agent's duty to sell involves to some degree the exercise of discretion, and that as a general rule such a delegated power cannot be re-delegated; but there is a well-recognized exception to this general rule in cases where the appointment of a subagent is necessary in order to fully carry out the purposes for which the agent was appointed. Evans on Agency (2d Eng. Ed.) pp. 53-55, c. 6. The case at bar is, we think, a case of that kind. The authority of the agent is always construed to include all the necessary and usual means of executing the duties of the agency properly. Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, vol. 1, pp. 879, 880, and cases there cited. "It embraces the appropriate means to accomplish the desired end." Benjamin v. Benjamin, 15 Conn. 347, 356, 39 Am. Dec. 384. Evans on Agency, supra, p. 54.

As the statutes in question neither in express terms nor by necessary implication deny to the agent the power to appoint suitable subagents necessary to aid him in carrying on his agency, we think this case falls within the exception to the general rule above mentioned. It is claimed that such a power is liable to abuse, and that, perhaps, is true; but the temptations to abuse it are not very great, and, if abused by any agent, an effectual and speedy remedy is given in the power of the selectmen to remove such agent at pleasure. For these reasons we think the court below erred in not permitting the defendant to avail himself, if he could, of the facts which he offered to prove.

There is error, and a new trial is granted.

JOHNSON v. PHILADELPHIA, B. & W. R. CO.

(Court of Chancery of Delaware. Nov. 6, 1905.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—RIGHT OF WAY—CONDEMNATION—CHARACTER OF PROPERTY—VALUE—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a suit to restrain a railroad company from condemning certain land, under a charter providing that its line should not pass through any outbuilding of the value of $300 without the owner's consent, complainants alleged ownership of a stable affected by the intended right of way of the value of more than $300, but the only proof was that the stable was of value as an adjunct to a licensed house, and had been previously rented for $5 per month, and could not be replaced for less than $450 or $600, while defendant introduced a number of affidavits that the value of the stable did not exceed $150, complainant failed to sustain the burden of proof that the stable was worth $300 "at the time proceedings were instituted."

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—EXISTENCE OF STREETS—ABUTTING OWNERS' RIGHT TO QUESTION.

Where complainant, by virtue of proceedings to condemn land for a railroad right of way, was no longer an owner of land abutting on a street on which the railroad tracks were laid, complainant had no right to raise the question of the extension of the street over a portion of the railroad's right of way.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN—RESOLUTION—REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS—VARIANCE.

Where the resolution of the board of directors of a railroad company for the condemnation of certain lands to improve a portion of its line, required by 22 Del. Laws, p. 794, c. 394, § 82, for the institution of such proceedings, provided for a taking of a strip 40 feet wide extending between certain limits, it was insufficient to support a report of condemnation commissioners reciting the assessment of damages for the taking of defendant's land to the width of $41\frac{3}{10}$ feet in its widest part.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—EVIDENCE OF EXISTENCE OF STREET.

Evidence held insufficient to establish the taking of land for an extension of a street over lines claimed by defendant railroad company for a right of way.

5. EASEMENTS—RAILROADS—RIGHT OF WAY.

The use of longitudinal right of way along the right of way of a railroad company being inconsistent with its proper use by the railroad company, such an easement will not be presumed from mere user.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Easements, § 30.]

Bill by Arthur Johnson against the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Company to restrain defendant from elevating its tracks in certain streets of a city and from condemning certain property adjoining its right of way. On application for preliminary injunction. Granted in part.

Saulsbury, Ponder & Curtis, for complainant. Ward & Gray, for respondent.

NICHOLSON, Ch. The bill in this cause was filed August 31, 1905, and the answer September 11, 1905, at the hearing of a motion for a preliminary injunction on bill, answer, affidavits, and exhibits. The hearing began September 11th and ended September 16th. The case is one of a number brought by abutting property owners against the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Company for the purpose of preventing the elevation of the railroad tracks upon the railroad's right of way between West and Justison streets, in the city of Wilmington, or the condemnation of the properties adjoining the railroad's right of way on the north. This is the second of such suits to be heard on motion for a preliminary injunction; decisions having been rendered and opinions filed in the other suit on two several motions. Daniel Bubenzer v. P. B. & W. Railroad Co. (Del. Ch.) 57 Atl. 242, and Id. (Del. Ch.) 61 Atl. 270. The complainant in this suit has presented essentially the same case as did the complainant in the Bubenzer Suit, with the exception of the evidence adduced in relation to his claim of a right of way, and more specially as to the existence of a public street (Water street) over that portion of the railroad's property or right of way between West and Justison streets. The case presented by the respondent, however, is radically different. At the hearing of the first motion for a preliminary injunction in the Bubenzer Suit, there was no denial by the respondent of the allegations in complainant's bill, supported by a number of affidavits, in relation to his alleged easement of a right of way; and the preliminary injunction was granted expressly because of the implied admission of all the plaintiff's allegations by such failure to deny. The question of the right of way is referred to in the opinion delivered by this court upon the decision of the second motion (that made upon the amended pleadings subsequent to the condemnation proceedings) as follows: "And in respect to the original right of way above described, the respondent alleges in his answer to the amended bill that the condemnation proceedings concerning all that portion of complainant's property abutting upon the respondent's right of way have destroyed the easement and right of way alleged by the complainant over the respondent's present right of way, or the alleged bed of Water street, and that the destruction of said alleged easement or right of egress and ingress was considered by the said commission in assessing their damages for the condemnation of said property." Bubenzer v. P., B. & W. R. Co. (Del. Ch.) 61 Atl. 272. After the decision of that motion, affidavits and plots and photographs relating to a longitudinal right of way alongside the railroad tracks, to and from the property of complainant, were presented at Chambers by the respondent's solicitors, and from these were formulated the terms of the order actually signed. In the present case, however, a great number of affidavits are introduced, denying any adverse user of a way either across or alongside the tracks of the railroad, respondent, although the answer alleges, as did the answer in the Bubenzer Case, above cited, "that the destruction of said alleged easement or right of egress and ingress was considered by the commissioners in assessing their damages for the condemnation of said property." The most vital difference, however, between the case presented by respondent in this suit and that presented by it in the Bubenzer Suit consists in the respondent's treatment of the alleged fact which constituted the crucial point of the decision in the suit brought by Daniel Bubenzer, and the ground upon which that decision rested exclusively. I refer to the alleged fact of the existence of an outbuilding of the value of $300 upon the premises sought to be condemned. The respondent did not deny that there was an outbuilding on Bubenzer's property of the value of $300 or upwards, and that circumstance alone brought the Bubenzer property within the restriction of respondent's power of condemnation contained in the charter of the Wilmington & Susquehanna Railroad Company, viz.: "That it shall not pass through any burying ground or place of public worship, nor any dwelling house without the consent of the owner thereof, nor shall it pass through any outbuilding of the value of three hundred dollars without such consent." In the case before me, however, this vital allegation of the complainant is denied, both in the answer and by affidavits, and as, according to the principles laid down in the Bubenzer Suit, the complainant's case must rest ultimately upon his proof of this alleged fact, it would seem proper that this should be the first point considered.

The complainant's allegation upon this point in the first paragraph of his bill is as follows: "And on Water street, in which respondent's tracks are now laid, a stable opening upon said Water street, which stable has been in use, with egress and ingress by, through, and upon Water street, where said tracks are laid, certainly for fifty years, which said stable is of the value of more than three hundred dollars, to wit, the value of one thousand dollars." The respondent answers this allegation as follows: "And respondent further denies that there is any stable or other building or outbuilding of any kind upon the rear portion of said lot, described as No. 1, which portion of said lot was condemned by commissioners on petition of the said respondent railroad company, in accordance with the forms of law and of the statutes of the state of Delaware in such cases made and provided, of the value of three hundred dollars or upwards." The complainant supports this allegation of his bill by his own affidavit, as follows: "The stable on the easterly of two properties in which he is interested is of great value to the place as a licensed house, and has been regularly rented, when not used by the properties, for as much as five dollars a month, though sometimes for three dollars per month." There is but one affidavit corroborating or supporting in any way this allegation. That affidavit is made by William M. Connelly, the present building inspector of the city of Wilmington, and gives no estimate whatever of value. Mr. Connelly estimates what it would cost to construct an equivalent building, but significantly refrains from giving his estimate of the value of the present building. I will give his affidavit in full: "My name is William M. Connelly, and I am building inspector of the city of Wilmington, Dela. On Thursday, the 14th day of September, A. D. 1905, I visited the locality known to me for thirty years as Water street, west of West street, where the southerly ends of the properties fronting on Front street west of West street abut. I made an examination of the stable on the rear end of the Johnson property, for the purpose of determining what it would cost to place a building there to answer the same purpose for which this is fitted. The building is, of course, weather beaten, but a little pointing up of bricks and some paint would cause it to make a very different appearance. It would not be possible to erect an equivalent building there for less than $450 to $500. The building as it stands is sound, and answers all the purposes a new one would of the same size and character."

The railroad company, respondent, has filed in support of its answer the affidavits of eight experts. One of these, John J. Cassidy, alleges that he was building inspector of the city of Wilmington for six years, from 1898 to 1904, and that he had never had his attention called to the building erected in the rear of certain properties between West street and the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company's old foundry, abutting on the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington land, until recently. He then says: "I have also carefully inspected the said buildings as to their values, and beginning at West street, on going westward, I would value the buildings upon said properties as follows: The stable upon the rear of the property of Ellen Johnson, known as 402 West Front St., I would consider a value of one hundred and fifty dollars a liberal estimate therefor. The stable of Daniel Bubenzer, upon the rear of one of his properties, facing on Front street, I would consider seventy dollars as a liberal figure for its value"—and so on through the properties abutting on the space in dispute. The seven other affidavits are by prominent contractors and builders of the city of Wilmington, who testify that they have examined carefully the properties described by Mr. Cassidy, and four of them pronounce the buildings absolutely valueless, remarking that the estimate of value made by John J. Cassidy is very liberal. The other affiants simply aver that none of buildings referred to are of the value of $300. That there is an outbuilding on the property condemned of the value of $300 must, of course, be proved affirmatively by the complainant, in order to entitle him to the protection given by the charter restriction of the railroad company's power to condemn, and enable him to invoke the aid of the strong arm of the Court of Chancery. It cannot be held that he has succeeded in doing this, for the allegation in the bill to that effect is fully met by the denial in the answer, and the affidavit of the complainant himself, instead of strengthening, rather weakens, the simple allegation he has made in his bill, inasmuch as he indicates that he bases his estimate of value upon rents received at some past time, no rent at all being alleged as of the present time, and on some fancied peculiar value given to a stable by being owned in connection with a licensed saloon—a value which is not measured or accounted for. The affidavit of Mr. Connelly, as I have noted above, contains no estimate of value whatever, and it must assuredly be admitted that the cost of erecting a new building in the place of the old one, "of course, weather beaten," "which while it stands answers the purpose," cannot be taken as a measure of the value of the present building in the proceedings before me. The question is not what it would cost to construct a new building on the site of the old one, but what is the value of the present building.

The conclusion is inevitable, from the principles laid down in the Bubenzer Case, that, the complainant having failed to establish this ground for exempting his property from condemnation, the motion for a preliminary injunction must be dismissed, without regard to any of the other questions raised; provided, only, that the railroad company, respondent, can be shown to have taken the pains to proceed correctly in the condemnation of complainant's property. If the land of complainant has been lawfully condemned, the alleged easement of a right of way goes with it. It would also follow that the complainant, being no longer an abutting land owner, in consequence of the condemnation, would have no standing in this court to raise the question of the extension of Water street over that portion of the railroad's right of way west of West street.

The general corporation law contains the provisions which authorize and regulate the respondent's right of condemnation. It appears from these provisions that these condemnation proceedings are based upon a resolution of the board of directors (section 82, c. 394, p. 794, vol. 22, Del. Laws) which provides that "it shall also be lawful for any railroad company in this state * * * to straighten, widen and otherwise improve the whole or portions of its line or lines of railroad * * * in such manner and to such extent as its board of directors may determine upon, whenever, in the opinion of such board the same may be necessary, * * * and to acquire all lands and material necessary therefor by agreement with the owner or owners, or on failure to so agree, in the manner and by the proceedings prescribed in section 81 of this act." In section 81 it is provided: "That whenever any corporation created under this act cannot agree with the owner or owners of any lands, sand, * * * necessary to be taken and used in the construction of said railroad, for the purchase thereof, the said corporation may apply to the associate judge of the state of Delaware resident in the county where the land and material necessary to be taken are located," etc. Then follow the provisions relating to the appointment of freeholders, notice, etc., the assessment of damages which "the owner or owners will sustain by reason of the said railroad passing through, taking and using the same," and, finally, after prescribing how payments shall be made, etc., it concludes: "Whereupon the said corporation shall be entitled to have, hold, use and enjoy the said lands, premises and materials described and condemned in said report and required for the purposes of said corporation, for or on account of which said damages shall have been so assessed." The prerequisite resolution was duly passed by the board of directors, resolving that it was necessary, etc., to acquire the tract of land marked 3 on the plans submitted to the board, and describing No. 3 as follows: "A piece of land, with improvements thereon, having a width of forty feet, and extending from West street to Justison street, along the northeasterly side of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad." A strip 40 feet in width was thus authorized to be condemned, and therefore the first step was taken, in accordance with the law as construed in the Bubenzer Case, above referred to; but an examination of the proceedings following the said resolution of said board show a fatal variance. The report of the commissioners states that they did go upon and assess the damages on land of the defendant $41\frac{1}{10}$ feet in width at its widest part, and the plot of the land belonging to complainant, which was sought to be condemned, which plot has been submitted by respondent's solicitors since the hearing of the motion, shows a strip of land $41\frac{1}{10}$ feet in width, in harmony with the report, and it is not denied that that is the width of the strip which they proceeded to condemn; the same description of the strip appearing throughout in other papers. The authority upon which depended the whole proceeding of condemnation formally declared 40 feet to be the width of the strip to be condemned, thus at once creating and limiting the power to take. The commissioners, on the other hand, totally disregarding their mandate, proceeded to take a strip exceeding that width by one foot and two-tenths of a foot.

Nothing has been suggested by counsel, nor have I been able to discover anything, which could give me the authority to alter or amend the condemnation proceedings, or in any way avoid the conclusion that all the proceedings subsequent to the resolution of the board of directors were fatally defective and void. Respondent's solicitors have submitted an affidavit by one of the railroad engineers, which gives the reasons or motives which induced the variation; but unfortunately the motives, however excellent, cannot alter its legal effect. It appears to be clear, therefore, that although the respondent had the power to condemn the property in dispute in accordance with the provisions of the general corporation law, yet it is equally clear that it has failed so to do.

This conclusion brings me to the consideration of that question for the solution of which counsel in the cause have expended an amount of labor, which, if I may judge by its results, is almost unprecedented in this court. The question to which I refer is whether Water street extends west of West street, over the lines claimed by the railroad company, respondent. Beginning as far back as 1801, statutes, ordinances, debates, and proceedings in council, plots, maps, resolutions of committees, reports of condemnation proceedings, abstracts of title and affidavits without number, as well as letters and propositions from railroad officials, were produced at the hearing, and consumed in the reading nearly a whole week. In order to be certain that I had overlooked nothing, and to be able properly to co-ordinate and arrange in my mind this vast mass of material, I have gone over it all again very carefully at my desk, and over many portions again and again. If, taking it all together, anything affirmative could be extracted from the miscellaneous aggregate of papers, it would be proper for me to review and tabulate it thoroughly, even though it might occupy the space of a whole volume of law reports. Such is not the case, however. The conclusions to be drawn from it are purely negative, and my decision must be based upon what it fails to prove, rather than what it does prove; upon what does not appear, rather than what does appear. I shall therefore be very brief and very general in my view of it. The industry and research displayed in the collection of this material entitle counsel to commendation, and its results, which will be preserved in the office of the register in chancery, will doubtless prove of inestimable value to the local historian.

Proof of the Rumford title to the land in dispute was introduced by the respondent and abstracts of title of the abutting owners; also, an agreement between Jonathan Rumford and the Wilmington & Susquehanna Railroad Company, dated April 1, 1835, by which Jonathan Rumford agreed to convey to the railroad company, and "to make a good title in fee simple" to as much of his land "as shall be required by the said act of incorporation for the purposes of the said railroad," for the sum of $400. This was followed by Rumford's receipt for $400, and written promise to give a deed for the land whenever required by the company. The company went into possession under this agreement, and counsel claim a fee-simple title to the land, and not a mere right of way.

It will be entirely useless for me to cite the numerous acts and ordinances concerning Water street, because they have not been shown to have resulted in its opening between West and Justison, nor is there the slightest scintilla of evidence in writing that it was ever condemned. Condemnation proceedings were had throughout the year 1872, which finally resulted in the opening of a street 25 feet wide, called "Railroad Avenue," along the south side of the track of the respondent company, west of West street.

These proceedings were based upon a statute directing, and followed by a city election and numerous meetings of the city council showing discordant views, all resulting in condemnation proceedings, which finally ended, after many checks and delays, in the opening of a street 25 feet wide on the southerly side of, and immediately adjoining, the tracks of the respondent company. All this was set forth in detail, even to the amount of damages paid to each person entitled, and the exact description of every piece of property condemned. There are also affidavits as to the thoroughness of the search for documents and the ransacking of the city archives, which aver, in conclusion, that there is no evidence of the legal taking for a public street of any portion of the land used by the respondent company west of West street.

Upon the question of common report and long user showing dedication, many affidavits were produced by the complainant to the effect that the railroad tracks west of West street were considered to be laid on the bed of Water street, and that every one used the space south of the properties above described, and between West and Justison street, as a public highway, believing it to be Water street. In reply to this, however, the respondent introduced affidavits by the score contradicting these affidavits in every particular, and the affidavits introduced by the respondent were not only three or four times as numerous as those introduced by the complainant, but were made by the prominent manufacturers and business men of the city of Wilmington whose places of business were in the neighborhood of the property in dispute. Finally, the complainant introduced certified copies of city maps from the municipal offices, showing Water street extending beyond West street; but in reply to this it was pointed out by counsel for respondent that the Water street shown upon the said maps was a continuation in a straight line of Water street to the east, so that, as the railroad's right of way curved to the south at the block in dispute, the Water street shown upon the maps introduced by complainant would pass through the properties of the complainants in the above-mentioned suits against the railroad, rather than over the tracks of the railroad. Only one map has been shown by complainant that represents Water street as extending beyond West, and at the same time curving southward in conformity with the curve of the railroad. This map is in an atlas published in 1876, under the direction of one G. M. Hopkins, of 320 Walnut street, Philadelphia, as appears from the title page. It is manifestly a commercial enterprise, and the fact that Water street is indicated by it upon the land in dispute would not, of course, carry enough weight as evidence to justify this court in holding that such additional evidence proved the existence of Water street in the locality indicated.

The condemnation proceedings which I have referred to as going on during nearly the whole of the year 1872 did actually result, as I have already indicated, in the opening of Railroad avenue south of the respondent's right of way, hinging with it west of West street. A map maker, from a casual glance at those proceedings, in the absence of the exhaustive examination of them and other records and proceedings that has been made in this cause, might easily infer that Water street was extended with Railroad avenue.

The labor and research expended upon this branch of the case have shown laxity, confusion, and carelessness on the part of nearly every one concerned in past years, but it fails to disclose evidence that the land into the possession of which the railroad company, respondent, or its predecessor went under the agreement with Jonathan Rumford was ever subjected to the easement of a public highway, and became a public street of the city of Wilmington. I am therefore brought, after the long and arduous labors which this branch of the subject has cost me, as well as the counsel in the cause, to the same conclusion which I announced upon the decision of the first motion in the Bubenzer Case, viz.: "The complainant failed to sustain the contention that the land southwardly of his premises is an extension of Water street, and therefore a public highway."

The grounds upon which the complainant based his objection to the condemnation proceedings in the Bubenzer Case are stated on page 271 of 61 Atl., as follows: "(1) The respondent has no authority to construct an elevated railroad. (2) The respondent has no authority to widen its roadbed at the points in question, having already reached the extreme width authorized by the act under which it was created. (3) The respondent has no right to take for its use or destroy or pass through any outbuildings of the complainant of the value of three hundred dollars without his consent, by reason of the provision in the original charter of the Wilmington & Susquehanna Railroad Company, which provides that it 'shall not pass through any burying ground or place of public worship, nor any dwelling house without the consent of the owner thereof, nor shall it pass through any outbuilding of the value of three hundred dollars without such consent.' (4) The respondent has no authority to take the land in question because of certain irregularities claimed to exist in the condemnation proceedings, which are elaborately set forth in the bill." The complainant repeats all these grounds of objection in the present case. Two of them (the third and fourth) have been hereinbefore considered at length, and the two remaining ones (the first and second) were decided adversely in the Bubenzer Case for reasons fully set forth in the opinion of the Chancellor, and they must, for the same reasons, be decided in like manner in the case before me.

There is but one question, therefore, still to be discussed, and that is whether the complainant is entitled to an easement of a right of way obtained by user, and, if so, what way. It having been shown above that the condemnation proceedings taken by respondent were fatally defective, it follows that the complainant's motion for a preliminary injunction must be granted so far as to restrain the railroad company, respondent, from entering upon or taking the premises sought to be condemned. It also follows that, if there be an easement of a right of way attached to the said Johnson property, it should be protected by an injunction.

The complainant claims a longitudinal right of way alongside of the railroad tracks to West street for both of his abutting properties, and also claims a right of way across the railroad tracks for the property upon which there is a rear entrance to his saloon. The failure of proof as to this latter claim is complete. In fact, the affidavits submitted on this point seem to have been intended to support two different contentions, and they appear to be relevant to the claim of an indefinite roving use of the respondent's railroad track as a public highway or city street, rather than to the claim of user of a specific way to the rear entrance of complainant's property.

There are 52 affidavits, all in the following form: "That he knows the saloon kept by Arthur Johnson on Front street or Lancaster avenue in the city of Wilmington, just west of West street, with a back entrance thereto from Water street, and that he has more or less frequently, from time to time, as he has found convenient and desirable, crossed over the ground on which the railroad tracks of the defendant are laid on what is called 'Water Street' west of West street from the direction of the premises of the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, and entered the premises of Arthur Johnson by his back gate on Water street, which is such entrance, to transact such business there as he desired. This the deponent has done for about ——— years." They differ only in the number of years of user. These vary from a couple of years upward, there being seven which allege twenty years or more, and some which state "about twenty years," the others stating much less. It is manifest without discussion that such evidence is utterly insufficient to establish a right of way appurtenant to the Johnson property across the respondent railroad's tracks. For that purpose, it is not entitled to receive serious consideration.

The longitudinal right of way, however, rests upon a great mass of testimony connected generally with the rear entrances to nearly all of the abutting properties in the block, but is contradicted by a very large number of affidavits introduced by the respondent in reply to the complainant's affidavits, and denying that the user was adverse. I will not discuss now the effect of the allegations of the respondent's answer in regard to the condemnation of this alleged easement of the right of way, nor will I revert again to the position taken by the respondent through its counsel in relation to the alleged easement of the same way in the Bubenzer Case; but I will confine myself to the consideration of the very interesting and important question of law raised in the brief of respondent's counsel. This point is, as decided by some of the cases cited by him, that a longitudinal right of way along the right of way of a railroad cannot be granted by the railroad company, and therefore such easement cannot be acquired by user which presumes a grant. In the case which it has been necessary for me to cite so often—the Bubenzer Case (Del. Ch.) 57 Atl. 243—the Chancellor says: "The argument in that case and in the cases cited in the opinion does not apply to the decidedly different questions that are raised by the claim of a right of way by prescription over a railroad's right of way; and it is interesting to note that in the state of Massachusetts, where the right to obtain by prescription the easement of a private right of way over a railroad's right of way is established beyond question, the law is by statute precisely the same as that laid down in the California case above quoted, with regard to obtaining title by adverse possession to a portion of a railroad's right of way. Turner v. Fitchburg Railroad Co., 145 Mass. 433, 14 N. E. 627, and Fitchburg Railroad Co. v. Frost, 147 Mass. 118, 16 N. E. 773. In Turner v. Fitchburg Railroad Co., above cited, the court said: 'In Fisher v. N. Y. & N. E. Railroad, 135 Mass. 107, it was held that the statute of 1861, p. 413, c. 100 (Pub. St. 1882, c. 112, § 215), which, in substance, provides that no length of possession or occupancy of land of a railroad corporation by an abutter shall create a right in such land to the abutter, would not prevent him acquiring a right to a private way across the railroad by a twenty years user thereof.' The court further says: 'The defendant further urges that it is impossible to gain the right of way over a railroad in actual operation, as the land of the railroad would be subject to the easement of the plaintiff, who might make use of it at his own pleasure. The case does not require us to define the exact limits of the right which the plaintiff has acquired, but it does not follow that, even if he has an easement, it is not one which he is compelled to exercise subject to the superior right of the railroad corporation to run its trains as it may determine to be proper for the general business of its road. There certainly may be an easement which will permit a way to be used only at particular times or seasons or for particular purposes. As there may be by grant a "right to cross a railroad when the trains of the corporation are not passing, so such a right may be acquired."' On the one hand, the failure of the respondent to deny, either by answer or affidavit, the allegations of the bill and accompanying affidavits with reference to the easement of a private right of way, operates as an admission of the user of such right of way in the manner and for the period (much exceeding twenty years) alleged; and, on the other hand, the admission at the hearing by the respondent that the elevated structure contemplated would block absolutely all ingress and egress to and from complainant's premises operates to eliminate from this case questions relating to the extent to which difficulties of crossing respondent's right of way might be increased, or opportunities for so doing decreased, under conditions suggested by the language of the learned Massachusetts judge, above quoted." And the Chancellor concludes as follows: "In view of all the considerations which I have thus briefly adduced, it only remains for me to say that the complainant has shown that he possesses an easement for ingress and egress to and from the premises described in the bill over and across the railroad's right of way southwardly of his said premises, and that it follows that the company, respondent, should be restrained by a preliminary injunction from erecting any permanent structure that would obstruct, in the way contemplated by it, the complainant's enjoyment of his easement of such right of way. The motion for a preliminary injunction is therefore granted in so far as it seeks to restrain the respondent from obstructing or interfering with the enjoyment by the complainant of his private right of way over the respondent's right of way, southwardly of complainant's premises, by any structure or obstacle of a permanent character."

It is true that the order for the injunction issued after the decision of the second motion in that case protected a longitudinal right of way; but such modification of the original injunction granted in the case quoted just above was made upon the application of the respondent's solicitors after the decision of the second motion, and at a hearing granted them on the extent and form of the order to be signed, complainant's solicitors being also present. A moment's reflection will show that although, as stated in the Massachusetts case above cited, "there may be by grant a right to cross a railroad when the trains of the corporation are not passing," yet a right to use a railroad's right of way longitudinally is totally different. The first is, in fact, only a form of the familiar grade crossing, but from the very nature of things the use of the track or right of way of any railroad longitudinally cannot be subordinate to its use by the railroad, nor consistent with such use; and yet that is the postulate upon which rests the decision of the Massachusetts court which I have followed, to wit, that the easement of a railroad crossing exists sub modo, and is subordinate to the railroad's legitimate use of its right of way, dangerous and undesirable as such crossings are under the present conditions of railroading.

It is self-evident that the use of a longitudinal way along the right of way of a railroad company, except for an extremely short distance, is absolutely inconsistent with its proper use by the railroad company, and is subversive of such use. The question is discussed at some length in the case of Sapp et ux. v. Northern Central Railway Co., 51 Md. 124. The court say: "It appears from the facts stated that the easement set up is that of a private footway for some considerable distance over the lands of a railroad corporation, alongside of or between the tracks of the road from the house of the plaintiffs to a public highway. Without stopping now to consider other essentials of an easement by prescription, it is familiar and elementary law that title by prescription is founded on the presumption of a grant, and it follows from this that, in order to establish a prescriptive right, it must be claimed under and through some one who had a right to grant or create the easement claimed. Washb. on Easements, 120. That a railroad corporation has no power or right to grant an easement like this of footways for persons to walk along their tracks or by the side of them seems an almost self-evident proposition. It is obvious that, if such power existed and were exercised, it would be subversive of the very purposes for which railroad charters are granted. But the principle, if it needed authority for its support, has been decided. Thus, where a company was authorized by act of Parliament to construct and operate a canal for public use, and the defendant erected a milldam and steam engine upon its banks, and drew water therefrom for operating the same, and to an action for doing this pleaded a prescriptive right so to use the water, the court held that such right could not be maintained, for it implied an original grant thereof by the company to him, and they had no right to make any such grant, or to use the water for any purpose except for that of a canal." The court cite and quote from Rockdale Canal Co. v. Radcliffe, 83 Eng. C. L. Reports, 287, and also Staffordshire Canal v. Birmingham Canal, Law Reports, 1 Eng. & Irish Appeals, 254, and add: "We have been referred to no authority and have found none in which the doctrine of those decisions have been controverted." These English canal cases cited contain, of course, many elements not existing in a railroad case, but the same line of reasoning seems to apply, and it compels assent to the proposition that a longitudinal right of way along the right of way of a railroad not owning the soil cannot be created by such railroad by grant or otherwise, and cannot be acquired by user adverse to the railroad. How, indeed, can a railroad corporation, possessing only a right of way for railroad purposes, grant a right of way for purposes inconsistent with, and subversive of, their own use of it as a railroad? And, as stated by the court in the Maryland case, "It is familiar and elementary law" that title by prescription is founded on the presumption of a grant, and it follows from this "that, in order to establish a prescriptive right, it must be claimed under and through some one who had a right to grant or create the easement claimed."

The only question arising in the application of this reasoning to the case before me arises from the question of title. Counsel for the respondent have claimed throughout the argument that the railroad company, respondent, has an estate in fee simple in the land over which the easement of a right of way is claimed, and not a mere right of way over the land. If such be the case, the question arises whether the railroad company, respondent, as owner in fee, might not have the right to grant or create the easement, notwithstanding the fact that it is a corporation created for the purpose of conducting the business of a railroad company. This claim of title, however, made by the respondent's solicitors, has been emphatically denied during the argument of the pending motion by the complainant's solicitors, although it has not been a material issue in the cause, and assuredly it has not been so established as to become the basis of any affirmative action.

In view of all the considerations which I have adduced in reviewing the confused and complicated matters presented for my determination upon the pending motion, and also in view of the fact that one of the fundamental rules controlling the action of a court of equity in granting or refusing an injunction is that the protection of the writ must be actually, and not theoretically, needed in order to justify the granting of it, I am led to the conclusion that the motion for a preliminary injunction ought to be denied so far as it concerns the alleged easement of a right of way, which is the same way that the railroad company, respondent, is already enjoined from encroaching upon or interfering with by the injunction outstanding in the Bubbenzer Case.

For the reasons hereinbefore given at length, the motion for a preliminary injunction is granted only so far as to restrain the railroad company, respondent, and its agents from entering upon or taking the land described in the condemnation proceedings which have been hereinbefore referred to.

Let the order be entered accordingly.

DILLON v. HUDSON, PELHAM & SALEM ELECTRIC RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Oct. 3, 1905.)

1. DEATH — DAMAGES — CAPACITY TO EARN MONEY—EVIDENCE.

Under Pub. St. 1891, c. 191, § 12, providing that, in an action for the wrongful killing of a human being, his capacity to earn money may be considered as an element of damage, evidence tending to show such capacity is competent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Death, §§ 88, 108.]

2. SAME.

Evidence in an action for the wrongful killing of plaintiff's wife, brought under Pub. St. 1891, c. 191, section 12 of which makes capacity to earn money an element of damage, that deceased never had earned money, and from her station in life probably never would render services calling for pay, though competent on the question of capacity to earn, would not prevent the jury from finding from other evidence that such capacity existed.

3. SAME.

In an action for the wrongful killing of plaintiff's wife, brought under Pub. St. 1891, c. 191, section 12 of which makes earning capacity of the deceased an element of damage, evidence as to the value of the wife's services as housekeeper in plaintiff's family was competent as tending to show such earning capacity.

Transferred from Superior Court; Chamberlin, Judge.

Action by James Dillon against the Hudson, Pelham & Salem Electric Railway Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant excepted. Transferred from the January term, 1905, of the superior court. Exceptions overruled.

The deceased was the wife of the plaintiff. The defendant excepted to evidence of the value of the deceased's services as housekeeper in the plaintiff's family, which was offered as tending to show her capacity to earn money, and also to so much of the charge to the jury as authorized an assessment of damages on account of the capacity of the deceased to earn money. Other exceptions taken at the trial were abandoned in argument.

Rice, King & Rice and George F. Jackson, for plaintiff. Samuel W. Emery, for defendant.

PARSONS, C. J. The statute which authorizes the present action for the wrongful killing of a human being limits the damages which may be recovered to $7,000 (Pub. St. 1891, c. 191, § 11), and provides (Id. § 12) that "the mental and physical pain suffered by him in consequence of the injury, the reasonable expenses occasioned to his estate by the injury, the probable duration of his life but for the injury, and his capacity to earn money, may be considered as elements of damage in connection with other elements allowed by law." The rule of the common law which permitted no recovery for causing the death of a human being has been generally abrogated by statutes which prescribe the grounds for which damages may be recovered, which differ so widely in the different statutes that decisions as to the damages recoverable under them would be of little aid, if there were doubt as to the meaning of the statute upon which this action is founded. The statute makes the capacity to earn money an element for consideration in assessing the damages. Hence evidence tending to show such capacity was competent. Evidence that the deceased never had earned money, and from her station or situation in life probably never would, might be competent upon the question of capacity to earn, but would not establish its nonexistence. Hence the fact that the deceased never had earned money and probably never would render services which would be requited by a pecuniary compensation, if found from the evidence, would not prevent the jury from finding from other evidence that such capacity existed. The defendant's contention that the damage to the deceased's estate because of the cessation of her earning power is dependent upon so many contingencies as to be entirely speculative in character, and that therefore the earning capacity of the plaintiff could not properly be considered in assessing the damages, might be entitled to serious consideration if this were a common-law action; but the statute which authorizes the action prescribes the elements of damage, among which is the "capacity" of the deceased "to earn money." The language of the statute disposes of the exception. Carney v. Railway, 72 N. H. 364, 372, 57 Atl. 218.

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

COOLBAUGH v. LEHIGH & WILKES-BARRE COAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

1. JUDGMENT—LIEN—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

Where a coal lease gave the lessee the right to remove a certain number of tons of coal annually, the lease to determine when all the coal should be removed, unless ended sooner under certain other provisions of the lease, and an annual rental was to be paid to the lessors, the lessors retained an interest in the coal to which the lien of a judgment would attach.

2. EXECUTION—SALE—INTEREST IN COAL—RIGHTS ACQUIRED.

Where a coal mine was leased for a certain annual royalty, and the lessors' interest in the coal was sold under a judgment against it, the royalties provided for in the lease were properly paid to the purchaser of the lessors' interest.

3. SAME.

Where a coal lease gave the lessee the right to mine a certain number of tons annually until the coal was mined at an annual rental, the legal title remained in the lessors; and where it was not taken from them within six years during the continuance of the lease, by mining the same, the money paid to them under the lease belonged to them as rental for the land occupied by the lessee, though the lessee had not used the land for the mining of coal, as it had a right to do under the provisions of the lease; and on a sale on execution against one of the lessors his interest in the rental went to the purchaser.

Mestrezat, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Luzerne County.

Action by J. R. Coolbaugh, administrator of Milton Dana, against the Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Company. From an order discharging a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

F. C. Sturges and F. M. Nichols, for appellant. S. J. Strauss, A. H. McClintock, and Arthur Hillman, for appellee.

BROWN, J. On August 30, 1870, Milton Dana and others, owners of coal lands in Luzerne county, entered into an agreement with the Wilkes-Barre Coal & Iron Company, granting, demise, and leasing unto it, its successors and assigns, all the coal in said lands. The appellee succeeded to all the rights of the original lessee. The demise or lease, as the agreement is termed by the parties, was to date from January 1, 1870, and "to determine and end when all the mineable (and) anthracite coal shall have been mined and removed from the demised premises, unless the term be sooner ended under provisions" thereafter contained. The lessee covenanted to pay to the lessors the annual rental of $20,000, in quarterly installments of $5,000 each, in consideration of which it is permitted annually to mine and remove 80,000 tons of coal. There is a further provision that, "if the said party of the second part shall pay said twenty thousand dollars rent in any one year, as is hereinbefore provided, and during that year less than eighty thousand tons of coal, of the pounds aforesaid, be mined and removed, the said party of the second part may, in any subsequent year within six years thereafter, during the continuance of this lease, mine and move sufficient coal to make up the deficiency." On default in the payment of "an installment of rent, or any part thereof," for a period of 60 days, it was covenanted and agreed that the lessors, in their option, might declare the term of the "lease" at an end, and the "lease" was thereupon to absolutely cease and determine. Dana received his share of the payments made for the coal mined and removed up to April 1, 1880. On April 8, 1880, on an execution upon a judgment against him, the sheriff of the county sold to Joseph Birbeck and Alexander H. Van Horn all his "right, title, and interest in and to all the coal in and under" the land embraced in the lease. Since the sale and delivery of the sheriff's deed to these vendees of Dana's interest the payments for the coal mined and removed have been made to them. The affidavit of defense, in addition to the allegation of Birbeck's and Van Horn's ownership of interest in the coal and their right as the sheriff's vendees to receive payments for the same as mined, avers that the payments were made to them in the lifetime of Dana with his knowledge and consent; that since his death they were made without protest or objection from any of his heirs or personal representatives; that there has arisen a complete and final presumption of law that Birbeck and Van Horn acquired the title for a full consideration, and have paid for the same to the said Dana or the persons who, on his behalf, were entitled to receive the rentals; and therefore his administrator, who brings this suit, is estopped from asserting a right to recover.

The questions raised by the statement and affidavit of defense are properly stated by the court below to be: "(1) Whether the sheriff's sale to Birbeck and Van Horn passed to them the right of the execution defendant Dana to receive 'rentals' or royalties under the coal lease. (2) If not, then is the administrator of his estate estopped from now asserting the right to recover from the defendant company royalties already paid to the sheriff's vendees or their representatives? (3) Would the facts averred, if proven, raise a presumption of a grant by Milton Dana to said vendees, of his right to receive such royalties?" Having been of opinion that the first of these three questions should be answered in the affirmative, and having so answered it, the court below deemed the discussion of the other two unnecessary.

Though the agreement of August 30, 1870, is called by the parties to it a demise or lease, we have, from Hope's Appeal (Pa.) 3 Atl. 23, down through a long line of cases, called it a sale of coal in place as land. Sanderson v. Scranton, 105 Pa. 469; D., L. & W. Railroad Co. v. Sanderson, 109 Pa. 583, 1 Atl. 394, 58 Am. Rep. 743; Lillibridge v. Coal Co., 143 Pa. 293, 22 Atl. 1035, 13 L. R. A. 627, 24 Am. St. Rep. 544; Kingsley v. Coal & Iron Co., 144 Pa. 613, 23 Atl. 250; Lazarus' Estate, 145 Pa. 1, 23 Atl. 552; Denniston v. Haddock, 200 Pa. 426, 50 Atl. 197. In the last case cited the lease was for 20 years and provided for the payment of a minimum royalty. It was executed on September 27, 1870, by Margaret Denniston and others to Charles Hutchinson, whose interest became vested in Haddock, the appellant. It appeared that Hutchinson and his successors in title had paid royalty during the whole term of the lease, but, on account of strikes and other circumstances, were prevented from mining coal to the full extent of the minimum paid. On September 22, 1891, the lessors executed a new lease, to take effect from October 1, 1891. Haddock, the lessee, had been continuously in possession of the property during the terms of both the old and the new lease and the period between them. He claimed to defalk the overpayments under the old lease, amounting to $15,000, from the royalties due under the new lease, and, in affirming the judgment of the court below, refusing to allow such set-off, what was said by the present Chief Justice may now be very properly quoted at length as supporting appellee's contention: "It has been said in a number of cases that a conveyance of the right to mine and remove all the coal in a given tract of land, is a sale of the coal in place, although the conveyance may be called a lease. The expression is unfortunate; for, while it may have produced no erroneous result in the cases where it is used, it tends to substitute the general rules appertaining to sales for the rules properly applicable to the particular contract that may be under consideration by the court. Thus, for example, in Hope's Appeal (Pa.) 3 Atl. 23, which is practically the starting place of the error, the agreement, though called a lease, was a purchase of the coal at a fixed price per acre, making a liquidated gross sum, which was payable absolutely in installments ending within 13 years, though the lessee had a nominal term of 99 in which to remove the coal. It was justly said by the learned court below, whose decision was affirmed here, that it was 'manifest that the parties contemplated an actual sale of the coal, and not a lease in the ordinary use of that word.' In Sanderson v. Scranton, 105 Pa. 469, the lease was expressly made 'perpetual until all the coal under the tract is mined,' and it was held that this was such a complete severance that the taxes of the city of Scranton on the coal in place were chargeable to the lessee, and not the lessor. So in Kingsley v. Hillside Coal & Iron Co., 144 Pa. 613, 23 Atl. 250, it was again held that there was such a severance that occupation of the surface was not an adverse possession, even against a lessee who had not opened up or entered on actual possession of the coal. With the decisions in these cases no fault can be found; but the expression that a conveyance of coal in place, even by a lease for a limited term, is a sale, is inaccurate as a general proposition of law, and unfortunate from its tendency to mislead, which is apparent in some of the subsequent cases. Whether it would be better to call such an instrument accurately what it certainly was at common law, a lease without impeachment of waste, or to endeavor to reconcile all the decisions by calling it a conditional sale, is not necessary at present to discuss. The point to be noted is that the rules applicable to sales are not to be applied indiscriminately to such instruments, but each is to be construed like any other contract by its own terms. The defense in the present case is an ingenious misapplication of the principle of a sale. Appellant in compliance with his obligation under the lease paid a minimum royalty each year, and at the end of his term had paid more royalty than would have been required by the coal actually mined. He remained in possession of the land for a year under arrangement with one of the owners, and then took a new lease, under which the royalties now sued for accrued. He now claims to defalk the overpayments under the old lease, on the ground that he had paid for the coal and was entitled to it without further charge, because under his continued possession he could take it away without a trespass. The defect of this view is in the assumption that he had paid for the coal. He had not. He had paid his rent on the stipulated terms, but he had paid nothing for the coal in place. His sole claim and title to that was to mine it during the term of the lease. As to it he was in the position of a lessee of a house, bound to pay rent whether he occupied it or not. The fact that he paid without occupying it would not excuse his liability for further rent if he accepted a new lease. Appellant admits that if he had gone out of possession at the termination of his lease he would have had no further claim to the coal, but his reason assigned is not the correct one. The right to remove the coal would have ended, not because the lessee had forfeited or abandoned his property in it, but because he had never acquired any such property; his right to do so being expressly limited to the term covered by the lease." In D. L. & W. Railroad Co. v. Sanderson, supra, the question was as to who should pay the taxes on the coal as land, the lessor or lessee under a coal lease, and Trunkey, J., distinctly stated that no question arose "respecting the grantors' security for the purchase money, nor of their power to subject their right under the deed to the lien of a mortgage."

Here the question is as to the power of the grantor, Dana, to subject to the lien of a judgment the interest remaining in him under the agreement with the Wilkes-Barre Coal & Iron Company. If the lessee had paid the rental of $20,000 for the first year, but had mined no coal, and in the second year, on its default in payment of a quarter's rent, the lessors had, in accordance with the terms of the lease, declared it terminated and resumed possession under the forfeiture clause, the lessee could not thereafter have mined and removed any coal because it had paid $20,000 for the first year. This is the clear meaning and intent of the contract. That sum would have been retained simply as rent paid, and received as such, for the right to occupy and use the land by removing the coal therefrom for one year. Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. v. Wright, 177 Pa. 387, 35 Atl. 919; Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Everhart, 206 Pa. 118, 55 Atl. 864. It is only "during the continuance of the lease"—that is, before the rights of the lessee have terminated by a forfeiture of them—that it can, during any six years following an annual payment of $20,000, appropriate to the payment of coal mined so much of that sum as has not been appropriated in any prior year to the payment of coal mined. After the expiration of six years no such appropriation can be made, and the minimum royalty is to be retained purely as rent for the year's occupancy of the land. The agreement of the parties is that the minimum rental of $20,000 may be applied by the lessee on account of the purchase money of the coal, provided it will actually purchase and acquire title in the manner pointed out in the agreement, viz., by mining it within six years. Until it is so mined the legal title remains in the lessors, and if not taken from them within six years during the continuance of the lease in the manner stated, the money paid them belongs to them as rental for their land which had been occupied by the lessee, though not used and appropriated by it as it had the right to do. This was just the situation when the interest of Dana in the coal land was seized and sold under the execution against him. If the coal had all been mined, the worked-out space would have reverted to him, and what had not been worked out was under a continuing contingency of reverting to him by a forfeiture of the lease. He still had an interest in the coal as land, title to portions of which, and in the end to all of which, he had agreed should pass from him and become vested, not only equitably, but legally, in the lessee, as from time to time it acquired the legal title to the coal by mining and removing it. But until the legal title was so taken from him it remained in him, as in the case of any vendor of real estate. This is the title that was still in him when it was sold from him by the sheriff to Birbeck and Van Horn, and, having acquired it, they are now entitled to all the rights under it. The one involved in this case is the right to the royalties, which, under the agreement of August 30, 1870, are to be regarded as pro tanto purchase-money payments for the coal in place, if mined and removed within a stipulated time. The title thereto is acquired by using these royalties within the stipulated period of six years during the continuance of the lease as payments for coal actually taken out and away.

As the question raised on this appeal did not arise in any of the cases holding a lease like the present to be a sale of coal in place as land, they are not to be regarded as in conflict with the view here expressed. Though expressions in some of them are apparently irreconcilable with it, it is to be remembered, as is said in Denniston v. Haddock: "The rules applicable to sales are not to be applied indiscriminately" to these leases; and when, as here, the question is as to the right of the grantor or lessor to subject the interest in the land which remains in him to the lien of a judgment or mortgage, no other doctrine than the one announced by the court below can accord with reason or the authorities relating to the interest retained by a vendor under an agreement for the sale of his land.

The order of the court below discharging the rule for judgment is affirmed.

Appeal of YORK HAVEN WATER & POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

1. TAXATION — ASSESSMENT — PROPERTY IN TWO COUNTIES.

Where a power company erected its power house on a part of a 400-acre farm, that portion of the farm was separated from the remainder, and it did not matter where the mansion house on the farm was located, as it would not, under Act June 1, 1883 (P. L. 51), providing that, where county lines divide a tract of seated land, assessments shall be made in the county in which the mansion house is situated, be affected as to the place of tax by such fact.

2. COUNTIES—BOUNDARIES.

Under Act Aug. 19, 1749 (1 Smith's Laws, p. 198), the boundary line between Lancaster and York counties is the ordinary low-water mark on the west side of the Susquehanna river, and not the lowest line reached as the result of extreme drought.

3. TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—APPEAL—REVIEW.

The findings of fact by the lower court on appeal from the tax assessment will not be set aside, unless clearly erroneous.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Lancaster County.

Appeal of York Haven Water & Power Company from decree dismissing appeal from assessment by county commissioners. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the court below:

"The York Haven Water & Power Company is a corporation organized for the purpose of supplying water and power and of generating electricity by means of water power. It owns a tract of about 400 acres of land in York county, bounded on the east by the Susquehanna river, on which is erected a mansion house, barn, and other farm buildings, and a warehouse wherein is kept materials used in and about its business. It has erected a crib dam several thousand feet long in the Susquehanna river, south from which runs a retaining wall, which is part of the dam, at the end of which is erected a power house, where the said company generates electricity by means of the water power of the river. This power house, with machinery, is admitted by an officer of the company to be worth $500,000, the amount at which it is assessed. The dam and most of the retaining wall are in Lancaster county. The county commissioners of Lancaster county and the township authorities of Conoy township claim that the power house and all of the retaining wall are also located in Lancaster county, and the assessor of Conoy township has assessed and returned it as liable for tax in Lancaster county. From this action the York Haven Water & Power Company has taken this appeal. It contends that its power plant is not taxable in Lancaster county, but, if taxable at all for township and county purposes, which question is not raised by the appeal, it should be taxed in York county, first, because it is erected on part of the 400-acre tract of land, the mansion house on which is located in York county, and, even though the power plant is located across the boundary line in Lancaster county, the whole must be taxed as one tract, and that in the county where the mansion house is located; second, because the power house is located in York county.

"The first contention of the appellant is based on the act of assembly of June 1, 1883 (P. L. 51), section 1 of which is as follows: 'The assessors of the several counties within this commonwealth shall, on seated lands, make the assessment in the county in which the mansion house is situate, when county lines divide the tract.' With the exception that this act applies to counties, it is in the exact language of the fifty-ninth section of the act of July 11, 1842 (P. L. 331), which applies to townships. The act of 1842 has received a construction by the superior court in the case of Com. v. Wheelock, 13 Pa. Super. Ct. 282, which will assist us in applying the act of 1883 to the present case. In that case (Com. v. Wheelock) A. was the owner of a tract of land, part of which, on which was erected the mansion house, was in a township, and a small part of which was in a borough. On the part located in the borough was erected a house occupied by the owner's mother and sister, rent free. It was decided that the house in the borough was taxable in the borough and not in the township where the mansion house was located, because it was not used as part of the farm. Judge Rice, in delivering the opinion of the court, says (page 287): 'Possibly this house is subject to assessment in the borough, and upon reflection we are inclined to the opinion that this is the correct view. It appears to be in the exclusive occupancy of the owner's mother and sister as a dwelling, and it does not appear it is used as part of, or in connection with, the farm. If the owner had demised it, reserving a rent, it would seem clear that this would be a severance of it from the rest of the farm, which would make it subject to taxation as a distinct tenement. The fact that the owner's mother and sister pay no rent, if such be the fact, does not seem to us to affect the question. The controlling fact is that it is in their exclusive occupancy, and is not used in connection with, or as a part of, the farm.' When the York Haven Water & Power Company erected its power house on a part of this 400-acre farm, if it is on a part of it, that portion of the farm was severed from the remainder. It was no longer used as part of, nor in connection with, the farm, but for a separate and independent purpose. That is the controlling fact. It does not matter, therefore, where the mansion house is located, if it is in another county; for it would not, under the terms of the act of 1883, draw the portion of the tract on which the power plant is erected to it for the purpose of taxation. We are of the opinion, however, that the power plant is not erected on the 400-acre farm. That farm only extends to low-water mark on the Susquehanna river, and we believe the power house is below low-water mark. The location of the mansion house on the 400-acre tract could not change the place where the power house is to be taxed. The act of 1883 only applies where the tract is divided by county lines, and does not apply to a separate tract, such as we have in this case.

"The second contention of the appellant is that the power house is located in York county. The boundary line between York and Lancaster counties is fixed by the act of August 19, 1749 (1 Smith's Laws, p. 198), as follows: 'All and singular the lands lying within the province of Pennsylvania aforesaid to the westward of the River Susquehanna * * * bounded eastward by the said River Susquehanna.' It has been agreed by the parties that low-water mark on the western side of the river marks the boundary line between York and Lancaster counties. This is most favorable to York county, and puts the boundary line as far east as it can possibly be, according to the act of assembly fixing the boundary. The Supreme Court has held that the boundary line on navigable rivers, and the Susquehanna river is made such by act of assembly, is at low-water mark. Stover v. Jack, 60 Pa. 339, 100 Am. Dec. 566; Poor v. McClure, 77 Pa. 214; Freeland v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 197 Pa. 529, 47 Atl. 745, 58 L. R. A. 208, 80 Am. St. Rep. 850. Low-water mark is defined in 2 Farnham on Waters, 1462, to be ordinary low-water mark, unaffected by drought; that is, the height of the water at ordinary stages of low water. In Stover v. Jack, 60 Pa. 339, 100 Am. Dec. 566, Justice Agnew says: 'The defendant alleged it to be an island surrounded by water, except at very low stages. The court held that low water, as contradistinguished from high water, does not mean the lowest water the stream may exhibit under special and extraordinary circumstances, and the locus in quo is an island if the water of the river flows around it, at its ordinary stage, unaffected by floods and drought. This is assigned for error, and it brings up for our decision what is meant by low-water mark as a terminus or boundary. * * * It is also a well-known fact that in the seasons of extreme low water many of the islands of the principal rivers are not entirely surrounded with water, but may be reached from the shore dry shod. All the circumstances show that to adopt any other rule than ordinary low-water mark, unaffected by drought, as the limit of title, would carry the rights of riparian owners far beyond boundaries consistent with the interests and policy of the state, and would confer title where heretofore none has been supposed to exist. No one has ever thought that an island, cut off from the mainland by the stream in ordinary stages of low water, could be added to the land of an adjacent proprietor merely because in the very dry season of the year the stream had almost disappeared, and no water flowed over the intervening dry and sandy or pebbly bed. The doctrine that low-water mark is the extreme verge to which a long drought may reduce the stream would lead to such results. Ordinary high water, and ordinary low water, each has its reasonably well-defined marks so nearly certain that there is not much difficulty in ascertaining it. The ordinary rise and fall of the stream usually finds nearly the same limits. But to bound title by a mark which is set by an extraordinary flood or an extreme drought would do injustice and contravene the common understanding of the people. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff's title was bounded by ordinary low-water mark.' To the same effect see Wood v. Appal, 63 Pa. 210; Poor v. McClure, 77 Pa. 214; Hartley v. Crawford, 81 Pa. 478.

"The testimony submitted to us on this appeal, considered in the light of the rule as thus laid down, convinces us that low-water mark in the Susquehanna river, at the point where the power house of appellant company is located, is to the west of said power house. On the part of Lancaster county, six witnesses have been called to prove the location of low-water mark at the point where the said power house is erected. Five of them testify that a rock called 'Ring Rock' is the low-water mark. The testimony of one of these witnesses is weakened in his cross-examination, but the remaining four testify quite positively on this point. They were all men who are, and have been, familiar with the river for from 30 to 50 years, and have crossed it frequently at this point. Two, in fact, have been ferrymen, and all know the location of Ring Rock, and of the power house in question. They testify that Ring Rock is the place to which boats were tied, even in times of very low water, and are corroborated by one of the witnesses for appellant, who says that even in 1883, when the water reached one of the lowest stages ever known, boats could be tied to this rock, if the chain were 15 or 20 feet long. These witnesses also testify that Ring Rock is from 65 to 100 feet west of the power house, and that there is wet and swampy ground to the west of the rock. One witness says that in 1888, when the water was more than ordinarily low, the foreman of the stone quarry at this point cut a low-water mark in a rock which marks low water about as far west as Ring Rock is located. The witnesses also testified that the company owning the paper mill, which was erected here in 1884, filled up the river at or near this point, and caused the line of low water to recede further out into the river.

They also testify that, in order to dig foundations for the power house, it was necessary to use cofferdams to keep the water of the river out. All these witnesses testify quite positively that all of the power plant is below low-water mark and in Lancaster county. In contradiction of this testimony the appellants have called nine witnesses, some of whom only testify as to the condition of the river at this point during the last few years, or after the paper company had filled up the river as described by the witnesses on behalf of Lancaster county. Three of these nine witnesses have lived in the vicinity for many years, namely, John Ohrendorf, Daniel Repman, and Sherman Walker. They testify that at very low water, namely, in 1883 and in 1888, the water had receded to a point from 12 to 15 feet east of the power plant; but they cannot say where low-water mark was in ordinary low water. One other witness testifies that the paper mill company did fill up the creek which flows into the river near this point, but did not fill up the river at the time the mill was erected. Another witness, William J. Childs, an hydraulic engineer, says, by his measurements at the time the power plant was built a year or two ago, low-water mark was east of the power plant. All the witnesses who testify on the subject admit that part of the power plant is east of low-water mark. Some of them testify that it was largely built on dry ground. None of the witnesses, however, fix any mark or monument on the land as the way in which they fix low-water mark, though several do so by an imaginary line from the head of Wissler's Island.

"As marks or monuments on the ground prevail over courses and distances mentioned in a survey, so the testimony of witnesses who fix low-water mark by a monument or mark in the ground, such as Ring Rock, to which even in times of low water they tied their boats, must prevail over that of witnesses who do not fix it by some such mark or monument. We are led to accept the testimony of the witnesses who fix Ring Rock as low-water mark, in preference to the testimony of those witnesses who fix it at 12 or 15 feet east of the power house, for the additional reason that these latter witnesses fix that point because it was the lowest low-water mark in their observation, and admit that they cannot fix it at ordinary low-water mark. And the higher courts have said that ordinary low-water mark fixes the boundary. Nor do we think that the testimony of those witnesses who testify to present conditions, and that the power house was built on dry ground, which is a present condition, can affect the location of low-water mark. We find from the testimony that the paper mill company did fill in the river at this point, and caused the water line to recede eastward, though we do not think that the testimony shows that it caused it to recede east of Ring Rock in times of ordinary low water. Any natural changes on the edge of a river may change the line of low water, but such is not the case if the changes are made by artificial causes. If such changes could be made by artificial causes, islands, separated from the mainland by a narrow stream, might be changed from one county into another by filling up the channel which separates them from the mainland. Poor v. McClure, 77 Pa. 214, and Ball v. Slack, 2 Whart. 508, 80 Am. Dec. 278.

"If, however, the act of the York Haven Paper Company in filling up the river could change the line of low water, then the act of appellant in raising the water of the river to a point some 400 feet west of the power house would fix the line at that point. The rule would have to work both ways. The dam of appellant begins at or near the middle of the river, and extends diagonally towards the York county side, near which it narrows, and by the retaining wall is run down to the power house, at which point it is 400 feet wide. The water is thus raised about 24 feet above the surface of the river at this point. Judge Pearson, in the case of O'Connor v. Bigler, 2 Pears. 219, says that the surface of the water as raised by the dam became low-water mark. This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court in Bigler v. O'Connor, 2 Wkly. Notes Cas. 180, though the point as to what was low-water mark was not raised on the appeal. We do not think, however, that this case should prevail against the cases we have cited above, which show that artificial causes cannot change the line of low-water mark. We are therefore of the opinion that neither the act of the paper mill company in causing low-water mark to recede eastward, nor the act of the appellant in causing it to extend westward, can change the line of ordinary low water; and we find as a fact that it is located at Ring Rock, a distance of from 65 feet to 100 feet west of the power house, and that consequently the power house is in Lancaster county.

"We must therefore dismiss the appeal, at the cost of appellant."

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

W. U. Hensel, for appellant. Bernard J. Myers, W. R. Brinton, and N. F. Hall, for appellee.

FELL, J. The question raised by this appeal is whether the appellant's power plant should be assessed for taxation in York county or in Lancaster county. The facts that give rise to it are these: The appellant purchased a tract of 400 acres of farm land in York county, on which there were a farmhouse, barns, and other farm buildings. The eastern boundary of the tract was the Susquehanna river, where it had a frontage of three-fourths of a mile. It constructed crib dams, which extend into the river, and a race, by which the water is conducted to a power house 278 feet long and 49 feet wide. It is agreed that the boundary line between York and Lancaster counties is low-water mark on the western bank of the Susquehanna river. The disputed question of fact is whether the power plant is east or west of this line. All of the witnesses agreed that a part of the plant is east of low-water mark. The court found that the whole of it is east. The conflict in the testimony arose mainly from the different views of the witnesses as to what should be considered low-water mark, whether the lowest line the water has ever been known to reach, or, as expressed by some of them, "the lowest kind of low-water mark," or the line of ordinary low water, not the effect of an extreme drought. The learned judge, following the decision in Stover v. Jack, 60 Pa. 339, 100 Am. Dec. 566, held that the low-water mark was the line to which the water receded at ordinary states of low water, and ascertained the location of this from the testimony of witnesses who had observed the river for a long period of time, and who fixed the line of low-water mark by monuments on the ground. The case was considered and decided on right principles, both in determining what was low-water mark and the weight of the evidence. We should not set aside the finding of fact by the court, unless convinced of clear error. From a careful review of the testimony we find nothing to lead us to doubt its correctness.

It is, however, contended that, if the power plant is located east of the line of York county, it should be assessed in that county as a part of the tract on which the mansion house and other buildings are located. This contention is based on the act of June 1, 1883 (P. L. 51), which provides that, where county lines divide a tract of seated land, the assessment shall be made in the county in which the mansion house is situated. The act does not apply to this case. The appellant was incorporated for the purpose of supplying water and power and of generating electricity by means of water power. By the purchase of the farm it secured valuable water rights, and has utilized them by the construction of a dam in the river and a race and power house on its margin. The improvements are valued at $500,000, and occupy only a few acres at one side of the tract. These acres are practically severed by their use from the rest of the tract, and are applied to a new and entirely distinct use, wholly unconnected with the use to which the remainder is put. They are not a part of nor appurtenant to the farm. The fifty-ninth section of the act of July 11, 1842 (P. L. 331), which contains a similar provision as to lands divided by borough or township lines, was held not to apply to a house in a borough not used in connection with nor as a part of a farm. Commonwealth v. Wheelock, 13 Pa. Super. Ct. 282.

The order of the court is affirmed, at the cost of the appellant.

MOORE v. CITY OF LANCASTER.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—NEGLIGENCE OF CITY SURVEYOR—LIABILITIES OF CITY.

Where a city surveyor gave a wrong grade to a property owner, and he built in accordance therewith and thereafter sold the property, if any right of action against the city existed in the original owner, it did not run with the land, so as to authorize suit by his grantee.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Lancaster County.

Action by Harry H. Moore against the city of Lancaster. From an order refusing to take off a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See 58 Atl. 890.

Argued before MITCHELL, O. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

W. U. Hensel and W. R. Harnish, for appellant. Edwin M. Gilbert, for appellee.

FELL, J. This action was to recover damages to real estate caused by the grading of a city street. The main and decisive question is raised by the assignment of error to the refusal of the court to take off a nonsuit. The facts established at the trial, or of which offers of proof were made and rejected, were these: In 1877 a general plan fixing the lines and grades of the streets of the city of Lancaster was approved. In 1893 the owner of a building lot applied to the city regulator for the grade line. The regulator gave her a line about two feet above the established line, and she built two houses to conform to the line given her. In 1899 she sold the houses, and in 1900 her grantee conveyed them to the appellant. In the same year the city caused the pavement in front of the houses to be lowered to the grade established in 1877.

It is alleged in the statement of claim that the city unlawfully changed the grade of the street from the grade given to the former owner in 1893; and that because of this change the value of the property has been depreciated. There has been no change of the grade line since it was originally fixed in 1877. The whole difficulty has arisen from the mistake of the regulator in giving an incorrect line to the owner in 1893, and the real ground of complaint is, not that the city has cut the street down to the established grade, but that an incorrect line was given to the plaintiff's predecessor in title, by reason whereof she built the houses now owned by the plaintiff at a greater elevation than she otherwise would have built them. The person injuriously affected by the mistake of the regulator was the owner in 1893; and, if she had a right of action against the city for the negligence of its officer, the right did not run with the land, and the plaintiff is as much a stranger to it as he would be to a right of recovery against a builder who had negligently built the houses within the line of the street, or above or below the established grade.

The argument that the plaintiff may recover, because it is the physical change, and not the establishment, of a grade on the official plans that gives a right of action, and that damages are not recoverable for the establishment of a grade until the work of grading is begun, is misleading. It is based on the erroneous assumption that as to the plaintiff the city is bound by the grade line given by the regulator to his predecessor in title, and that it is estopped to assert that this line is not the correct line.

The judgment is affirmed.

SEIBEL v. FIREMEN'S INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1906.)

INSURANCE—ACTION ON POLICY—BOOKS AND ACCOUNTS.

Where a policy of insurance provided for the production of its books and accounts after loss at such a reasonable place as the company might request, and it had its principal office out of the state, and after loss notified the insured to produce his books and accounts at a reasonable place to be designated, but failed to designate any place, failure to produce such books and accounts was no defense to an action on the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Insurance, § 1348.]

Mitchell, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court.

Action by Martin Seibel against the Firemen's Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant was reversed by the superior court (24 Pa. Super. Ct. 154), and it appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and DEAN, FELL, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

W. U. Hensel, for appellant. H. M. North and J. W. Johnson, for appellee.

MESTREZAT, J. The superior court, in a clear and convincing opinion by Judge Henderson, has demonstrated the correctness of its conclusions on the material questions involved in this case. The policy provides that the insured, "as often as required, shall produce for examination all books of account, bills, invoices, and other vouchers, or certified copies thereof, if originals be lost, at such reasonable place as may be designated by this company or its representative, and shall permit extracts and copies thereof to be made." In its letter to the insured, the defendant company says: "We demand, in accordance with said policy (see lines 83 to 85 both inclusive), that you shall produce for our examination all books of account, bills, invoices, and other vouchers or certified copies thereof, if originals be lost, at such reasonable place as may be designated by this company or its representative, and shall permit extracts and copies thereof to be made." The learned superior court held, under the above stipulation of the policy, that, "If the defendant desired to examine the books of account, etc., of the plaintiff, it became its duty, not only to notify him of the fact, but to appoint a place at which they might be produced for inspection, which place was not to be arbitrarily fixed by the company, but must be a 'reasonable' one, as provided for in the contract." This is so obviously correct that it needs no argument to support it. By the terms of the policy, the contract of the parties, the books, etc., were to be produced when required by the company and "at such reasonable place as may be designated by this company or its representative." Before the insured was required to act at all in the matter, it was incumbent on the company, not only to request the information, but also to designate the place where it should be produced. The initiative in both respects was with the company, and until it acted the insured could be charged with no default. He was not required to inform the company of the loss of his books, accompanied by an offer to procure copies, until the company had made it necessary for him to produce them by a demand for their production at a designated place. Until the company had complied with this prerequisite to its right to have the books, he could assume that it did not desire them.

The learned counsel for the defendant company concedes, what is a fact, that it did not designate a place at which the insured was requested to produce the books, as it was required to do by its contracts, but seeks his printed brief to defend its action in neglecting to do so by saying: "In the absence of any particular place being designated, the home office of the company, or the address of its adjuster, as shown by its correspondence, or even Lebanon, were sufficient indications of where the documents required should be sent. At least they could have been furnished to the appraisers." This suggestion ignores the fact that the rights as well as the duties of the parties in the premises are fixed by their written contract, and that the contract neither requires the insured to produce the documents at any of the numerous places named, unless designated by the company, which was not done, nor does the contract compel the defendant company to receive them, if they had been produced, unless the place had previously been designated by the company. It is therefore apparent that the insured could not produce the books in compliance with the terms of the policy until the company had designated the place at which it would inspect them.

This case is clearly distinguishable from Seibel v. Lebanon Mutual Insurance Company, 197 Pa. 106, 46 Atl. 851. The provisions in the two policies relative to the production of books, etc., are similar. In that case the company wrote the counsel of the insured a letter, quoting the provision, and made a formal demand that the information be forwarded to the office of the company at Lebanon, Pa., by mail or otherwise. The insured made no effort to comply with the request until after the suit had been brought, and, as stated in the opinion of this court, even then not in accordance with the demand. It was held that the provision of the policy requiring the production of the books "was a part of the contract between the parties," and that, as the insured had failed to produce his books after a proper demand, he could not recover on the policy. There the company made the demand and also designated a reasonable place, Lebanon, Pa., for the production of the books. Here the company designated no place at which the books should be delivered, but made the demand that they should be produced "at such reasonable place as may be designated by this company or its representative," leaving the inference that it would name a place at which they were to be delivered for inspection. The distinction between the cases is apparent and most material.

The other question raised by the appellant was properly disposed of by the superior court.

The assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

MITCHELL, C. J., dissents on grounds indicated in Judge Morrison's opinion. 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 154.

LEITZEL et al. v. HARRISBURG TRACTION CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

STREET RAILROADS—NEGLIGENCE—INJURY TO CHILD ON TRACK.

Street railroad company held not liable for injuries to a child stepping suddenly in front of a car.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, §§ 202, 217.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Dauphin County.

Action by Raymond H. Leitzel, by his next friend, William H. Leitzel, and another, against the Harrisburg Traction Company. From an order refusing to take off a nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the lower court on the motion to take off nonsuit:

"The plaintiff Raymond H. Leitzel, a boy 9 years of age, and a companion about 12 years of age, were following after a loaded wagon drawn by a team of four horses on Derry street, just outside the limits of the city of Harrisburg. The wagon and the boys were going in the direction of the city, and the defendant's car was moving upgrade in the same direction. The driveway was rough, having been shortly before filled up with crushed stones, was about 17 feet wide, and ran along and parallel with defendant's tracks. The wagon was visible to the motorman on the car for a distance of 1,200 or 1,300 feet from the point where the accident occurred. The plaintiff's companion climbed upon the wagon, but was put off by the driver. The plaintiff did not succeed in getting on, and walked after the wagon for some distance, about 2 or 3 feet from it, pretty close to it. The plaintiff testified in chief that about the time the injury was received he was walking between the wagon and the tracks; there being a space between them about 2 feet wide. On cross-examination, however, he testified that he was walking right behind the wagon until he stepped out and the car struck him. The other boy testified that he had already gotten off the wagon and that the plaintiff was walking behind him, and went to go across the tracks and stepped in front of the car. The corner of the fender struck him, and he fell on the side of the track from which he came. It was also in evidence that the motorman sounded his gong for at least 100 feet before the accident, and that the car was stopped within a few feet of the place where the boy was struck; the front wheel of the car only going over his leg, and the car being stopped before the second wheel of the truck came in contact with him. Upon this state of facts we considered it our duty at the trial to withdraw the case from the jury, because, in our judgment, it disclosed no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. It will be observed that it was not then, nor is it now, contended by the plaintiffs that the defendant was negligent because of the rate of speed at which the car was moving, or because of a failure to sound the gong or to have the car under control, or because of any other act of omission or commission, but solely because the motorman did not anticipate the sudden movement of the plaintiff upon the track in front of the car and avoid the collision with him.

"The plaintiff contends that the case should have been submitted to the jury, and in support of his contention refers us to the cases of Jones v. United Traction Company, 201 Pa. 344, 50 Atl. 826, and Kroesen v. Railway Company, 198 Pa. 26, 47 Atl. 850, as ruling this case. An examination of those cases will show a marked and essential difference between them and the case at bar. The former case was that of a very young child, two years old, wandering about and upon the tracks of the defendant; and because she was wandering, and therefore likely to turn one way or the other, all of which was apparent to the motorman in time to avoid collision with her, his failure to anticipate that she would wander in front of his car and thus avoid the collision was held evidence of negligence sufficient to go to the jury. In the latter case a child four years of age was crossing the track. She had already crossed and was about to recross. She was in a state of alarm and confusion, standing in the middle of the track, having walked there, a distance of 12 feet, while the car, when she started to recross, was 120 feet away. Had the motorman looked ahead, he would have seen the child standing in the middle of the track, confused and alarmed, and because of her state of alarm unable to avoid the car. The case was held to be for the jury. In the one case there was presented to the motorman a child wandering upon the track and likely to move in front of the car; in the other case, a child standing in the middle of the track, unable, by reason of her alarm and confusion, to move out of danger. The negligence in both those cases consisted either in not seeing the situation of the child, or, if seeing it, in entirely ignoring it. The situations presented in them were quite different from that which presented itself to the motorman in the present case. Here the boy was following the wagon on the roadway, with nothing to indicate that he would suddenly turn upon the track, and in this respect especially is the case distinguishable from that of Jones v. United Traction Company, 201 Pa. 344, 50 Atl. 826, in which there was everything to suggest the likelihood of the child getting in front of the car. The plaintiff was following after the wagon close to the track. The car was proceeding within the control of the motorman and at a very slow rate of speed, at the same time signaling its approach. The motorman could see the wagon and the boys following it, and for that reason evidently he was moving towards them and the team slowly and sounding his gong.

"What was there in the situation before him to suggest to him or require him to anticipate that the plaintiff, who was intent upon following the wagon, so far as the motorman could see, just as the car reached him, would step suddenly to the side upon the track in front of it? There is nothing in the evidence that we can discover. In what, then, did the motorman fail? Was it his duty to refrain from passing the boys and the wagon? Was it his duty to follow behind them until the wagon or the boys left the street? Was it his duty to stop the car and chase the boys away from behind the wagon before he proceeded past it? If such was not his duty, of what act of negligence was he guilty? What act of omission or commission has he been guilty of which would make him blamable for the unfortunate injury to the boy? He sounded his gong. He approached the boys and the wagon with the car under his control, and at a very slow rate of speed, and just as he reached them the plaintiff stepped in front of the car and was injured. It is not the case of running upon him while in the space between the tracks and the wagon, so that he was caught there and because of the narrow way was struck by the fender, for the evidence shows that he stepped upon the tracks. His collision with the car was due to his sudden movement towards and upon the track. It is the duty of the plaintiff to show that his injury was due to some act of negligence on the part of the defendant. This, as we view the evidence, he has not done. We think the case comes within the class of cases where a child suddenly and unexpectedly runs or steps in front of a moving car, and gives rise to an imminent danger against which there is no opportunity to guard, as exemplified in the following cases: Chilton v. Central Traction Co., 152 Pa. 425, 25 Atl. 606; Funk v. Electric Traction Co., 175 Pa. 559, 34 Atl. 861; Kline v. Electric Traction Co., 181 Pa. 276, 37 Atl. 522; Pletcher v. Scranton Traction Co., 185 Pa. 147, 39 Atl. 837; Gould v. Union Traction Co., 190 Pa. 198, 42 Atl. 477; Miller v. Union Traction Co., 198 Pa. 639, 48 Atl. 864.

"Upon a careful review of the evidence submitted by the plaintiff, we are of the opinion that it was not sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the defendant was negligent, and that therefore the case was properly withdrawn from their consideration. The motion to take off the nonsuit is overruled."

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed, on the opinion of the court below.

MOTTER v. KENNETT TP. ELECTRIC CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

CORPORATIONS—CONSOLIDATION—VALIDITY.

Act May 29, 1901 (P. L. 349), making it lawful for corporations organized under the act of 1874 (P. L. 73), or any of its supplements, to buy the stock of any other corporation and merge its corporate rights with those of any other corporation, authorizes a gaslight company, a gas heating company, and an electric company, territorially the same, to consolidate in the manner provided by the act.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Dauphin County.

Bill by S. L. Motter against the Kennett Township Electric Company and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The bill stated that the defendants are three corporations created under the act of April 29, 1874 (P. L. 73), and the supplements thereto, and that by virtue of letters patent granted to them the Kennett Gaslight Company is authorized to manufacture and supply to the public gas for light only in a certain locality, that the Kennett Gas Fuel & Heating Company is authorized to manufacture and supply to the public in the same locality gas for all purposes for which gas can be used other than for light, that the Kennett Township Electric Company is authorized to supply light, heat, and power by means of electricity to the public in the same territory as the other two companies, and that the appellees, proceeding in due form of law, entered into an agreement for the merger and consolidation of the three corporations into a new single corporation, to be called the Kennett Township Gas & Electric Company, whereupon the plaintiff filed his bill, praying that the three corporations, appellees, and their respective presidents, secretaries, and directors, be restrained from filing, or presenting for filing or for record, the said agreement or a copy thereof in the office of the Secretary of the commonwealth, or from accepting letters patent from the commonwealth purporting to erect and create a new corporation having the rights, privileges, and franchises now belonging to the said three companies, or from doing any other acts or things having for their purpose the consummation of the terms and the accomplishment of the objects of said agreement or merger and consolidation. The demurrer of the defendants to the whole bill admitted the truth of all the facts therein contained, but alleged that they are not sufficient to support the plaintiff's action, averring that the defendants are authorized and empowered by law to merge and consolidate, and form a single corporation by the name of Kennett Township Gas & Electric Company, possessing all the property, rights, privileges, and franchises theretofore belonging to each of the said three corporations, appellees.

Weiss, P. J., after stating the case, filed the following opinion in the court below:

"Among the matters set forth in the bill is the fact that by the terms of the agreement entered into by and between the three defendant corporations it is provided, among other things, that 'the stockholders of the Kennett Township Electric Company shall receive capital stock of the new corporation to the amount of $10,000 at par, consisting of 100 shares, which stock shall be divided among the stockholders pro rata in proportion to their respective holdings of stock in the Kennett Township Electric Company.' It is also a fact that the plaintiff is the holder and owner of 40 shares of the capital stock of the Kennett Township Electric Company, and that at the meetings held by the stockholders of that company to vote upon the question of the adoption or rejection of the agreement entered into by the directors of each of the three corporations he voted in favor of the rejection and against the adoption of the agreement to merge and consolidate, though a majority in amount of the stock of the company of which he was a shareholder, together with a majority in amount of the stock of the other two companies, voted for the adoption of the said agreement. If there were any complaint that it is sought by the terms of the agreement to impose upon him stock of the new company intended to be formed for the stock he holds in the Kennett Township Electric Company, an injunction might probably, for this reason, be granted. The act of May 29, 1901 (P. L. 349), in its fifth section (page 352) makes provision for the payment of the value of the stock of a dissenting holder; but he does not ask an injunction for this reason, and, so far as we know, has not made application to the proper court for the appointment of appraisers, and it must be assumed that he is not dissatisfied with this feature of the agreement. The cause is made to rest on the sole ground that it is unlawful for the three defendant companies to merge and consolidate in and with the proposed new company. The act of 1901 is an act supplementary to the corporation act of 1874, and provides 'for the merger and consolidation of certain corporations.' The act of 1874 authorizes the formation of certain corporations. The act of 1901 authorizes a merger and consolidation. In its features relating to the method of procedure, the latter act is almost a rescript of the act of March 24, 1865 (P. L. 49), authorizing the consolidation of certain railroad companies. It makes it lawful for a corporation organized under or accepting the provisions of the act of 1874, or any of its supplements, to buy and own the capital stock of any other corporation and to merge its corporate rights with and into those of any other corporation, and authorizes the transfer of the property and franchises of either [both] of such companies intending to merge, and the investiture of such rights and privileges in the company into which such merger is sought to be made; and thereupon the rights, property, privileges, and franchises theretofore vested in each of the existing companies shall become vested in the new corporation.

"The provision of the first section of the act of 1901, which relates to the purchase and ownership of the capital stock by one from another which may intend to merge, is at variance with the subsequent sections providing for the meetings of the stockholders to vote upon the adoption or rejection of the agreement to merge, if by that is meant the acquisition and ownership of the capital stock by one or another or others before a consolidation can be completed. There would be no stockholders of the selling company to vote for or against the adoption of the agreement to merge at the special meeting required to be called for that purpose. It must be taken to signify that the stockholders of the existing companies may agree to accept capital stock of the company to be formed by the merger in payment of the stock held by them in the corporation intending to merge. The certificate required by the act of 1874 requires no more, in this behalf, than that the number of shares subscribed by each person shall be designated, together with the number and par value of the shares into which the capital stock is to be divided. The subscriber to stock pays the unpaid part of his stock when the incorporated company issues and delivers it. So he may sell his stock in an existing company intending to merge with another into the merged company, and take stock in the consolidated corporation when the merger is consummated. The capital stock of a corporation is owned by the shareholders, of course, and the corporation could not buy or sell the capital stock. What may and must be done to effectuate a merger is the execution of a joint agreement by the directors of corporations intending to consolidate, which must contain the matters prescribed by the act, and must be submitted to the stockholders of each company at separate meetings to be called for the consideration of the agreement and its adoption or rejection by ballot. A vote by a majority in amount of the entire capital stock of the companies intending to merge, and the required certification, authorize the agreement to be taken as the act of consolidation.

"In this case the gaslight company and the gas fuel and heating company and the electric company seek to merge and consolidate. The act of May 8, 1880 (P. L. 136), amends subdivision 11 of section 2, second class, of the act of 1874, and makes it read, 'the manufacturing and supply of gas, or the supply of light, heat and power by means of electricity, or the supply of light, heat or power to the public by any other means.' The Kennett Gaslight Company is authorized to manufacture and supply gas for light only, the Kennett Gas Fuel & Heating Company to manufacture and supply gas for all purposes for which gas may be used other than for light, and the Kennett Township Electric Company to supply light, heat, and power by means of electricity to the public. Territorially they are the same. There is thus a gaslight company, a gas heating company, for fuel is used to produce heat, and an electric company. The exercise of their separate functions and franchises comprises light and heat by gas, and light, heat, and power by means of electricity; and the language of the amended clause covers the manufacture and supply of gas, or the supply of light, heat, or power by means of electricity. The defendant companies and their respective shareholders have manifested their intention, in the way pointed out by law, to conjoin their several rights, privileges, and franchises, which are alike in their general features and authorized to be exercised by the same general law, in one body politic by a different name but for the same purposes in the same territorial limits; and it does not appear that so doing violates any law or constitutional inhibition. On the other hand, there is authority to enter into the proposed agreement of merger and consolidation, and for the formation of a new company thereby, having the powers, privileges, and franchises of the corporations intended to be merged. Having the right to merge and consolidate, and having proceeded in the manner directed by law, it follows that the agreement of merger and consolidation, together with the certificate of the secretaries of the companies to the result of the balloting certifying the fact, may be filed in the office of the Secretary of the commonwealth, and the matter concluded as provided by law without hindrance.

"The relief prayed for in the bill by the complainant is refused, and the bill dismissed, at his costs."

WUNDERLE v. ELLIS.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

MORTGAGES — REDEMPTION — PERSONS ENTITLED TO REDEEM.

A lease provided for interest to be paid by the tenant on an antecedent mortgage, and the mortgaged premises had been so used in connection with other property that a severance would cause great injury. The lease had several years to run. Held, that after suit on the mortgage, when no interest was due, the tenant could tender the whole amount of the mortgage and demand an assignment.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia County.

Bill by Philip Wunderle against David M. Ellis, to compel assignment of a mortgage. From a decree refusing a preliminary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The bill averred that plaintiff was tenant of premises 445-447 New Market street, Philadelphia, under a lease dated July 27, 1899, for a term not to exceed 11 years; that the owners of said premises (Trouts by name) had executed a mortgage on said premises, dated December 16, 1895, which had been assigned to defendant (Ellis) March 28, 1904, and a writ of scire facias had been issued in common pleas No. 4 of Philadelphia county, of June term, 1904, No. 635, and on the same day said premises had been conveyed to one Brown; that under the terms of said lease tenant had the right to pay, out of the rents, interest on said mortgage, taxes, etc., and had in fact paid the same, and there was due him from the property about $100 on account of overpayments by him; that said premises had been combined with other premises to form a large plant, and were used for the manufacture of candy by the plaintiff; that at the time suit was brought on the mortgage no interest was due; that the plaintiff had tendered the whole amount of debt, interest, and costs in said mortgage suit, and requested an assignment of said bond and mortgage, and this was refused; that plaintiff is willing and ready to pay all of said debt, interest, and costs, and a sale of said premises would be of irreparable damage to him. The bill prayed for an injunction and for an assignment of the mortgage.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

John G. Johnson, Wm. H. Wood, and Wm. H. Burnett, for appellant. W. B. Saul and E. O. Michener, for appellee.

MITCHELL, C. J. This is a perfectly clear case for the maintenance of the status quo until final hearing, and, unless the facts shall then be shown to be essentially different from what they now appear, it will be an equally clear case for payment and subrogation. The whole right of the defendant as holder of the mortgage is to have his money paid him, and his whole claim on the land is to hold it as security for such payment. When he is offered his money, his refusal to take it is persuasive evidence that he is not enforcing his legal rights in good faith, but is seeking to use them for some ulterior and inequitable purpose. Even if this were not so, the general doctrine of subrogation is that, where a party can attain all his legal rights in either of two different ways, a court of equity will compel him to take that which will do the least injury to another having a junior interest in the subject-matter, and, if necessary, will subrogate the latter to the prior rights. It is conceded "that a junior mortgagee, judgment creditor, or other incumbrancer, who pays off a prior incumbrance in order to protect his own interest in the incumbered estate, will as a general rule be subrogated to all the rights of the senior incumbrancer, and, if necessary for his protection, may compel an assignment of the security." 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) "Subrogation, IV, 3," p. 243. There is no good reason why the same relief should not be afforded under similar circumstances to a lessee for years, and there is authority for so holding. "A tenant for years may redeem, although his lease being made after the mortgage, and good against the mortgagor, is not good against the mortgagee." 2 Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 1066. And in Hamilton v. Dobbs, 19 N. J. Eq. 227, a case on all fours with the present, but not so strong, it was held by Chancellor Zabriske that a tenant for years who offers to pay off a mortgage debt has the right to redeem. He has not, perhaps, strictly the right to demand a written assignment of the mortgage, but stands by redemption in place of the mortgagee, and will be subrogated to his rights against the mortgagor and reversioner. He has the right to have the bond and mortgage delivered to him uncanceled, which in such case is in equity, and may be at law, a complete assignment.

The appellant presents a much stronger prima facie case than these principles require. He not only has a term with several years yet to run, but he shows a use of the land in connection with other land to which a severance would do great injury, and, further, under the terms of his lease, he had the right to apply the rent to the payment of taxes, interest on the mortgage, etc., and that he had so paid that, when suit was brought on the mortgage, there was no interest due and the property was in debt to him for money advanced. At common law a mortgagee could not be compelled to assign the mortgage on payment, but only to surrender it. In fact, in the absence of a system of record, the surrender of the instrument was the only secure evidence the mortgagor had of payment. Our act of May 28, 1715 (1 Smith's Laws, p. 94), in aid of the mortgagor, provided for compulsory entry of satisfaction by the mortgagee on the record. And so the act of June 24, 1885 (P. L. 157), provides in certain cases for the compulsory assignment of mortgages on tender of the amount due. It is argued that these acts do not cover the case of a lessee or tenant, and therefore that he is without remedy. But these are common-law remedies, and even if it be conceded, which is by no means clear, that ordinary cases must be brought within their terms, it does not follow that equitable remedy should not be afforded when a case is shown to which equitable principles apply. The common law was opposed to assignments of choses in action, which it regarded as tending to litigiousness and maintenance. 2 Black. Comm. 442. The general recognition and enforcement of assignments are the growth of modern methods of business, and the development of equity founded on and following such methods. Bispham on Equity (7th Ed., 1905) § 164. There is no solid reason why the principle of subrogation, that where a party asserting a legal right can be fully secured in it and at the same time the interests of another in the subject-matter can be protected from impending injury, should not be applied in regard to the assignment of a mortgage and in favor of a lessee, as well as to any other case to which the principle is applicable.

Decree reversed, injunction reinstated, and directed to be continued until otherwise ordered after final hearing.

He had worked for the appellee at the same kind of work for several months before the accident, during which time the same kind of "dogs" were used. On October 6th two stones slipped from them within an hour and fell at the place where he was working. He and the foreman saw them fall. When the second one fell, he said to the foreman: "Paddie, them dogs ain't no good. Why don't you get a pair of the round dogs?" To which the foreman replied: "You can't get nothing. There is not but one pair of round dogs on the job." A third stone slipped and fell the next day, October 7th. This was also seen by the appellant and the foreman. About an hour later a fourth one fell, when he again reminded the foreman, who had seen the fall, that the "dogs" were "no good" and would not "hold." On October 8th a fifth stone fell and struck him, causing the injuries of which he complains. A judgment of nonsuit was directed by the court below, but the specific ground on which it was entered was not stated by the learned trial judge. He refused to take it off, because he was of opinion that the plaintiff had voluntarily continued to subject himself to danger after he had known its imminence, intimating at the same time that the contributory negligence of a fellow servant was a bar to a recovery.

Two days in succession the appellant saw the peril which overhung him every time the stones were lifted by the derrick and suspended over him. His testimony is that, as the stones were constantly slipping from the "dogs," he was "on the lookout all the time to see if the stones would fall," and "kept close watch on them, all the time afraid a stone would slip out." At the time the fifth one fell he could not have been on the lookout, and he did not, by his own vigilance, upon which he undertook to rely, protect himself from the constantly imminent danger, to which he voluntarily continued to subject himself after he knew his employer had not guarded against it and had not promised to do so. The only actual notice of the defective "dogs" that he pretends was given to his employer was that to the foreman, from whom he learned that no change would be made. From the testimony but one conclusion could have followed, if the case had been submitted to the jury, and that is that the danger was so imminent that the appellant was bound to heed it, and to know that if he continued to voluntarily subject himself to it, as he admittedly did, his employer would not be liable for the injuries he has sustained. The oft-repeated rule as to this is that an employé who continues in an employment, which, by reason of defective machinery or appliances, he knows to be dangerous, assumes the risk of any accident that may result therefrom, with the qualification that if in pursuance of the promise of his employer to remedy the defect, and the risk be not such as to threaten immediate danger, the employé continue in the employment and be injured without fault on his part, the employer may be liable. Brownfield v. Hughes, 128 Pa. 194, 18 Atl. 340, 15 Am. St. Rep. 667. Judgment affirmed.

In re KEISLER'S ESTATE.

Appeal of MERWINE.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

WILLS—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

In proceeding to determine the validity of a will, evidence held insufficient to sustain a finding that a will had been procured by undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, §§ 421-437.]

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Luzerne County.

In the matter of the estate of Hannah B. Keisler, deceased. From a decree dismissing appeal from the register of wills, Sally A. Merwine appeals. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and BLKIN, JJ.

D. L. Rhone, H. J. Kotz, Oicero Gearhart, and R. L. Burnett, for appellant. John M. Garman, William I. Hibbs, and S. E. Shull, for appellees.

POTTER, J. A will of Hannah B. Keisler was probated September 25, 1901, by the register of wills of Luzerne county, and letters testamentary granted to Milton Kresge, the executor named therein. On June 25, 1903, an appeal from the probate was taken by Sally A. Merwine, and after issue joined and hearing before the orphans' court the appeal was dismissed. This appeal is taken by the appellant below from the decree of the orphans' court dismissing the appeal from the register. There are 19 assignments of error, the last of which specifies as error the dismissal of the appeal.

From the facts as recited in the opinion of the court below it appears that the will, which was admitted to probate in Luzerne county, was dated May 29, 1901; that testatrix afterwards was taken to Stroudsburg, Monroe county, where she remained until her death, upon September 25, 1901; and that in the meantime another will was executed by testatrix on September 14, 1901. In this second will she recites the fact that she had removed to Stroudsburg, with the intention to make her home there for the remainder of her life. She directs that she be buried in the cemetery at Stroudsburg, and that the body of her deceased husband be removed from West Pittston and interred at Stroudsburg. She gives her personal property to her three children and a granddaughter, and directs that her real estate should be sold, and that her debts, funeral expenses, purchasing of cemetery lot, tombstone, also amount to be paid to the cemetery and the expenses of settling her estate, should be paid out of the proceeds, and only the balance was given to her sister, Mrs. Merwine. The finding of the court below that she gave her real estate to the appellant is therefore inaccurate to this extent. Although the appeal is from the probate of the last will executed at West Pittston, the actual question before the court was whether the will dated September 14, 1901, and executed at Stroudsburg, was the last will and testament of the testatrix. The court found as follows: (1) That the legal residence or domicile of Hannah B. Keisler at the time of her death was at West Pittston, Luzerne county, and the register of wills of Luzerne county had jurisdiction. (2) That the testatrix possessed testamentary capacity at the time of the execution of the Stroudsburg will. (3) That the Stroudsburg will was procured by undue influence, exercised over testatrix by Sally A. Merwine, the appellant, and was therefore invalid and of no effect.

On the first question, that of domicile, the court having found as a fact that the testatrix had no fixed intention to change, and that her legal residence at the time of her death was at West Pittston, we will not disturb it. There was evidence to support this finding.

The question of testamentary capacity is not raised by the assignments of error, as the ruling of the court below upon that point was in favor of the appellant.

The main question raised by this appeal is that of undue influence. There is no evidence of any influence exerted directly by the appellant upon testatrix to make a will in her favor. The only part she took in procuring the making of the second will was to telephone to a lawyer to come to the house and see Mrs. Keisler, after the latter had expressed a desire to change her former will. She also wrote to the lawyer who had drawn the first will and had it in his custody, requesting him to send it to Mrs. Keisler. This she did at the latter's request. She was not present when the Stroudsburg attorney, Mr. Gearhart, saw the testatrix and discussed with her the making of a new will, nor when his stenographer, Miss Shiffer took her instructions as to how the will was to be drawn, nor when the will was executed. There is no evidence to show that appellant was informed before the will was made that any portion of the estate was to be left to her. There was evidence that Mrs. Merwine, who was a sister, was able to influence the testatrix in her conduct, but none of the witnesses testified that she did exercise any undue influence upon her. The appellees do not in their argument point out any such testimony. The evidence goes no further than such as this: Miss Hattie Denison, who nursed Mrs. Keisler at West Pittston, testified that Mrs. Merwine visited her (Mrs. Keisler) at that place, and came after her there and brought her away. She was brought to Stroudsburg August 1st by Mrs. Merwine, and witness remained with her until August 24th. Her mind was very much affected at that time, and she was easily influenced by some people. Later the same witness was recalled and testified: "Mrs. Merwine had the same effect on testatrix that I had when I first went there. Testatrix was a woman whom, by being kind to, you could take over to your side, and the ones that were with her were the ones that would have her to do whatever they wanted her to do. Mrs. Merwine was always very kind and very lovely to Mrs. Keisler, and never crossed her in any way. She sent her very lovely letters and beautiful flowers, and in every way was kind to her, and Mrs. Keisler, as her condition grew weaker, became more fond of Mrs. Merwine." There was nothing in this testimony to indicate anything more than a proper display of sisterly affection. Appellant also called a number of witnesses who testified that, both before and after she left West Pittston, Mrs. Keisler spoke to them of the kind treatment and good care she received from Mrs. Merwine, of how comfortable she was at her house, and how pleased she was to be with her mother and sister. She also complained that her children had neglected her. Mrs. Emma Coleman, a neighbor, of West Pittston, testified that shortly before she went to Stroudsburg testatrix complained to her of lack of care, and said: "I wish if only my sister would come up. I know that, if Sally would come up, she would care for me. I will give it to Sally, if Sally takes good care of me, for there ain't none of their father's here," says she. "He left me without anything but my three children, and if my children take care of me I will give them first chance, and if Sally will I shall give it to Sally." This was before the undue influence is alleged to have been exerted by Mrs. Merwine. The appellant herself was examined, and denied the charge of undue influence. She said that the suggestion that Mrs. Keisler should go back with her to Stroudsburg was made in the first place by Mrs. Keisler herself.

Without burdening this opinion with further reference to the testimony in detail, it is sufficient to say that it presents nothing which satisfies the legal definition of undue influence. The law on this subject has been so often considered and is so thoroughly settled that it is unnecessary to cite cases at any length. The opinion of the trial judge in Caughey v. Bridenbaugh, 208 Pa. 414, 57 Atl. 821, approved by this court, covers the entire ground. Under that case, and the decision in Masterson v. Berndt, 207 Pa. 284, 58 Atl. 968, the evidence in the present case fails to show the exercise of any undue influence by the appellant for the purpose of procuring the making of a will in her favor. It is true there was a change of mind upon the part of the testatrix, but this was not in itself any evidence of undue influence. We said in Slater v. Slater, 209 Pa. 194, 58 Atl. 267: "Had there been evidence of undue influence, the change of purpose might have had a strong corroborative bearing. But the change is not of itself evidence of undue influence. A change of mind is the right of every testator, and by itself is not evidence of anything. It is only when a basis of evidence of undue influence is laid that the inquiry as to the change becomes relevant." In the latest reported case on the subject, Allison's Estate, 210 Pa. 22, 59 Atl. 318, a decree refusing to award an issue d. v. n. was affirmed on the opinion of the court below, in which latter opinion it was said: "A jury should not be permitted to guess that there was testamentary incapacity at the time the will was executed, or that the will was the result of undue influence, because they might think that a former will had made a better disposition of the testator's property than the will contested and that influence had been brought to bear on him to make the change. Testamentary incapacity or undue influence must be proved before a will can be legally set aside." And in the case of Robinson v. Robinson, 203 Pa. 401, 53 Atl. 253, which was cited and apparently relied on by the court below, the following language is quoted (page 435 of 203 Pa., page 265 of 53 Atl.) from the charge of the trial judge, and approved in the opinion of Justice Dean as a correct statement of the law: "A son may importune his mother to make a will in his favor. * * * He has a perfect right to do it, and if the only effect was to move her affections, or sense of duty, or judgment, he has a perfect right to do it. But if these importunities were such as the testator had not the power to resist, and yielded for the sake of peace and quiet or escaping from serious distress of mind, if they were carried to a degree by which the free play of testator's judgment or discretion or wishes were overcome, it is undue influence. He can coax her, but he must not drive her, either by moral coercion or physical force."

The nineteenth assignment of error is sustained, as is the eighteenth, seventeenth, and sixteenth. So, also, is the first, second, and fourth.

The decree of the court below is reversed, at the cost of the appellees, and it is ordered that the record be remitted to the court below for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

HOWLEY v. CENTRAL VALLEY R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

1. RAILROADS—MOTIVE POWER—ELECTRICITY.

Where a railroad was incorporated under Act April 4, 1863 (P. L. 62), providing that every company incorporated under it shall be entitled to exercise all the rights and privileges given by Act April 19, 1849 (P. L. 79), it was not restricted to the use of steam as a motive power, but can use electricity; nothing being stated in the act about the kind of power to be used.

2. SAME.

A railroad company, where it is not limited as to the power to be used, is required to use that which is best and most convenient for its operation, having due regard to the safety of the public.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Luzerne County.

Bill by Martin Howley against the Central Valley Railroad Company to restrain construction of a railroad to be operated by electricity. From a decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

From the record it appeared that the defendant company was incorporated under Act April 4, 1868 (P. L. 62). The prayer of the bill was as follows: "That the court issue a perpetual injunction directed to the defendant, restraining said defendant and all persons claiming to act under its authority, direction, or control from constructing or operating an electric railway over and upon the above-described land appropriated from the plaintiff, or between the cities of Wilkes-Barre and Pittston, and further restraining the defendant from laying over and upon the above-described land a 'third rail,' or any other appliance or thing peculiarly and solely adapted to the equipment or operation of an electric railway." Other facts appear by the opinion of the Supreme Court.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

Charles L. McKeenan, M. N. Donnelly, and John McGahren, for appellant. H. B. Gill, C. F. Bohan, and James H. Torrey, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The appellee is a railroad company incorporated under Act April 4, 1868 (P. L. 62). In addition to locomotive engines, it uses electricity as a motive power, which is carried to motors on the cars through a third rail. After locating the route of its road over the land of plaintiff, it was unable to agree with him as to the amount of damages which he sustained, and, to secure the payment of the same, a bond was filed and approved by the court of common pleas. After its approval he undertook by force to prevent the construction of the railroad upon his property, but on a bill filed by the company was perpetually enjoined from so interfering with it. When he subsequently discovered that it intended to operate its road by electricity as one of its motive powers, he filed this bill, under the provisions of Act June 19, 1871 (P. L. 1360), alleging that it did not possess the right or franchise to so operate its road, and, if permitted to do so, he would be injured in his property rights. The court below was of opinion that he could raise this question under the act of 1871, but was precluded from doing so by the injunction perpetually enjoining him from interfering with the construction of the road. By that decree he was enjoined from interfering with the construction of the road, for the reason that the company had a right to construct it; but if, in the operation of it after its construction, the appellee undertook to exercise a franchise which it did not possess, to the injury of the plaintiff, he was within the protection of the act of 1871. More need not now be said on this point. Sooner or later we must pass upon the right of a railroad company incorporated under the general railroad act to use electricity as a motive power, and for the purpose of doing so now we regard the question as properly before us.

Act February 19, 1849 (P. L. 79), was not passed for the incorporation of railroad companies, but for the regulation of those that might thereafter come into existence by special acts of assembly creating them. Up to that time no general law had been passed providing for their incorporation. Such an act, providing for their formation and regulation, was passed April 4, 1868 (P. L. 62), and under it the appellee was incorporated. This act provides that each company incorporated under it "shall be entitled to exercise all the rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all the restrictions and liabilities of the act regulating railroad companies, approved the nineteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and the several supplements thereto, as fully and as effectually as if said powers were specially incorporated in said charter." The charter of the appellee authorizes it to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad for public use in the conveyance of persons and property. The road cannot be operated nor its franchises exercised without motive power; but nothing is stated by the Legislature about the kind to be used. The act is silent upon the subject, and, in the absence of a direction in the statute creating the appellee that any particular power is to be used, the kind to be adopted must be left to the judgment of those operating the road. In occupying the land of the appellant for railroad purposes, the appellee took exclusive possession of it, and in operating its road upon it the appellant, who is excluded from it, has had no additional servitude imposed upon his fee because the cars happen to be moved by electricity, instead of by steam. In this respect the case differs from the construction of a street railway upon a public street with municipal consent; for the use of the street is not exclusively in the street railway company, but concurrently used by the public. In Potter v. Scranton Traction Co., 176 Pa. 271, 35 Atl. 188, we said: "How far the franchise for a passenger railway, without specific limitations or prohibitions as to motive power, carries with it the right from time to time to operate it by new methods, developed in the progress of invention and experience, is an important question, which was referred to, but not decided, in Reeves v. Phila. Traction Co., 152 Pa. 153, 25 Atl. 516, and in this case it is complicated by the fact that the change was not made until after the adoption of the present Constitution. It is clear that the traction company, chartered since the Constitution, could not of its own authority make any change of motive power which would increase the servitude on the street, without the municipal consent." The foregoing, however, has no application to a case where the land occupied is in the exclusive possession and use of a railroad company. The Legislature, in granting the power to the appellee to take appellant's land for railroad purposes, might have annexed to such a power a condition that but one kind of motive power should be used in moving cars, to the exclusion of all others; but there is no such limitation on the power to take the land or to operate the railroad constructed upon it.

Turning to the act of 1849, to the provisions of which the appellee is subject, there is no limitation found upon the kind of motive power that is to be used by railroad companies. By the second section (page 80) of the act they are authorized "to purchase, receive, have, hold, use and enjoy goods, chattels and estate, real and personal, of what kind and nature soever, as may be necessary or convenient to the procuring, owning, making, maintaining, regulating and using their railroad, the locomotives, machinery, cars, and other appendages thereof, and the conveyance of passengers, the transportation of goods, merchandise and other commodities." By section 18 (page 86) it is provided "that upon the completion of any railroad authorized as aforesaid, the same shall be esteemed a public highway for the conveyance of passengers, and the transportation of freight, subject to such rules and regulations, in relation to the same, and to the size and construction of wheels, cars and carriages, the weight of loads, and all other matters and things connected with the use of said railroad, as the president and directors may prescribe and direct: Provided, that the said company shall have the exclusive control of the motive power." Though the owners of cars had the right to have them conveyed on railroads, the motive power conveying them was to be under the exclusive control of the company. What motive power? The motive power which the company had adopted. At that time, as is a matter of common knowledge, several kinds of motive power had been adopted and were in use. Some of the roads were operated by horses, others by inclined planes by means of cables operated by stationary engines and others by the ordinary locomotive.

But it is contended that the powers conferred by the statutes on the corporations which they create must be construed in the light of conditions existing at the time they were passed, and in the present case, as electricity was not known as a motive power in 1849, and even in 1868, the appellee has no right to use it, and must be confined to the then known motive powers for railroads. If this doctrine were to prevail, the rails of railroads would still be confined to the strap rail, nailed upon wooden stringers, with snake heads not infrequently forced up through the floors of the cars, instead of the present heavy steel rails insuring the absolute safety of the running of cars; pigmy locomotives, burning only wood, would still haul a few light cars at a slow pace on uncertain schedules, instead of the present massive engines, which, with safety and at speed not dreamed of fifty years ago, carry long trains of cars filled with passengers and freight; and the old hand brake would not be supplanted by the air brake. These and many other appliances and devices, utterly unthought of in the days of the legislation under which our present railroads came into being could not be used. In the absence of a limitation upon the power of a railroad company to use any appliances, or of a prohibition as to the use of any particular one, it is the duty of the company to use what, in the light of its observation and experience, is best and most convenient for it in the operation of its road, having at all times due regard to the safety of the public which it was created to serve. In such a case its duty fixes the measure of its powers in performing it. What it manifestly ought to do in exercising its franchises it may do, unless forbidden by its supreme law—the will of its creator as expressed in the words giving it life.

In Millvale Borough v. Evergreen Railway Co., 131 Pa. 1, 18 Atl. 993, 7 L. R. A. 369, the road of the railway company was originally built and operated as a narrow gauge steam railroad, and it was contended that it could not widen the same to a broad gauge. Of this contention it was said: "It might as well be argued against the proposed change of gauge that because a particular kind of rail was in vogue and was actually adopted and used by a railroad company at and after the time of the construction of its road, it could never adopt another, but was concluded by its first choice, upon the theory of an exhaustion of its power. It will be seen at once that such an argument is entirely fallacious and untenable. Instead of such being the law, we have always held that railroad companies not only have the right, but are by law bound, to make use of the latest and best inventions and appliances tending to promote the comfort and safety of the public. This is notably the case in the matter of spark arresters, and is equally applicable to couplings and other contrivances. The writer remembers when the strap rails, laid upon longitudinal stringers and fastened down with spikes, were in common use on steam railroads, and he also remembers that snake heads at the end of the rails resulted from this method, occasioning frequent accidents and loss of life. When the T-rails came into use, it became the undoubted legal duty of the old companies to abandon the flat rail and use the new one, and any company failing to perform this duty would very quickly have received forcible and emphatic admonition to that effect both from juries and courts."

In Halsey v. Rapid Transit Street Railway Co., 47 N. J. Eq. 380, 20 Atl. 859, the question of the right of the railway company to use electricity as a motive power was raised, and Van Fleet, V. C., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The right of the defendant to use electricity as its motive power is clear. The defendant was organized under a general statute, authorizing seven or more persons to associate themselves together, by articles in writing, for the purpose of forming a corporation to construct, maintain, and operate a street railway for the transportation of passengers. Rev. Supp. p. 353. The motive power to be used by corporations formed under this statute is in no way limited or defined. The statute does not say that they shall use animal, mechanical, or chemical power. It says nothing at all on the subject of power. Hence, under the general grant of power to maintain and operate a street railway, it would seem to be clear that a corporation formed under this statute takes, by necessary and unavoidable implication, a right to use any force in the propulsion of its cars that may be fit and appropriate to that end, and which does not prevent that part of the public which desires to use the street according to other customary methods from having the free and safe use thereof. While the rule is elementary that public grants are to be strictly construed, still it is also well established that where a corporation is authorized by a general grant to exercise a franchise or to carry on a business, and the grant contains no words either defining or limiting the powers which the corporation may exercise, it will take by implication all such powers as are reasonably necessary to enable it to accomplish the purposes of its creation. I am therefore of opinion that if there was no other legislation on this subject than that just mentioned, and that it was made to appear that electricity could be used for the propulsion of street cars without preventing the free and safe use of the street by other means of transportation, the defendant would, by force of the statute under which it was organized, have a right to use electricity as its motive power."

Another case that may be cited is Wilmington City Railway Co. v. Wilmington Railway Co. (Del. Ch.) 46 Atl. 12, where it is held: "It would seem that, when the broad term 'city railway' is used, the term must be taken to mean only what is essential to the definition of the term, and obviously no particular motive power is essential. Whenever a statute specifies a motive power to be used, the expression of that power may be construed to exclude any other. The general rules of construction seem to me to require this. But, when an exclusive right is given in general terms to a city railway, the effort to confine it to the particular motive powers in use at the time would seem to be as artificial and unauthorized as to confine it to the kind of rails then in use, excluding the idea of modern rails of steel and of great weight, or to limit the size and shape and quality of cars to those known at the time. All these things, including the motive power, are subordinate—mere means to make the franchise effective—and yet the expression of any of them might be so made as to so limit the grant. When no kind of motive power is mentioned, it should be taken to indicate that the Legislature means what it says, 'a city railway,' however propelled, whether by powers then familiar or those they know not of; in fact, any kind of power which the ingenuity of man may contrive that does not constitute an additional burden upon the highway, or an injury and annoyance to the public."

We have, it is true, as is contended by the appellant, designated railroads organized under the act of 1868 as steam railroads. Potts v. Quaker City Elevated R. R. Co., 161 Pa. 396, 29 Atl. 108. But this designation has been adopted only as a natural one, to distinguish such railroads from street passenger railways, and in no case in which it has been used is there any intimation as to the limitation upon the power of a railroad company in the adoption of its motive power. With this question now before us, we are clear that the appellee is not prohibited from using electricity as a motive power, and if, in its judgment, the same ought to be used for the most efficient exercise of its right to operate its railroad, it may be used.

The decree of the court below is therefore affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

OJSERKIS v. OJSERKIS.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 8, 1905.)

1. DIVORCE—DESEDITION—ABSENCE OF WIFE.

A wife's mere absence from her husband, though she wrongfully separated herself from him, is not in itself proof of a willful intent on her part to abandon him sufficient to entitle him to a divorce, unless he in good faith invited her to return or made known to her his willingness to receive her.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 114.]

2. SAME—OFFER TO RESUME MARITAL RELATIONS.

Where a husband, residing in New Jersey apart from his wife, and knowing of her absence in Austria, wrote a letter to a third person alleged to contain an offer for her to return, but such letter was not delivered to her, and no provision was offered to enable her to make the journey to her husband, who flatly declared that he would have nothing to do with her, such letter did not constitute such an offer on his part to resume marital relations as would constitute her continued absence an obstinate desertion.

Bill by Sigmund Ojserkis against Emma Ojserkis for divorce. Petition dismissed.

W. I. Garrison, for petitioner. Thomas S. Henry, for defendant.

GREY, V. C. (orally, after hearing argument by petitioner's counsel). I am satisfied what the judgment in this case should be, and do not care to hear from the defense in this matter. The petition in this cause is filed by Sigmund Ojserkis, alleged to be a resident of Atlantic City, in this state, stating that he was married on the 15th day of March, 1895, in Austria, to Emma Reiter, his present wife, and came to New York to live in March, 1900; that they lived in New York until March 1, 1901, when they removed to Atlantic City, where the petitioner has resided until the present time. The petition further alleges that about the 28th day of March, 1901, the defendant's wife left Atlantic City and without just cause deserted the petitioner, and went to live in New York, where the petitioner alleges and believes she resides at the present time. The petitioner further alleges that for more than two years last past the defendant has willfully, obstinately, and continuedly deserted the petitioner and refused to live with him. There are no children born of the marriage. The petitioner prays for a divorce. Annexed to the petition is the usual affidavit that there is no collusion between the petitioner and defendant. On motion an amendment has been allowed to the petition, the effect of which is to make it allege that the parties lived in New York City to March 1, 1901; and that the defendant deserted her husband there; and that the petitioner has resided in Atlantic City for two years, from March 1, 1901, until the present time, that is, until the filing of the petition. To the petition an answer has been filed, in which the defendant admits the marriage, and recites a number of facts, to the effect that instead of the defendant having deserted the petitioner it was in truth the petitioner who deserted the defendant, alleging that he abandoned her in New York, leaving a letter stating that he had gone to South Africa and would not return, and advising her not to wait for him, but to go to her parents in Galatia, Europe. The defendant denies that she deserted her husband, denies that she refused to live with him, denies that the petition charging her with desertion is in any manner true, and claims that the charge is an unfounded imputation upon her. She denies that she was ever a resident of Atlantic City, as alleged in the petition as originally framed, and avers that the petitioner is not now, and never was, a resident of the state of New Jersey. These allegations are presented solely as an answer to the husband's petition for divorce. No cross-relief against the petitioner is in any way asked by the defendant by anything in the nature of a cross-petition.

The petition in this case was filed the 18th day of June, 1903. There is no denial of the marriage. On the contrary, both parties admit it. In addition to that it is proven by other witnesses that the petitioner and the defendant lived together for a number of years before their separation in the open and avowed relation of husband and wife. The actions of the parties themselves, and their public recognition and reputation of their connubial relations as husband and wife, are equivalent to proof of a formal marriage. It is undisputed between the parties that they came to New York from abroad some years after the marriage, and that they lived there as married people. They were living with each other as husband and wife in the city of New York in the month of March, and up or to or about the month of April, 1901. At that time a separation took place. It is undisputed that the brother of the defendant wife was in business in New York City with the petitioner, and it is also undisputed that, about the time when the separation took place (probably nearly coincident with it), the partnership or business theretofore carried on by the petitioner and his brother-in-law (brother of the defendant wife) was violently disrupted. At this point the differences between the parties began. They are so violently contradictory of each other in their parol testimony, as to every element which is necessary proof upon either side, that I find great difficulty in giving full credence to the statement of either party. I am quite unable to say that the parol proof on either side preponderates. There is testimony of persons who ought to be disinterested witnesses; but it is very difficult to say that they are disinterested witnesses, in view of the manner in which their testimony is given on the stand, and of their previous relations to the case and to the parties. All those who have given any testimony which might be of value in the determining of the case have manifested in giving it a degree of feeling which has very seriously lessened its credibility and weight.

The proof is that the husband, in the month of March, or in the early part of April, 1901, left the city of New York and came to Atlantic City, having stopped in Philadelphia and there made inquiries with relation to his intended engagement in business in Atlantic City. There seems to be no doubt about the fact that he did actually do that. He says that before he started he told his wife he was going there. She says that she never had the slightest intimation that he was going to Atlantic City, or that he was going to any place that he disclosed to her. She says that theretofore he had frequently stayed up all night, and had taken his breakfast in his room; that on this occasion she took his breakfast up, expecting to serve it in his room. When she got there, she found, or was told by the bartender of the house, that he had gone away. She found a letter on the register, which was from her husband, in which he said that he had gone to South Africa, and that she need not expect anything more from him, and she had better go home to her parents. This letter, she says, was shown to two or three people, and afterwards, not knowing where he was, and being, as she says, broken-hearted, she tore the letter up and threw it away. She showed it to one person, Mr. Schlosser, who was on the stand here. He testifies that he knew Mr. Ojserkis' handwriting, and, while he cannot say positively that the letter was signed by him, he can say that it was in his handwriting, and that it stated that he was going to South Africa, and that the letter contained the substance of what the wife says was in it. Mr. Ojserkis declares he never wrote such a letter and never signed it. The nature of the testimony regarding this letter, dealing as it does with a physical thing, a writing done by the husband on a piece of paper received by the wife at a most important crisis of their married life, is such that it is impossible that either of them could have been mistaken about it. One or the other must have committed perjury. The testimony with regard to that letter is an example of the sort of evidence with which the court is confronted in determining this case.

There is no doubt whatever that from about April, 1901, there was a following period of two years, in which the wife was separated from the husband. The wife contends that, although it is true that she lived apart from him, yet during the whole of that period she was willing and anxious to come back to him, if she had only known where he was and had the means to return. She says that he never furnished her with any money, though he knew where she was. That appears to be true, because he admits that he wrote letters which he ordered to be delivered or shown to her, and he does not appear to have sent her any money. He does not claim to have written to her directly. A period of two years of separation has elapsed, and it is that period which the petitioner alleges was one of willful, continuous, and obstinate desertion on the part of the defendant wife, on which he files his petition for divorce in this case. She denies that her separation from him was willful, because she says her return to her mother was necessitated by her husband's failure to provide a home for her, and was immediately occasioned by the letter which she says he wrote, in which he told her to go home to her mother. There seems to be no doubt that the husband did not, during those two years, furnish her any means, and it was quite natural and reasonable that, as she had no means, she should go home to her mother. Nothing in the testimony leads me to believe, therefore, that her going home to her mother was occasioned by any willful purpose to desert her husband. She had nowhere else to go. The husband himself does not say that he furnished her money or support whereby she could have continued in this country, nor does he appear during these two years to have taken steps to care for his wife. The wife's mere absence from her husband is not in itself proof of a willful intent on her part to abandon him. The petitioner has failed to prove a willful desertion by the wife, which is an element in the case essential to the making of a decree.

It is also disputed, on the part of the wife, that she had any disposition or wish to stay away from her husband. The obstinacy of her alleged desertion is therefore challenged. The decisions in this state have established several rules of interpretation regarding the conduct of the husband and wife, touching this element of obstinacy in desertion cases. One of the best established is that, even if a wife shall have wrongfully separated herself from her husband, yet, if there remains any hope or probability that the wife might by the husband's application be induced to return to him, it is his duty to invite her to return, or make known to her his willingness to receive her. If he does not indicate his willingness to receive her, the desertion on her part has not the quality of obstinacy which the law requires to exist for the justification of the husband in seeking a divorce. Bowly v. Bowly, 25 N. J. Eq. 406. The husband in this case does not contend that his wife's disposition and conduct in absenting herself was so settled and so hostile to him that it was useless to ask her to return. He admits that he thought she might be induced to come back, and claims that he made such efforts to induce his wife to return as he was reasonably called upon to exert. He swears that he sent her, while she was in Vienna, a letter inviting her to return, and that that message came back to him without any response from her. There is no corroborating proof of that fact. All the husband could know is that he sent the letter, and that he received it back again. He was not present in Vienna when it was shown to his wife. This testimony as to the sending and return of the letter stands wholly on the unsupported evidence of the husband. No other witness swears that any such invitation was exhibited to the wife during her absence in Vienna, where the petitioner appears to have known that she was. It is an essential element in the proofs. The husband alone cannot carry the burden of proof. McShane v. McShane, 45 N. J. Eq. 341, 19 Atl. 465.

On the other hand, the wife says that the incident was that while in Vienna somebody brought a letter, said to be from her husband, but did not even show it to her, did not tell her where her husband was, and that she did not know where to communicate with him. She declares she did not herself receive the letter, that it was only shown to her. In fact it is not claimed that any letter was sent to her by mail or direct conveyance. The claim is that it was shown her by a messenger. I am called upon to say whether that sort of an application by a husband to a wife was such an effort as a reasonable and just man, who wanted his wife to return, should make, in order to induce her to come to him, that they might resume their connubial relations. I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think a letter—not sent directly to the wife, not expressing to her in terms of affection and interest any hope of a renewal of their marital relations, but carried in the hand of a messenger and shown but not delivered to her, which did not state the place where the husband was, neither sent nor arranged to pay her any money (though the husband knew that to come to him she would have to cross the ocean for 3,000 miles), and did not suggest any plan whereby she might return to him—I say that is not such a proposition as a reasonable and just man ought to make to a wife, from whom he had absented himself. That he sent her any letter shows that he did not think, as between him and her, it was impossible that she could be induced to return to him. Nothing in the case indicates that he believed that, or that he had any occasion to believe it.

I have abandoned any hope of reconciling the parol testimony of these parties, because, wherever there is a statement of importance upon one side, the statement of the other appears to contradict it. The letters which were written do not need any reconciliation, they are settled in the writing, and they undoubtedly expressed the feelings of the writer at the time they were written. The petitioner lays great stress, and I think with justice, upon the letter which has been marked Exhibit P1, dated New York, April 4th, and has been proved to be in the year 1903, written by the defendant, signed by the name of Emma. She admits that she wrote it, so that the identity of the letter and the time when it was written are substantially undisputed. She says that this is the second letter which she wrote to the petitioner, and that the first letter received by him has not been produced. She says she also wrote another letter which would be the third letter. That also is not produced here. The petitioner says there were no such other letters. The letter of April 4th, which is produced here, is not one, in my judgment, which shows that the defendant wife had much affection for her husband, although she says it existed. It is possible that it might have been written under such a sense of exasperation that she expressed herself with a violence which did not represent her real feelings.

The sister of the defendant testifies that the husband flatly refused to have anything to do with the defendant. All the witnesses produced on the part of the defendant, Mr. Schlosser, the sister, and I think one other witness, who testifies as to the declarations of the petitioner touching the renewal of his relations with his wife, show that the petitioner flatly declared that he would not live with her, that he did not want to have anything to do with her. Nobody on the stand, the petitioner, or anybody else, has ever stated any fault in this wife, except one, and that was that she was a sister of her brother, whom the petitioner conceived had wronged him. This element, as a potent factor in the differences between this husband and wife, crops out at almost every phase of the case. In the letter written by the petitioner he refers to the brother of the defendant, and to the fact that he had prosecuted the brother, although he had to go 3,000 miles to do it. All the allusions to this incident go to indicate that the real essence of the differences between these parties lies in the husband's sense and resentment of the wrong which he believes has been done him by the defendant's brother. He wants to visit upon the wife the vengeance which he has been unable to vent to the full upon her brother. That vengeance he has nursed and kept warm, saying that he would have nothing to do with her as long as her brother was alive. Such expressions do not exhibit a spirit which enables the petitioner to say that, against his will and consent, and obstinately adhering to a determination to abandon him, his wife has, for two years, willfully and continuously deserted him.

The husband must, under the law of this state, during the two years of alleged desertion, have been in a frame of mind willing to take the wife back. The proof in this case in my view is conclusive that the husband was not willing to take the wife back. He resented the kindly intended interference of Mr. Schlosser, who received from the petitioner the treatment which usually comes to those who seek to make peace between husband and wife. The husband's letter to Mr. Schlosser shows that he resented even the approach to a reconciliation. Can it be said that a man who is in such a frame of mind is deserted by his wife against his will? Her absence was not against his will. It was agreeable to him. He did not want her, and he is not now in a position to say that her absence was an obstinate desertion. If counsel will look at the case of Cornish v. Cornish, 28 N. J. Eq. 208, and the case of Bowlby v. Bowlby, ubi supra, they will find that it is finally settled in this state, by the rulings of the court of appeals, that, unless the circumstances between the parties are such that it is a hopeless and useless thing on the part of the husband to invite his wife to return, it is the duty of the husband, even if the wife has wrongfully left him, to approach his wife with such steps to induce her to return as, under the circumstances of the case, are due from him.

I have not ignored the fact which probably explains the strenuosity of the petitioner's attack, namely, that the wife has obtained in a New York court a decree for support against him, which compels him to pay her permanent alimony of $8 per week. He evidently hopes, by obtaining in this case a decree for divorce a vinculo matrimonii, to relieve himself from the obligations of the New York court's order. The dismissal of the petition in this case, which I feel bound to advise, will free the petitioner from the obligation of the order made in this suit, which operates to allow the wife, during the pendency of this suit, $4 a week in addition to the alimony given by the judgment of the New York court. The defendant wife does not here ask any decree for permanent alimony, by cross-petition or otherwise.

A decree will be advised dismissing the petition, with costs.

RIDGEWAY v. CORPORATION LIQUIDATING CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. June 19, 1905.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—COLLATERAL UNDERTAKINGS—EVIDENCE.

On the issue of whether a promise to pay for lumber was original or collateral, the fact that the seller charged the lumber to other parties than the promisor is to be considered, but is not conclusive.

2. SAME.

The act of a seller in charging lumber to third persons, to whom the buyer ordered the lumber to be delivered and to whom he requested the seller to charge the same, with the amount delivered to them, respectively, was not inconsistent with a claim by the seller that the buyer's order was original and not collateral.

Error to Circuit Court, Union County.

Action by Wilbur J. Ridgeway against the Corporation Liquidating Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jeremiah A. Kiernan, for plaintiff in error. Patrick H. Gilhooly, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. When this case was first before the court, there appeared to be no judgment that could be reviewed. The record has been so corrected that the case has been considered upon the assignments of error. The judgment is attacked upon the sole claim that there was error committed by the trial judge in refusing to direct the jury that no recovery could be had upon certain items of the plaintiff's claim against defendant. The defendant's contention was that its undertaking, if any had been proved, was a collateral one to the undertaking of two persons to whom the lumber (for the price of which those items were claimed) had been delivered, and to whom they had been charged in plaintiff's books of account, and that, as its undertaking was not in writing, it was void by the statute of frauds.

Whether defendant undertook to pay for this lumber, and whether its undertaking was original or only collateral, was a question to be submitted to the jury. Hetfield v. Dow, 27 N. J. Law, 440; Gallagher v. McBride, 66 N. J. Law, 360, 49 Atl. 582. If there was evidence of an original contract, the trial judge did not err in refusing the direction asked. The fact that plaintiff had charged the lumber to other parties was to be considered in determining the question, but it is not conclusive as to whom the credit was given. There was evidence from which the jury might find that defendant ordered the lumber and directed its delivery to other persons and requested plaintiff to charge each of them, respectively, with that delivered to them. If believed, this mode of keeping the account was in no respect inconsistent with defendant's undertaking being an original and not a collateral one. There being evidence on which defendant's liability could be found, there was no error in the refusal complained of.

The judgment must be affirmed.

BLOOMFIELD v. BOARD OF CHOSEN FREEHOLDERS OF MIDDLESEX et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Sept., 1905.)

1. BRIDGES—ESTABLISHMENT—BOARD OF FREEHOLDERS—AUTHORITY.

There being no statute limiting the power of the board of chosen freeholders in the letting of contracts for bridge construction, they are limited only by the rule that their acts must be in good faith and as a result of an honest exercise of discretion.

2. SAME—CONTRACTS—PLANS SUBMITTED BY BIDDER.

Where the original plan prepared for the construction of a public bridge was not feasible, and expedition in the construction of the bridge was imperative, it was not an abuse of the discretion of the board of chosen freeholders to award the contract for the bridge on a plan submitted by a bidder, without competitive bidding.

Suit by Charles A. Bloomfield against the board of chosen freeholders of Middlesex and others. On an application to vacate the allocatur upon a writ of certiorari. Granted.

Alan H. Strong, J. Clarence Conover, and H. Brewster Willis, for the motion. Willard P. Voorhees, opposed.

FORT, J. The testimony taken in this matter establishes clearly, by all the proof, that the original plan prepared by the engineer for the construction of the Milltown bridge was not a good one. Dr. Dietz, the only witness called by the prosecutor (who was also the agent of the unsuccessful bidder on the original plan), says it was "a very impracticable plan—a very poor one indeed." Mr. Leahy, an engineer of large experience, also states that the plan upon which the contract has been awarded is much better than the one that was originally prepared. As to the plan upon which the contract here under review was made, all agree that it is the best and safest construction for the bridge required at the point in question. I must therefore take it as an established fact that the freeholders acted for the best interests of the county in determining not to build the bridge in accordance with the original plan, but to build it upon the plans upon which they have contracted to build it. That eliminates from the case every question save one, viz.: Were the proceedings under which this contract was awarded fraudulent or an abuse of the discretion vested by law in the freeholders?

It is not contended that any law requires that the freeholders must let contracts for the construction of bridges to the lowest bidder, nor that they are required to let them upon the plans and specifications upon which they have invited bids. No statute is cited which limits the power of the board of freeholders in the letting of contracts for bridge construction. They are therefore limited only by the rule that their acts must be in good faith and as the result of an honest exercise of the discretion vested in them as public officials. Ryan v. Paterson, 66 N. J. Law, 533, 49 Atl. 587. No fraud is alleged or shown in this case in awarding the contract sought to be reviewed by the writ applied for. Is palpable abuse of discretion shown? The proof satisfies me, not only that the plan upon which the contract has been let is the best, but that the price is a fair one for the work proposed. Dr. Dietz's testimony that the cost of construction is a few hundred dollars excessive I do not think of sufficient value, from an expert standpoint, to justify the allowance of a writ to review the action of the freeholders.

The action of the freeholders in awarding this contract on a plan submitted by a bidder, and without competitive bidding, is, as a general proposition, very objectionable, and in a case not shown to be one of emergency, and therefore finding some justification in public necessity, would of itself be sufficient cause for a review, and, as I think, for the setting aside of a contract made under such circumstances. The practice pursued here does not commend itself to me as wise, and can only be justified on grounds of urgent public necessity. The conditions present in this case make expedition in the construction of the Milltown bridge imperative.

For these reasons I will sign an order vacating the allocatur upon the writ in this case. No costs will be allowed to either party against the other.

ATTORNEY GENERAL ex rel. WOOD v.
ROWE, City Clerk.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Oct. 31, 1905.)

ELECTIONS—NOMINATION PAPERS—QUALIFICATIONS OF SIGNERS.

Pub. Laws 1902, c. 1078, § 8, provides that the signing of nomination papers is a disqualification for participation in the caucus of any political party, and that participation in a caucus is a disqualification to sign nomination papers. Held, that an elector is not disqualified from signing a nomination paper for a Prohibition candidate for Governor, a Socialist candidate for the Legislature, and a "Good Government" candidate for a municipal office, all of whom are to be voted for at the same election.

Mandamus by the Attorney General, on the relation of W. L. Wood, to compel John W. Rowe, as city clerk of the city of Pawtucket, to place the names of certain persons on an official ballot. Writ granted.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

John J. Fitzgerald, for relator. Edward W. Blodgett, for respondent.

BLODGETT, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to require the respondent to place the names of Hiram S. Johnson, as alderman, and James O. Aitken, Samuel B. Fuller, and the relator, upon the official ballot of the Fourth Ward of the city of Pawtucket, all as "Good Government" candidates for the offices of alderman and common councilmen, respectively, from said ward, for the election to be held on November 7, 1905, and the single question presented is as to the qualifications of three signers to the nomination papers of the relator therefor. It is agreed that the relator has 49 qualified electors upon his nomination papers, and if two electors who signed nomination papers for a Prohibition nomination for Governor, and one elector who signed the Socialist nomination paper for Governor, within the 14 calendar months next preceding, are not thereby disqualified as signers of the relator's nomination papers, that the relator then has the names of more than 50 electors required by law, and the writ should issue, and, if they are not so qualified, that the writ must be denied.

A similar question was presented in Attorney General v. Clarke, 28 R. I. 470, 59 Atl. 395, in which the statutory provisions relative to such nominations are considered, where the court held as follows (page 475 of 26 R. I., page 397 of 59 Atl.): "By the provisions of section 8, c. 1078, Pub. Laws 1902, it will be observed that the signing of such nomination papers is a disqualification for participation in the caucus of any party, and that the participation in the caucuses of such a party is a disqualification to sign the nomination papers in question, but that the signing of the nomination papers in the one case is not a disqualification for the signing of nomination papers in the other." The statute of this state defines a political party as follows, viz. (section 1, c. 1078, p. 35, Pub. Laws 1902): "In the cities of Providence, Newport, and Pawtucket, the caucuses of all political parties shall be held in accordance with the provisions of this act, and such provisions shall apply only in said cities. For the purposes of this act, a political party is hereby defined to be one which at the next preceding annual election of state officers cast for its candidate for Governor at least two per cent. of all the votes cast in the state for that officer. Caucus and convention nominations shall be made only by political parties."

It is doubtless true that for many years there have been both a Socialist political organization and a Prohibition political organization in many of the states, having a national committee, holding national conventions, adopting a national platform, and nominating candidates for national, state, and municipal offices. Yet, tested by this statute, at the present time neither of said organizations has the legal right in the cities of Providence, Pawtucket, and Newport to nominate candidates by caucus or convention, because of the failure to cast 2 per cent. of the total vote cast for Governor at the last election. But the Legislature has seen fit to limit the disqualification to sign a nomination paper in these cities in certain respects only, and has not included the signing of the nomination papers for a different office and for a candidate representing a different political principle among them. However much it may seem to contravene the general purposes of the law as originally designed, it is nevertheless true that the Legislature has not as yet disqualified an elector in said cities from signing a nomination paper for a Prohibition candidate for Governor, a Socialist candidate for the Legislature, and a "Good Government" candidate for a municipal office, all of whom are to be voted for at the same election.

In Attorney General v. Clarke, supra, "willful and deliberate forgery" and fraud were affirmatively found to have been practiced, and the writ was denied. No such elements appear in this case, and we are of the opinion that the requirements of the existing statute have been complied with, and grant the prayer for a writ of mandamus.

GUNN v. UNION R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. July 15, 1905.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY.

The provisions of the federal Constitution prohibiting a state from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law, do not require a trial by jury in suits at common law in a state court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 933.]

2. SAME—STATE CONSTITUTION.

By the charter of Rhode Island the validity of its laws was made dependent upon their not being contrary, but as near as might be agreeable, to the laws of England; regard being had to the nature and constitution of the place and the people. Pub. Laws 1636-1705., p. 26, provided for a second jury trial as of course, which remained the law of the colony and of the state until 1878, and from 1732 (Dig. 1730, p. 24) to 1844 a third trial could be had as of course on a writ of review, and from such third jury trial prior to the Revolution an appeal to the King in council might be had, on which appeal judgments and verdicts were reversed without remanding for a new trial. Const. art. 1, § 15, providing that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, was adopted in 1843. Held that, in view of the conditions prevailing in Rhode Island, Gen. Laws 1896, c. 251, § 11, authorizing the Supreme Court to direct judgment without any further trial by jury, is not unconstitutional.

Action by Thomas Gunn against the Union Railroad Company. Heard on motion of plaintiff to vacate an order directing the cause to be remanded with direction to enter judgment for defendant (58 Atl. 452). Motion denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DU-BOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARK-HURST, JJ.

Charles E. Gorman, for plaintiff. Henry W. Hayes, Frank T. Easton, Lefferts S. Hoffman, and Alonzo R. Williams, for defendant.

BLODGETT, J. After the filing of the opinion in this case, directing the cause to be remanded to the common pleas division with direction to enter judgment for the defendant (26 R. I. 112, 58 Atl. 452), the plaintiff has filed a motion of which the following is a literal transcript: "The defendant comes and moves to vacate the order of the court directing a verdict to be entered for the defendant because said court has no jurisdiction to enter such order and because said order deprives the plaintiff of his property without due process of law in violation of section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state and of the provisions of the United States wherein a state is prohibited from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the law. Charles E. Gorman, C. Woodbury Gorman, Attorneys for the Plaintiff." Assuming that the word "defendant" as first used is inadvertently used in place of the word "plaintiff" to designate the moving party, and further assuming that the word "verdict" is inadvertently used in the motion instead of the word "judgment," we proceed to a consideration of the constitutional questions raised therein, observing that the case is now before the full court only on such questions, even if the opinion of the court supra were not res adjudicata as to the statutory authority for the action of the court.

At the argument, as well as at the reargument made necessary by certain changes in the membership of the court, the sole ground urged by the plaintiff that the act in question was unconstitutional was that he was deprived of his property without due process of law, inasmuch as the order of the court directing the entry of judgment, because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, was an infringement of his constitutional right of trial by jury. The constitutional provision as to trials by jury is not the same in all the states. Thus, in the Constitution of Maryland (1867), the following provision occurs: "Art. 5. That the inhabitants of Maryland are entitled to the common law of England and the trial by jury according to the course of that law." In the Constitution of Rhode Island (article 1, § 15) it is thus expressed: "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." In strictness of construction this is an entirely separate provision from those provisions of the Constitution set forth in the record; but inasmuch as both parties have chosen to consider this provision as ancillary to the other, and inasmuch as we are advised that the same question has been raised in other cases now pending and awaiting our decision in the case at bar, we shall consider the question thus broadly presented as though it were a question of the constitutional power of the court to set aside a verdict in a civil case for insufficiency of evidence and to enter judgment thereafter, without remanding the cause for a new trial.

In its federal aspects the question thus raised is resolved adversely to the plaintiff by the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Maxwell v. Dow (1899) 176 U. S. 581-594, 20 Sup. Ct. 448, 44 L. Ed. 597, where the court says: "In Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678, it was held that a trial by jury in suits at common law in the state courts was not a privilege or immunity belonging to a person as a citizen of the United States, and protected, therefore, by the fourteenth amendment. The action was tried without a jury by virtue of an act of the Legislature of the state of Louisiana. The plaintiff in error objected to such a trial, alleging that he had a constitutional right to a trial by jury, and that the statute was void to the extent that it deprived him of that right. The objection was overruled. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'By article 7 of the amendments it is provided that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." This, as has been many times decided, relates only to trials in the courts of the United States. Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. 532, 557, 22 L. Ed. 487. The states, so far as this amendment is concerned, are left to regulate trials in their own courts in their own way. A trial by jury in suits at common law pending in the state courts is not, therefore, a privilege or immunity of national citizenship, which the states are forbidden by the fourteenth amendment to abridge. A state cannot deprive a person of his property without due process of law; but this does not necessarily imply that all trials in the state courts affecting the property of persons must be by jury. This requirement of the Constitution is met if the trial is had according to the settled course of judicial proceedings. Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 18 How. 272, 280, 15 L. Ed. 372. Due process of law is process due according to the law of the land. This process in the states is regulated by the law of the state. Our power over that law is only to determine whether it is in conflict with the supreme law of the land—that is to say, with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof—or with any treaty made under the authority of the United States.' This case shows that the fourteenth amendment, in forbidding a state to abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, does not include among them the right of trial by jury in a civil case in a state court, although the right to such a trial in the federal courts is specially secured to all persons in the cases mentioned in the seventh amendment."

This language is, of course, conclusive as to the scope of the provisions of the Constitution of United States as affecting the guaranty of jury trial in civil actions by the states. If further discussion of the meaning and effect of the words "law of the land" and "due process of law" were required than is contained in Gunn v. Union R. Co., 23 R. I. 301, 49 Atl. 1004, there may be added this language of Mr. Justice Bradley in Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. p. 31, 25 L. Ed. 980: "We might go still further, and say, with undoubted truth, that there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent any state from adopting any system of laws or judicature it sees fit for all or any part of its territory. If the state of New York, for example, should see fit to adopt the civil law and its method of procedure for New York City and the surrounding counties, and the common law and its method of procedure for the rest of the state, there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States to prevent its doing so. * * * Where part of a state is thickly settled, and another part has but few inhabitants, it may be desirable to have different systems of judicature for the two portions—trial by jury, in one, for example, and not in the other. * * * If a Mexican state should be acquired by treaty and added to an adjoining state, or part of a state, in the United States, and the two should be erected into a new state, it cannot be doubted that such new state might allow the Mexican laws and judicature to continue unchanged in the one portion, and the common law and its corresponding judicature in the other portion. Such an arrangement would not be prohibited by any fair construction of the fourteenth amendment." And in The Justices v. Murray, 76 U. S. 278, 19 L. Ed. 658, it is further said that, inasmuch as the first ten amendments to the Constitution were limitations upon the power of the federal government and not upon the states, "it follows that the seventh amendment (relating to trial by jury) could not be invoked in a state court to prohibit it from re-examining, on a writ of error, facts that had been tried by a jury in the court below."

It is, of course, obvious that the question here presented is restricted to an inquiry as to the power of the court in civil cases only. The provision of our Constitution as to criminal cases differs, indeed, from the provision of the Constitution of the United States and from the constitutional provision of a great majority of the other states in that it contains no reference to former jeopardy, and is as follows: Article I, § 7: " * * * No person shall after an acquittal be tried for the same offense." This provision in State v. Lee, 10 R. I. 495, was properly held by this court to mean "that no person who has once been fairly acquitted by a jury upon a proceeding purely criminal can again be put upon trial without his own consent." The inherent power of the court in the absence of a constitutional provision in that behalf is forcibly illustrated in the recent case of State v. Lee (1894) 65 Conn. 271, 30 Atl. 1110, 27 L. R. A. 498, 48 Am. St. Rep. 202, in which the case is thus stated by the court: "The defendant was indicted for the crime of murder in the second degree, was acquitted upon trial to the jury, and this is an appeal by the state, in the nature of a motion for a new trial, on the ground of alleged errors in the charge of the court and in the admission and exclusion of evidence," and a new trial was granted thereon, the court saying (page 272 of 65 Conn., page 1111 of 30 Atl. [27 L. R. A. 498, 48 Am. St. Rep. 202]): "The principle of finality is essential, but not more essential than the principle of justice. A final settlement is not more vital than a right settlement. The adjustment of these principles in the establishment of procedure by means of which the final judgment shall not only settle the controversy, but settle it in accordance with law, is determined in each jurisdiction by considerations of public policy and not by fundamental principles of jurisprudence." In Gunn v. Union R. R. Co., 23 R. I. 291, 49 Atl. 999, supra, this court held that article I, § 15, of the Constitution, "means simply that in those proceedings in which a right to trial by jury existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution the right shall continue; the Constitution requiring the conservation, not an extension, of the right of jury trial." And see cases cited. What, then, is the meaning of the words "trial by jury?" They are thus defined by Mr. Justice Gray in Capital Traction Co. v. Hof (1898) 174 U. S. 13, 19 Sup. Ct. 585, 43 L. Ed. 873: "'Trial by jury,' in the primary and usual sense of the term at the common law and in the American Constitutions, is not merely a trial by a jury of 12 men before an officer vested with authority to cause them to be summoned and impaneled, to administer oaths to them and to the constable in charge, and to enter judgment and issue execution on their verdict; but it is a trial by a jury of 12 men, in the presence and under the superintendence of a judge empowered to instruct them on the law and to advise them on the facts, and (except on acquittal of a criminal charge) to set aside their verdict if in his opinion it is against the law or the evidence. This proposition has been so generally admitted, and so seldom contested, that there has been little occasion for its distinct assertion. Yet there are unequivocal statements of it to be found in the books."

The power of the court to set aside a verdict in a civil case and the power of the court to direct a verdict in such a case are evidently identical in nature and in substance. In what cases, then, may these powers be exercised by the court? In Treat Mfg. Co. v. Standard Steel & Iron Co. (1895) 157 U. S. 674, 15 Sup. Ct. 718, 39 L. Ed. 853, the rule is thus established by Chief Justice Fuller: "This was an action of trespass on the case. At the conclusion of the trial defendants moved the court to charge the jury to find the issues for defendants, which motion was granted, and the jury was directed, upon the whole case, to return a verdict for defendants, plaintiff duly excepting. Thereupon the jury returned a verdict accordingly, plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and judgment was given against plaintiff on the verdict. * * *

The only ground relied on to sustain the jurisdiction of this court is that the case 'involves the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States,' because plaintiff in error was deprived of the right of trial by jury. But it is well settled that where the trial judge is satisfied upon the evidence that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and that a verdict, if rendered for plaintiff, must be set aside, the court may instruct the jury to find for the defendant. Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 355, 21 L. Ed. 170; Marion County v. Clark, 94 U. S. 278, 24 L. Ed. 59; Herbert v. Butler, 97 U.

S. 319, 24 L. Ed. 958. If the court errs as matter of law in so doing, the remedy lies in a review in the appropriate court. Writ of error dismissed."

Schofield v. Chicago & St. Paul R. R. Co., 114 U. S. 615, 5 Sup. Ct. 1125, 29 L. Ed. 224, resembles the case at bar in this respect. The plaintiff was struck from the rear while driving parallel with and attempting to cross a railroad track upon which the view was unobstructed for a considerable distance. He did not look behind him before crossing (page 617 of 114 U. S., page 1126 of 5 Sup. Ct. [29 L. Ed. 224]), and the "train was not a regular one and no train was due at the time of the accident, it was moving at a high rate of speed, it did not stop at the depot" (behind the plaintiff), "and it gave no signal by blowing a whistle or ringing a bell after it passed the depot." In the case at bar the plaintiff backed from between the horses and coal team toward the track of the approaching car, also without looking, and was struck from the rear. In the former case the court held "that the plaintiff, by his own showing, was guilty of contributory negligence, whatever negligence there may have been on the part of the defendant," and sustained the direction of a verdict for the defendant, observing (page 618 of 114 U. S., page 1127 of 5 Sup. Ct. [29 L. Ed. 224]): "It is the settled law of this court that when the evidence given at the trial, with all the inferences which the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, so that such verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant. Improvement Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442, 20 L. Ed. 867; Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall. 116, 22 L. Ed. 780; Herbert v. Butler, 97 U. S. 319, 24 L. Ed. 958; Bowditch v. Boston, 101 U. S. 16, 25 L. Ed. 990; Griggs v. Houston, 104 U. S. 553, 26 L. Ed. 840; Randall v. Balt. & Ohio Railroad Co., 109 U. S. 478, 3 Sup. Ct. 322, 27 L. Ed. 1003; Anderson County Com'rs v. Beal, 113 U. S. 227, 5 Sup. Ct. 433, 28 L. Ed. 966; Baylis v. Travellers' Insurance Co., 113 U. S. 316, 5 Sup. Ct. 494, 28 L. Ed. 989. This rule was rightly applied by the Circuit Court to the present case. Judgment affirmed."

In Coughran v. Bigelow (1896) 164 U. S. 301, 17 Sup. Ct. 117, 41 L. Ed. 442, error was alleged in ordering a nonsuit, and the court, after referring to certain cases cited by the appellants, continues (page 307 of 164 U. S., page 119 of 17 Sup. Ct. [41 L. Ed. 442]): "The foundation for those rulings was not in the constitutional right of a trial by jury, for it has long been the doctrine of this court that in every case, before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it upon whom the onus of proof is imposed, and that, if the evidence be not sufficient to warrant a recovery, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury accordingly, and, if the jury disregard such instruction, to set aside the verdict. Parks v. Ross, 11 How. 362, 18 L. Ed. 730; Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall. 359, 17 L. Ed. 642; Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall. 116, 120, 22 L. Ed. 780. And in the case of Oscanyon v. Arms Co., 103 U. S. 264, 26 L. Ed. 539, it was said by Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, that the difference between a motion to order a nonsuit of the plaintiff and a motion to direct a verdict for the defendant is 'rather a matter of form than of substance.'" And further discussing Central Transportation Co. v. Pullman's Car Co. (1890) 139 U. S. 24, 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 35 L. Ed. 55, continues: "It is the clear implication of this case that granting a nonsuit for want of sufficient evidence is not an infringement of the constitutional right of trial by jury."

In Metropolitan Co. v. Moore (1886) 121 U. S. 558, 7 Sup. Ct. 1334, 30 L. Ed. 1022, the court considered the meaning of the term "insufficient evidence," and held as follows (page 568 of 121 U. S., page 1340 of 7 Sup. Ct. [30 L. Ed. 1022]): "We see no reason, however, for supposing that the language in section 804, 'for insufficient evidence,' is to be limited to evidence insufficient in point of law. The words themselves do not import any distinction. It is admitted that according to established rules of procedure in such cases it is customary and proper for courts of justice, sitting in the trial of causes by jury, to set aside verdicts and grant new trials in both classes of cases; that is, where the verdict rests upon evidence which is either insufficient in law or insufficient in fact. Strictly speaking, evidence is said to be insufficient in law only in those cases where there is a total absence of such proof, either as to its quantity or kind, as in the particular case some rule of law requires as essential to the establishment of the fact. Such, for instance, would be the case where a fact was attested by one witness only, when the law required two, or when the alleged agreement was proven to be verbal, when the law required it to be in writing. In such cases a verdict might be said to be against law, because founded on insufficient evidence. Insufficiency in point of fact may exist in cases where there is no insufficiency in point of law; that is, there may be some evidence to sustain every element of the case, competent both in quantity and quality in law to sustain it, and yet it may be met by countervailing proof so potent as to leave no reasonable doubt of the opposing conclusion. * * * So upon the whole evidence in the case the testimony in support of the cause of action, or of the defense, may be so slight, although competent in law, or the preponderance against it may be so convincing, that a verdict may be seen to be plainly unreasonable and unjust. In many cases it might be the duty of the court to withdraw the case from the jury, or to direct a verdict in a particular way, and yet in others, where it would be proper to submit the case to the jury, it might become its duty to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. That obligation, however, is the result of a conclusion of fact, and in such cases the ground of the ruling is that the verdict is not supported by sufficient evidence, because it is against the weight of the evidence. Therefore it was said by this court in Randall v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, 109 U. S. 478, 3 Sup. Ct. 322, 27 L. Ed. 1003: 'It is the settled law of this court that when the evidence given at the trial, with all inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, so that such verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant.' In many cases, therefore, the evidence is insufficient in law, because insufficient in fact."

We have thus considered at some length the decisions of the highest tribunal in the land because they clearly show the power even of a court created by a sovereignty of derived and delegated authority. The Constitution of the United States (article 3, § 2), as adopted, provided, with certain exceptions as to original jurisdiction not germane to this inquiry, as follows: "In all other cases the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." This power was obviously limited and restricted by the seventh amendment, which was ratified in 1791, and is as follows: "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."

The observations of Alexander Hamilton in "The Federalist" (No. 83) show the condition prevailing in the several states as to the extent of the right of jury trial prior to the adoption of the Constitution: "The great difference between the limits of the jury trial in different states is not generally understood. And as it must have considerable influence on the sentence we ought to pass upon the omission complained of in regard to this point, an explanation of it is necessary. In this state [New York] our judicial establishments resemble, more clearly than in any other, those of Great Britain. We have courts of common law, courts of probates (analogous in certain matters to the spiritual courts in England), a court of admiralty, and a court of chancery. In the courts of common law only the trial by jury prevails, and this with some exceptions. In all the others a single judge presides, and proceeds in general either according to the course of the canon or civil law, without the aid of a jury. * * * In Connecticut they have no distinct courts either of chancery or of admiralty, and their courts of probates have no jurisdiction of causes. Their common-law courts have admiralty, and, to a certain extent, equity, jurisdiction. In cases of importance their General Assembly is the only court of chancery. In Connecticut, therefore, the trial by jury extends in practice further than in any other state yet mentioned. Rhode Island is, I believe, in this particular, pretty much in the situation of Connecticut. * * * In the four Eastern states the trial by jury not only stands upon a broader foundation than in the other states, but it is attended with a peculiarity unknown, in its full extent, to any of them. There is an appeal of course from one jury to another, till there have been two verdicts out of three on one side. * * * The best judges of the matter will be the least anxious for a constitutional establishment of the trial by jury in civil cases, and will be the most ready to admit that the changes which are continually happening in the affairs of society may render a different mode of determining questions of property preferable in many cases in which that mode of trial now prevails. For my part I acknowledge myself to be convinced that even in this state it might be advantageously extended to some cases to which it does not at present apply, and might as advantageously be abridged in others. It is conceded by all reasonable men that it ought not to obtain in all cases. The examples of innovations which contract its ancient limits, as well in these states as in Great Britain, afford a strong presumption that its former extent has been found inconvenient, and give room to suppose that future experience may discover the propriety and utility of other exceptions. I suspect it to be impossible in the nature of the thing to fix the salutary point at which the operation of the institution ought to stop; and this is with me a strong argument for leaving the matter to the discretion of the Legislature. This is now clearly understood to be the case in Great Britain, and it is equally so in the state of Connecticut; and yet it may be safely affirmed that more numerous encroachments have been made upon the trial by jury in this state since the Revolution, though provided for by a positive article of our Constitution, than has happened in the same time either in Connecticut or Great Britain."

The provision of section 11 of chapter 251, Gen. Laws 1896, empowering this court to "direct entry of judgment, and the date thereof, as the case may be, and may make such other or further orders as to costs or otherwise, in the cause, as to law and justice shall appertain," finds its historical origin and precedent from the petitions from the colonial courts here to the King in council in colonial times, and its parallel is found in the legislation of other states. The provision commonly appearing therein is to the general effect that the appellate court may make such order or enter such judgment as the court below should have made or entered. While the right to order a peremptory nonsuit or to direct or set aside a verdict differs in some respects from the right to reverse a judgment, it is nevertheless true that the power to do one of these acts is essentially the same as the power to do another of them. It therefore becomes instructive to examine the decisions of the courts of other states in this behalf.

Thus, in Borg v. C., R. I. & P. Ry. Co. (1896) 162 Ill. 348, 44 N. E. 722, the court says: "The successive Constitutions of this state have each guaranteed the right of trial by jury as enjoyed at and before the adoption of such Constitution, and have preserved the right to that method of trial as it previously existed. * * * The right of trial by jury at the time of the adoption of the Constitution was understood to exist subject to the power of this court, subsequently extended to the Appellate Court, to review the judgments of trial courts on the facts, and to reverse such judgments without remanding the cause for a new trial; and it was this right of trial by jury as so enjoyed which was preserved and protected by the Constitution. The practice of reversing judgments without remanding the cause was continued in this court, and a great number of cases were so reversed up to the organization of the Appellate Courts, as will appear from an examination of the Reports, and the power so exercised in this court was not questioned. * * * We have seen that the right of trial by jury as it was enjoyed at the time of the adoption of the present Constitution was not the right of an indefinite number of jury trials in the same cause, where an Appellate Court, on a review of the case, should find that a recovery would be merely a perversion of justice. Such right of trial by jury was never deemed to be invaded by the reversal of a cause without remanding it for another trial. Parties still have the right to submit controversies of fact to the consideration of a jury, and the successful party gains all the advantages and benefits following a verdict under the well-established rules of the courts, arising from superior opportunities to judge of the credibility of witnesses. But when, with all the advantages accorded to them, it appears to the Appellate Court that there can not be a recovery which should be allowed to stand, no constitutional right is invaded by a refusal to remand the case for successive trials which must necessarily be followed by successive refusals." See, also, Siddall v. Jansen et al., 143 Ill. 537, 32 N. E. 384.

In Davies v. People's Ry. Co. (1900), 159 Mo. 1, 59 S. W. 982, the facts were almost identical with the facts in the case at bar. The plaintiff was unloading beams from a wagon near a street railroad track, "and in order to do this he was compelled to stand in the rear and slightly to the west of the west hind wheel of the wagon, thus exposing himself to the danger of being struck by a passing car. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was standing with his back to the approaching car, and was prying up the end of a beam, while his assistants were fastening the hoisting apparatus around it. He did not see or hear the car, and the parties in charge of it failed to check its speed or to ring a bell, or give any warning whatever of its approach. For some distance south of the point where the plaintiff was at work there was a full and unobstructed view of defendant's track. The plaintiff admitted on cross-examination that there was barely enough space between the track and the wagon to allow a man to stand sidewise along the side of the wagon and escape injury from a passing car, and that while he was unloading this particular wagon two other cars had passed, and, being warned of their approach, he merely had to step aside or turn half way around to escape injury. He also admitted that he had been employed for some time at the work, that cars were continually passing, and that he was aware of the danger. * * * Under these facts, what was there for the determination of the jury that the case should have been submitted to it? Certainly it must go by the saying that the voluntary assuming of a position upon or so near to the tracks of a street railway, over which cars are run every few minutes, that they cannot pass without inflicting an injury to the party so positioned, unless the intervention of some independent agency occurs to prevent it, is an act in itself of the grossest negligence. If in taking the position assumed by the plaintiff, and at the same time engaging in an undertaking, as he says he was, that prevented his seeing or hearing the approach of the cars upon defendant's road, that he knew were due and liable to pass along at any moment, does not constitute an act of negligence that must be said to have contributed to the injury resulting to him, on account of being run against by one of defendant's cars pursuing its usual course upon the tracks, it would be idle to search the field of practical experience for an illustration of what is termed in law an act of contributory negligence. The plaintiff had no right to assume a place of danger upon defendant's tracks and deliberately engage in an undertaking in such a manner as to deprive himself of the benefit of the sense of sight and hearing, the common avenues through which the approach of danger is communicated, and trust that defendant's agents in the course of their employment would be more considerate and watchful for his safety than he himself. * * * It is not the right of a jury, whose office begins and terminates with the consideration and determination of facts (as in a case like this), to consider and pronounce the legal conclusion flowing from the admitted or ascertained facts. That is the sole prerogative and duty of the court, and can never be properly surrendered to the jury. When the plaintiff himself has shown a state of facts, the existence of which if shown by defendant would have entitled it to an instruction, to the effect that if the jury found the same to be true, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and the verdict must be for defendant, what would be the necessity for, and what the office of a jury? The court in writing the instruction in such a case would have pronounced the law's judgment upon the facts, as agreed by plaintiff, and the jury's ratification of it by a verdict would be unnecessary and meaningless, as its disapproval by an adverse verdict would be contemptuous and unwarranted, and the possibility for such latter expression should never be afforded to a jury. * * * While under the pleadings, it is true, the burden of proving plaintiff's alleged contributory negligence was primarily upon defendant, that burden was relieved by the plaintiff himself testifying to a state of facts making good the averment of defendant's answer, and as against plaintiff the court could apply to the facts he disclosed, the law's judgment thereon. As to plaintiff, the situation was as upon facts agreed. If the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the injuries inflicted upon himself by defendant's cars, on account of his contributory negligence, then no possible good could come from a further prosecution of the inquiry as to the extent of defendant's negligence in the premises. The doctrine of comparative negligence has no recognition in this court, and as there was neither allegation nor proof by plaintiff that the injury to him was wantonly or willfully inflicted by the agent of defendant in charge of its cars, there was nothing left for the jury after plaintiff's contributory negligence was shown by his own statement of the facts. The peremptory instruction asked by defendant at the close of plaintiff's testimony should have been given by the court, and for its refusal, its judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered. All concur."

In Central R. R. Co. v. Kent (1893) 91 Ga. 687, 18 S. E. 850, the court say (page 690 of 91 Ga., page 851 of 18 S. E.): "It sufficiently appears from the foregoing that when the decision reported in 87 Ga. and 13 S. E. was made, a majority of this court were convinced that, under the evidence as it then appeared in the record, in no view of the case was the plaintiff entitled to recover. In other words, we were fully satisfied that the washout which produced the calamity resulting in the plaintiff's injuries was caused by the act of God, and that there was no want of diligence on the part of the company in failing to discover it in time to give notice of it to the plaintiff. Accordingly, another new trial was granted, and it resulted in a third verdict, upon substantially the same facts, in favor of the plaintiff. At the last trial there was some additional evidence, but all the members of the court are satisfied that it does not in any material or substantial particular change or vary the case upon its actual merits as it appeared when here the last time. Entertaining this view, Justice Simmons and the writer felt constrained to set the verdict aside, and also to order that the case be dismissed. All of us feel certain that the full truth of this case has been developed, and that further trials of it could not bring out anything new that would be material in substance. On each trial, the plaintiff has undoubtedly made out a prima facie case. This it was easy to do, in view of the presumption of negligence raised by the law against railroad companies; but the majority are decidedly of the opinion that, on the last two trials at least, the company has conclusively and satisfactorily rebutted this presumption, and has shown itself free from all negligence or blame. It is manifest, we all think, that the plaintiff can never show a materially different state of facts; that is, can never show a state of facts that will, or should, break down what two of us regard as a perfect reply to the plaintiff's case. Of course, a court cannot, and should not, generally undertake to foresee or predict what a party can or can not prove; but after a case has been tried time after time, and this court, in view of all the records sent up and of the character of the case, is fully satisfied that in the very nature of things nothing more can be shown which could or ought to change or affect the final result, we may with propriety say it is beyond the power of a particular party to show a materially different state of facts, especially when that party has all along been represented by able, faithful, and exceedingly diligent counsel, whose efforts in his behalf make it certain that they have brought out all in his favor and all against the company which could be proved, and who do not themselves suggest anything material in his favor or against the company which further investigation might bring to light. We mean to say that neither the record, nor the argument of this case, either upon the merits or upon the motion to reinstate, suggests any reasonable ground to infer that there is any probability that, upon another trial, any new fact or circumstance would be elicited which could or ought to affect the result. The plaintiff and his witnesses are thoroughly committed to their theory and version of the case, and so are the-defendant and its witnesses. All the witnesses who have testified more than once have, in the main, thus far been consistent with themselves, and the new evidence at the last trial did not add any material features to the case as already developed. The policy of the law requires that long and tedious litigation should come to an end, and the direction given in this case was made in accordance with this policy. See the cases cited below. The defendant in two successive trials has vindicated its diligence to the satisfaction of a majority of the court, and there is not the slightest reason to conjecture it would not do so again and again. To protract this litigation would not only unnecessarily impose on the defendant the trouble and expense of so doing, but would be profitless to the plaintiff himself. * * * Their position (i. e., counsel for defendant in error) as we understand it, is that this court had no power to give the direction it gave in this case. We hold otherwise, and are free from doubt in so doing. Section 218, par. 2. of the Code [Ga. Code 1882], undoubtedly empowers this court to make a final disposition of a cause; and section 4284 expressly declares that it may 'award such order and direction to the cause in the court below as may be consistent with the law and justice of the case.' These sections certainly confer very large and ample powers upon this court—large enough, in our opinion, to authorize the direction given in the case at bar. In Harris v. Hull, Ex'r, 70 Ga. 838, 839, Justice Hall said: 'One great purpose in establishing this court was to terminate suits, and with this view it is made its duty not only to grant judgments of affirmance or reversal, but any other order, direction, or decree required, and, if necessary, to make a final disposition of the cause (Code, § 218), and it is empowered to give to the cause in the court below such direction as may be consistent with the law and justice of the case. Id. § 4284. Litigation should never be protracted where this, with due regard to the rights of parties, can possibly be avoided. "Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium" is a maxim so old that its origin is hidden in a remote antiquity, and the policy which it inculcates is so essential as not to admit of question or dispute.' " And see Railway Co. v. Morgart (1892) 56 Ark. 213, 19 S. W. 751; Jones v. Telegraph Co. (1875) 101 Tenn. 442, 47 S. W. 699; Brownsville v. Basse (1898) 43 Tex. 440; Smith v. Times Pub. Co. (1897) 178 Pa. 481, 36 Atl. 296, 35 L. R. A. 819.

In City of Spring Valley v. Coal Co. (1898) 173 Ill. 497, 50 N. E. 1067, affirming Siddall v. Jansen, supra, the court say (page 503 of 173 Ill., page 1068 of 50 N. E.): "The right of trial by jury which is preserved by the Constitution, is the right as it had been enjoyed before the adoption of that instrument. * * * The question whether a statute infringes the constitutional provision that the right to trial by jury as theretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate raises a purely historical question and nothing else. It is not to be determined by a consideration of what the Legislature ought to do in providing for the submission of issues to a jury, but such arguments are to be addressed to the Legislature. The right and the limitation upon the power of the Legislature to provide for the determination of controversies by other tribunals are to be decided by an investigation of the question how the right had been enjoyed when the Constitution was adopted. This has always been the rule."

In tracing the history of jury trial in Rhode Island, conditions unique in American history are presented. For 180 years, from the granting of the colonial charter by Charles II in 1663, to the adoption of the present Constitution in 1843, the fundamental instrument of government was the original creation of the King of Great Britain, being at the time of its abrogation the oldest constitutional charter in the world (1 Arnold, Hist. R. I. 294). More liberal than any other colonial charter when granted, in many respects, the powers, duties, rights, privileges, and restrictions imposed, conferred, and granted thereby endured until a time within the memory of many thousands of persons now living. The lapse of more than two centuries, with the resulting changes in social and political conditions, has caused this instrument to appear to us of to-day to be antiquated and circumscribed in respect of those provisions which at the time of their creation were far in advance of their time and were of unprecedented liberality, and have also rendered it exceedingly difficult for us to realize that our legal rights are still determined, limited, and defined, in no small degree, by constitutional perpetuation of the provisions of this charter and of the legislation enacted by its authority. A free charter of practical self-government was granted in these terms: "And from time to time, to make, ordain, constitute or repeal, such laws, statutes, orders, and ordinances, forms and ceremonies of government and magistracy, as to them shall seem meet, for the good and welfare of the said company, and for the government and ordering of the lands and hereditaments, hereinafter mentioned to be granted, and of the people that do, or at any time hereafter shall, inhabit or be within the same; so as such laws, ordinances and constitutions, so made, be not contrary and repugnant unto, but as near as may be, agreeable to the laws of this our realm of England, considering the nature and constitution of the place and people there; and also to appoint, order and direct, erect and settle, such places and courts of jurisdiction, for the hearing and determining of all actions, cases, matters and things, happening within the said colony and plantation, and which shall be in dispute, and depending there, as they shall think fit."

The ample scope of the powers granted in this charter more clearly appears when it is compared with the charter of 1691 of Massachusetts. In the latter instrument the crown reserved the right to appoint the governor, and power was given to the "great and Generall Court," to pass only such laws as "be not repugnant or contrary to the Laws of this our Realm of England," without containing the qualifying clause contained in the Rhode Island charter that such conformity need only be "as near as may be considering the nature and the constitution of the place and people there." Even so restricted, these laws were to be first presented to the royal governor for his approval in writing or otherwise were to be of no effect; and even when so approved were then to be submitted to the crown for approval within three years after such presentation.

Similarly the commission granted in 1679, creating the royal province of New Hampshire, reserved the appointment of the governor (or president) to the crown. And the powers of legislation conferred on the General Assembly and the power of the crown in respect of the same are thus expressed and limited: "At ye meeting of which Gen. Assembly we do hereby will, authorize and require ye Pres. of ye said Councell to mind them in ye generall, what is to be intimated in ye proclamation aforesaid. That he recommend them ye making of such Acts, Laws, and Ordinances, as may most tend to ye establishing them in obedience to our authority; their own p'servation in peace and good Governmt, and defend against their enemies, and that they do consider of the fittest ways for raising of taxes, and in such proportion as may be fit for ye support of ye sd Governmt. And our will and pleasure is, and we do hereby declare, ordain, and grant, that all and every such Acts, Laws, and ordinances, as shall from time to time be made in and by such general Assembly or Assemblies, shall be first approved and allowed by the Pres. and Councell for the time being, and thereupon shall stand and be in force until ye pleasure of us, our heirs and successors, shall be known, whether ye same Laws and ordinances shall receive any change or confirmation, or be totally disallowed and discharged. And, therefore, our will and pleasure is, that ye Pres. and Councell do, and shall from time to time transmit and send over unto us, our heirs and successors, and our and their Privie Councell for the time being, all and every such acts, Laws and Ordinances, by the first ship yt shall depart thence for Engd, after their making."

Indeed, in all the other colonies, except Maryland and Connecticut, the King possessed the power of abrogating the laws, and they were not final in their authority until they had passed under his review. In marked contrast to these limitations and restrictions is to be placed the official opinion of the Attorney General and the Solicitor General, rendered in 1781 to George II, in response to a letter from Gov. Joseph Jenckes, upon a memorial from certain citizens of Rhode Island, complaining that a certain act of the General Assembly relative to the emission of paper money was in violation of certain acts of Parliament and Orders in Council. 4 R. I. Col. Rec. p. 461. The crown officers say, in giving their opinion: "In this charter, no negative voice is given to the governor, nor any power reserved to the crown, of approving or disapproving the laws to be made in this colony." As to the question stated, "Whether His Majesty hath any power to repeal or make void the above-mentioned act of assembly, we humbly conceive, that no provision being made for that purpose, the crown hath no discretionary power of repealing laws made in this province; but the validity thereof, depends upon their not being contrary, but as near as may be, agreeable to the laws of England, regard being had to the nature and constitution of the place, and the people. Where this condition is observed, the law is binding; and where it is not, the law is void as not warranted by the charter."

In apparent exercise of the ample authority contained in the charter "also to appoint, order and direct, erect and settle such places and courts of jurisdiction for the hearing and determining of all actions, cases, matters and things happening within the said colony and plantation, and which shall be in dispute and depending therein as they shall think fit," in 1677 the General Assembly enacted the following statute (Pub. Laws R. I. 1636-1705, p. 26):

"A rehearing after Iudgement Granted. It is Enacted & we do declare yt Either the Plaintiff or Defendant Shall Each of them haue Liberty of one rehearing if Either of them desire it & no more Provided he that Desire it whether Plaintiff or Defendant Shall give in Double bond of wt ye Defendant gave for his former Appearance wch bond together wth four pounds or ye Uallue of ye Bill of Costs Shall be given into ye Recorders Office within Ten days after Iudgement Granted & this Cost not to be Recouable Again Except ye Iury See Good Cause to give it & for this Cause the Execution Shall remain, in the Recorders Office Tenn dayes after Iudgement Granted before it goe forth and so ye Recorder shall Stop ye Execution wch Shall be notice Sufficient for the Other party to Prepaire for a Tryall according to Law

"The next Court And it is Enacted That in all Cases wherein any Perticular Person is ye Prosecutor he or they Shall pay the Iury."

This right of a second jury trial as of course, either in the same court or by appeal in another court, and without showing error of law or misconduct in the first trial, though a distinct departure from the rule of the common law, nevertheless remained in force in Rhode Island for more than 200 years, being finally abolished by Pub. Laws R. I. p. 103, c. 674, April 12, 1878, and Pub. Laws 1879, p. 113, c. 743, March 10, 1879. In United States v. Wonson (1812), 1 Gall. 5, Fed. Cas. No. 16,750, Mr. Justice Story, then holding the United States Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts, said (page 14 of 1 Gall. [Fed. Cas. No. 16,750]): "We should search in vain then in the common law, for an instance of an appellate court retrying the cause by a jury while the former verdict and judgment remained in full force." While that case arose under the law of Massachusetts, the statute of Rhode Island then in force and referred to in the opinion (page 15 of 1 Gall. [Fed. Cas. No. 16,750]) was as follows (Rev. 1798, p. 150, § 8): "And be it further enacted, That any party aggrieved at the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in any county, may appeal to the next Supreme Judicial Court to be holden in the same county, where both parties shall have the benefit of any new and further evidence; Provided the appellant shall give bond in the Clerk's office of the Court appealed from, within five days after the rising of the same, to prosecute such appeal with effect, and in default thereof to pay cost." And the court continues (page 16 of 1 Gall. [Fed. Cas. No. 16,750]): "If, indeed, the act [of Congress] of 1803 gives on all appeals this new trial, however consonant it may be with our own habits, we should recollect that it overthrows the established jurisprudence of at least three-fourths of the states, and abolishes a fundamental principle of the common law." In further commenting upon the provision of the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to "suits at common law," etc., Mr. Justice Story continues (page 20 of 1 Gall. [Fed. Cas. No. 16,750]): "Beyond all question, the common law here alluded to is not the common law of any individual state (for it probably differs in all), but it is the common law of England, the grand reservoir of all our jurisprudence. * * * Now, according to the rules of the common law, the facts once tried by a jury are never re-examined, unless a new trial is granted in the discretion of the court, before which the suit is depending, for good cause shown, or unless the judgment of such court is reversed by a superior tribunal, on a writ of error, and a venire facias de novo is awarded. This is the invariable usage settled by the decisions of ages."

These citations show at some length the peculiarities of the system of jury trial prevailing in Rhode Island almost from the beginning of the colony, and they show also that the rules of the common law of England are in many respects inapplicable upon the force and effect of the verdict of a jury in a civil case, under what Mr. Justice Story thus styles as "the common law" of this state. Not only was the verdict of a jury not a finality here, it was a mere nullity if appealed from; and our ancient records show that, contrary to the rule of the common law, such verdicts were not only modified and reversed by the verdict of a jury, on the second trial on appeal, but they also show that which is even more unprecedented, in case the prevailing party, whether plaintiff or defendant, did not appear at the second trial, the court itself reversed the verdict of the jury and entered final judgment without remanding, even in actions relating to real estate.

Thus, at the September term, 1762, in Providence county is found the following record: "Thomas Broadway of Smithfield in our County of Providence Yoeman Appellant. Darius Sessions & Jabez Bowen Junr. both of Providence in our said County Merchants Appellees. The foundation of this Action was an Action of Entry sur Desisin Commenced and Prosecuted by the said Darius and Jabez against the said Thomas, at an Infer Court of common Pleas held at Providence, in and for the County of Providence on the Third Monday of June A. D. 1762. When and where the said Darius & Jabez obtained Judgement against the said Thomas for the Lands described in his Declaration with the Cost of Suit—Taxed and allowed at £32.5.10. from which Judgement the said Thomas appealed to this Court, the Case being now called the said Darius & Jabez refused to appear and defend the said Appeal—whereupon being Thrice called & not appearing he was Default It is therefore considered by this Court that the aforesaid Judgement of the Infer Court be reversed and the same is hereby reversed and the said Thomas is hereby assigned the Lands described as aforesaid and his of Suit in this behalf expended Taxed at £138.12.4." An examination of the papers in the case shows that the judgment below was rendered upon the verdict of a jury.

But this is not all. It not infrequently happened that the verdict on appeal reversed the verdict of the first jury. Accordingly, in 1732, a third jury trial was given as of course, in real actions relating to titles of lands (Dig. 1730, p. 24), and this right was further extended to all cases in 1743 (Dig. 1745, p. 282), in a proceeding entitled a "writ of review." This third jury trial might affirm, modify, or reverse the second verdict, and is even further evidence of the unwillingness to rely upon the infallibility of a single jury trial. This method of procedure was in force at the time of the adoption of the Constitution in 1843; section 1 of "An act granting reviews in civil actions" (Dig. 1822, p. 133) being as follows: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly, and by the authority thereof it is enacted, that either party aggrieved at the judgment of the supreme judicial court in any suit, in which one judgment only shall have been given against him, may at any time within one year review the same, and have one trial more in the same court; and on such review there shall be no further pleadings, but the cause shall be tried on the issue appearing on the record to have been originally joined by the parties; and the execution upon such judgment given in the supreme judicial court shall not be stayed by such review, unless a bond shall be given as in this act provided; and such party shall have the liberty to offer any further evidence; and when either party shall bring a writ of review, and enter the same, the whole cause shall be tried, as if no judgment had been given therein; and the former judgment may be reversed in whole, or in part, or greater damages or less, or no damages, may be given, as the merits of the cause, upon law and evidence, shall require, in the same manner as though both parties had brought their writs of review." This method of procedure, by writ of review, was not repealed until the Digest of 1844 was enacted, after the adoption of the Constitution; and it is also proper to observe that it is the second jury trial on appeal which was abolished in 1878, leaving only the right to the first jury trial thereafter, and how little of the quality of finality attached to such a first verdict in a civil case has already been made to appear.

In criminal cases the powers exercised over verdicts by the courts in Rhode Island, almost from the granting of the charter, were such as unquestionably contravene our present constitutional provisions. Whether the powers exercised were granted or assumed, the action of the "General Court of Tryalls," then the highest court of the colony (saving always an appeal to the General Assembly), was the action of a court created by a General Assembly under the provisions of the charter of 1663, and which was still the fundamental instrument of the government of the state until 1843. An examination of the ancient records of this court in Newport county shows these cases, among others, in the years immediately following the granting of the charter of 1663:

"At The Gen'l Court of Tryalls held for his Maj'ties Collony at Newport the 18th day of October 1671. Upon Indictment by the Gen'l Atorney against Mathew Boomer of Newport for that the said Boomer did kill several Sheep that were not his owne and Converted them to his owne use which is Gran Larceny The said Boomer, Beinge in Court Cald apeerd and Answerd, pleads Not Guilty and Referrs himselfe for Tryall to God and the Cuntry—. The Jurrys Verdict Not Guilty. The Kings Atorney on the Kings behalfe desireing a stop of Judgment in the Case the Court alsoe beinge Unanimously dissatisfied with the Jurrys Verdict doe see cause to grant the Atorneys Request and doe stop Judgment thereon. Therefore the Court doe see cause and doe continue his former bonds to be of full force untill the next Gen'l Court of Tryalls. * * * Att the Gen'l Court of Tryalls Held in his Maj'ties Name at Newport the sixth day of May 1672. Whereas Mathew Boomer of Newport was by the last Court of Tryalls bound to this Court, he beinge in Court Cald apeerd and proclamation beinge made in open Court whither any person had any thing or cause to Eleadge against the said Boomer, and none comeinge in to Complaine this Court doe see Cause to acquitt the said Boomer of his Bonds paying fees—."

In the same year "Upon Indictment to the Gen'l Atorney against Francis Asleton (prisoner) for murdering John John Cockrum alias Cockerill: The said Asleton beinge brought into Court was called forth to Answer Ask'd whither Guilty or not Guilty, pleads Not Guilty and Referrs himselfe for Tryall to God and the Cuntry.

"The Jurrys Verdict. Not Guilty.

"The Court Centances is that the said Asleton doe Remaine in prisson until he hath paid his fees, which shall be paid out of his Estate already Sequestered and then the Rest to be Returned to him. And that the said Asleton shall within tenn daies Depart Rhode Island and to be kept close prissoner until he doth depart and shall not Returne againe to Inhabitt in any Towne of the Collony without leave from the Majestrates in each Towne: Upon his perrill.

In 1678, "Upon Indictment by the Gen'l Solicetor against Richard Cowley prissoner for faloniously stealing and taking away sheep which were the proper Estate of Mr. Caleb Carr sen. and Capt. John Joanes on the Island Quononoquit

"He beinge brought into Court and asked whither Guilty or Not Guilty pleaded not Guilty and referrs himselfe for Tryall to God and the Cuntry

"The Jurrys Verdict Not Guilty.

"The Court Committ him unto the keeper till called for The said Cowley beinge called for the keeper made answer that he had broken prisson and made his escape: The Court doe empower the Officers to seize on any Estate they can finde of the said Cowley's to pay their Just fees."

In 1681, "On Indictment of the Gen'l Solicetor against John Osbourne now prissoner for beinge a Rober ec. hee beinge brought into Court and his Indictment to him Read and he ask'd whether Guilty or not Guilty pleads Not Guilty.

"The Case Committed to the Jury.

"Verdict, Not Guilty.

"The Sentence of the Court is that John Osbourne shall depart this Collony within three Days after this 7th of October and shall not Continue here longer Except by leave of the Govenor, And if he bee found in this Collony Contrary to this Sentence then by warrant under the hand of the Governor, Dept Governor or any Assistant or more to bee apprehended and sent to prisson for his contempt there to Remaine till by Authority Released."

Unwarranted as these orders seem to be to-day, it is nevertheless unquestioned that these judges were not the irresponsible appointees of the crown, and thus not accountable to the people of the colony, but were elected annually by the people, and were thus responsible to them for any transgression of their authority or for any unwarranted assumption of power. The powers exercised and the right asserted over verdicts and judgments by the overshadowing General Assembly are so well known as to require no extended comment. Its claim to the exercise of judicial powers finds its precedent in the act passed in 1647, under the charter of 1644, as follows (1 R. I. Col. Rec. 205): "And in case any man sues for Justice against an officer or other, and he cannot be heard, or is heard and cannot be righted by any Law extant among us, then shall the partie grieved petition to the Generall or Law-making Assemblie, and shall be relieved."

In 1680 "An Act Granting Appeals to the General Assembly, from the General Court of Tryals," was passed by which the General Assembly was specifically authorized to "Confirm, Alter, Amend or Reverse such Judgments and give a new Judgment thereupon as to the said Assembly shall appear to be agreeable to Law and Equity" (Dig. 1719, at page 33; Dig. 1730, p. 28), as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly, and by the Authority of the same. That in all Personal Actions, where either Plaintiff or Defendant, shall obtain two Judgments for him at the General Court of Tryals in one Action and Cause brought to the said Court; That the other Party against whom said judgments were given, shall have Liberty to Appeal to the next General Assembly, from the last Judgment for Relief, who may if they see Just and Reasonable Cause, Confirm, Alter, Amend, or Reverse such Judgments, and give a new Judgment thereupon, as to the said Assembly shall appear to be agreeable to Law and Equity: And that each or either Appellant or Appellee, shall and may have Liberty of giving in new Evidence upon such Appeal," &c.

In 1712 an act was passed (4 R. I. Col. Rec. 186) in effect repealing the act of 1680 in consequence of the decision of the Queen in Council, in 1710, adverse to the jurisdiction of the General Assembly in the case of Brenton v. Remington (4 R. I. Col. Rec. p. 48). In 1741 a so-called "Court of Equity" was established (Dig. 1745, p. 239), to which was given the power of reversing judgments as follows: "And that for the Future there be a Court of Equity appointed and established in this Government, to consist of Five Judges to be chosen annually by the General Assembly, and to be commissioned, any three of whom to be a Quorum; who are hereby empowered and authorized to hear all Appeals from the Judgments of the Superior Court in Personal Actions, and to give a Determination on said Appeals, by affirming, reversing, or altering the Judgments of said Superior Court, agreeable to Law and Equity, in as full and extensive Manner as the General Assembly hath been accustomed to do." In 1742 this act was repealed by the act creating the procedure by "Writ of Review." (Dig. 1745, p. 282).

If Lord Bellamont may be believed, it was the ancient custom of the General Assembly to reverse the verdict of juries. In his official report to the Lords of the Board of Trade on the alleged irregularities of Rhode Island, made in 1699, he charges that (3 R. I. Col. Rec. 386): "Sec. II. The Generall Assembly assume a judicial power of hearing, trying and determining of civil causes, removing them out of the ordinary Courts of Justice and way of tryall, according to the course of the common law, alter and reverse verdicts and judgments, the Charter committing no judicial power and authority unto them." At this time the act of 1680 had not been repealed.

There remains for consideration one other tribunal to which appeals might anciently be taken from the verdict on a writ of review—the King in Council. The right of the crown to entertain appeals in civil cases from all colonial courts was asserted by the crown as early as 1698 in the following order in council addressed to the colony of Connecticut:

"Whitehall, March the 9th, 1698.

"His Majesty in council approving of what is proposed by the Council of Trade in their said representation, is pleased in order that the governor and company of the colony of Connecticut be required to take care that no obstruction of the course of justice be practised or allowed amongst them; but that the respective cases mentioned in the said representation, and any other whatsoever that may hereafter happen upon differences between man and man about private rights, be fairly heard and judged in the proper methods of the courts established in that colony. And in case the petitioners in the aforesaid causes, or any of them, or any other persons, shall think themselves aggrieved by the sentence or sentences which may be there given, they may thereupon be allowed to appeal to his Majesty in council. And that copies of all records and other proceedings in all such respective cases be transmitted hither, in order to a final hearing and determination thereof before his Majesty in council. And that in all such cases, the governor and company of the colony of Connecticut do take notice that it is the inherent right of his Majesty to receive and determine appeals from all his Majesty's colonies in America; and that they do govern themselves accordingly. And the right honourable the Council of Trade are to signify this his Majesty's pleasure to the governor and company of the colony of Connecticut accordingly."

In 1716 was decided the case of Christian v. Corren, which is thus reported in 1 P. Wms. 329:

"The Earl of Derby, King of the Isle of Man, made a decree in that island concerning lands there; and the person, against whom the decree was made, appealed hither.

"One (and indeed the principal) question was, whether an appeal did lie before the King in council, there being no reservation in the grant made of the Isle of Man by the crown, of the subject's right of appeal to the Crown.

"And it was urged for the appeal by myself (who alone was of counsel with the appellant), that it appearing, in this case that H. 4. had granted the Isle of Man to the Earl of Derby's ancestors, to hold by homage and other services, though there was no reservation of the subject's right of appeal to the Crown, yet this liberty was plainly implied.

"For that such liberty of appeal lay in all cases where there was a tenure of the Crown; that it was the right of the subjects to appeal to the sovereign to redress a wrong done to them in any court of justice; nay, if there had been any express words in the grant to exclude appeals, they had been void; because the subjects had an inherent right, inseparable from them as subjects, to apply to the Crown for justice. And on the other hand,

"The King, as the fountain of justice, had an inherent right, inseparable from the Crown, to distribute justice among his subjects; and if this were a right in the subjects, no grant could deprive them of it; the consequence of which would be, that in all such cases, viz. where there were words exclusive of such right of appeal, the King would be construed to be deceived, and his grant void; also precedents were cited in point.

"Lord Chief Justice Parker, who assisted at Council upon this occasion, thought that the King in Council had necessarily a jurisdiction in this case, in order to prevent a failure of justice. * * * Whereupon their Lordships proceeded in this appeal, and determined in favour of the appellant."

Both the foregoing requirements of allegiance and tenure were fulfilled in Rhode Island, inasmuch as by the express terms of the charter it was provided as follows: "And further our will and pleasure is, and we do, for us, our heirs and successors, ordain, declare, and grant unto the said governor and company, and their successors, that all and every the subjects of us, our heirs and successors, which are already planted and settled within our said colony of Providence Plantations, or which shall hereafter go to inhabit within the said colony, and all and every of their children, which have been born there, or which shall happen hereafter to be born there, or on the sea, going thither, or returning from thence, shall have and enjoy all liberties and immunities of free and natural subjects within any the dominions of us, our heirs and successors, to all intents, constructions and purposes, whatsoever, as if they, and every of them, were born within the realm of England." And the tenure of the lands was thus specified: "to be holden of us, our heirs and successors as of the manor of East Greenwich in our county of Kent, in free and common socage, and not in capite nor by knight service," etc., the manor of East Greenwich long having been a royal manor. And see Blackstone, Com. vol. 1, p. 108.

The first legislation of the colony subsequent to the charter of 1663 (relative to such appeals) is to be found in "An act for the calling of special courts," passed in 1664 (Dig. 1719, p. 18) for the benefit of "Merchants, sea-faring men or other transient persons," and which reserves to a party aggrieved "the liberty of appealing to His Majesty in Council in England as in other cases is usually allowed," apparently recognizing such a right of appeal as having existed as of right from the earliest times. It would serve no useful purpose to enlarge upon the many acts of colonial legislation regulating such appeals, or the rules and orders in council relative thereto. A summary of the action of the King in Council on 59 appeals from Rhode Island, between 1735 and 1776, as shown by the Privy Council Register, is to be found in the Report of the Proceedings of the American Historical Association of the United States, 1894 (p. 337), contained in a paper by Mr. Harold D. Hazeltine, as follows: "Twenty-two of these appeals were dismissed for nonprosecution, one of them being afterwards reaffirmed. In fifteen the decisions of the colonial courts were reversed and in two of these the Council sent directions to the lower tribunal. In eleven the decisions of the colonial courts were affirmed. Six previous decisions were varied, one of them chiefly as to the rate of interest on bills of credit for £28,179, the damages in another being reduced, a peremptory order issued in a third, and two of the remaining three being remitted. In one both the appeal and the cross-appeal were dismissed; one was referred back to the colonial court with special directions; the verdict in one was set aside and a new trial in the colony directed; one was simply dismissed and in the remaining one a peremptory order was issued to the colonial judges to carry out the Council's decision in a previous suit by the same parties."

The following case from our records in Newport county shows that after a judgment for plaintiff in the inferior court, followed on appeal by a second judgment for plaintiff in the superior court, and the latter judgment confirmed by a verdict and a judgment for the plaintiff on the "writ of review," the Privy Council on appeal reversed all the three judgments for the plaintiff and dismissed the case. The record shows that in 1741 Joseph Power brought an action of account against David Vanburgh and Samuel Carpenter. In the inferior court of common pleas in Newport county, "and thereby laid his damages at £3,000 current money of New England. To which Action the Petitioners appeared and pleaded that they had fully Accounted with the said Power. And Issue being joined the said Action came on to be tried" and Power received judgment for £459.13.8 and costs. "Whereupon the Petitioners Appealed from the Judgment of the said Inferior Court to the then next Superior Court of Judicature and thereupon the said Judgment of the said Inferior Court was on the 27th of March, 1744, affirmed with costs of Suit in the said Superior Court." That thereafter the petitioners brought their writ of review, and that "the said Action came on to be tried at a Superior Court of Judicature held on the 26th of March 1745 on the Petitioners said Writ of Review when the Jury found the following Verdict—Viz. 'We find that the plaintiffs on Review shall Account with the Defendant, which Verdict was accepted.—'" The record thus shows the appeal to the King in Council, as follows:

"The Lords of the Committee in Obedience to Your Majestys said Order of Reference this day took the said Petition and Appeal into their Consideration, and heard all partys therein concerned by their Counsel learned in the law, and do thereupon Agree humbly to Report as their Opinion to Your Majesty, that the said Verdict should be Discharged and set aside, and that the said several Judgments should be reversed, and the said Action be discharged and dismissed.—"

"His Majesty this day took the said Report into Consideration and was pleased with the Advice of His Privy Council, to Approve thereof, to Order, as it is hereby Ordered, that the said Verdict be discharged and set aside, the said several Judgments reversed, and the said Action discharged and dismissed.—"

"Whereof the Governor and Company of His Majestys Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations for the time being, and all others whom it may concern, are to take Notice and govern themselves accordingly."

We have thus seen that, acting under a charter conferring unusual powers, the General Assembly in 1677 first enacted the provision for a second jury trial as of course, and that such was the law of the colony and of the state for more than 200 years, until 1878: that such legislation, as expressed by Mr. Justice Story, "abolished a fundamental principle of the common law" of England in this respect; that from 1732 to 1844, a period of more than 100 years, a third trial could be had as of course, on a writ to review; that even from such third jury trial on appeal to the King in Council prior to the Revolution prior judgments and verdicts were reversed without remanding for new trial; that a single verdict was reversed on appeal by the appellate court itself upon default of appearance of either party to the appeal, even in actions relating to real estate. To these observations may be added the words of Chief Justice Ames in Taylor & Co. v. Place, 4 R. I. 352, note: "It is beyond question, however, that in colonial times, prior to 1741 and subsequent thereto, and especially after the trammels of the mother country had been removed by the Revolution, the General Assembly, by way of petition in the nature of an appeal, exercised a controlling power over the judicial determinations of the courts of the colony, giving, in what they deemed 'hard cases,' a relief called by them equitable relief, though without the slightest attention to the principles or restraints of any established system of equity jurisprudence. Prior to the adoption of the Constitution the verdict of a jury in a civil case possessed no element of finality, if appealed from or if reviewed, and such elements of finality as then appertained to jury trials in civil cases arose only after at least two concurring verdicts free from error in law as well as from misconduct at the trial, and to obtain two such concurring verdicts three jury trials might be required. It is obvious that this was a very different requirement from the requirement of the common law of England in this respect, and upon which the argument of the plaintiff is based. His contention, indeed, would require the court to impute to the finding of a verdict by a jury a finality prior to the adoption of the Constitution which could, at least, only be given by two juries, and which might require the consideration of three juries; and this without reference to any action of King or of General Assembly. As it is evident that the precedents and principles of the common law of England were not decisive of the effect of a verdict of a jury in a civil case in Rhode Island under the law of the state as it existed at the adoption of the Constitution, so it is equally evident that the anomalous and unique conditions which prevailed here are not precedents in states in which the rule of the common law of England in this respect has always remained in full force.

Tested even by the rule of that common law as authoritatively expounded in the decisions cited from the Supreme Court of the United States, we are clearly of the opinion that a verdict should have been directed for the defendant in the case at bar, and, if rendered for the plaintiff, should have been set aside. Nor do we see any lack of constitutional authority in the Legislature to enact the statute under which the court has acted, or in the action of the court thereunder on the facts disclosed in the case at bar. We are of the opinion, further, that the plaintiff has not been deprived of his property without due process of law, as contended by him on the record and at the argument, and that the motion to vacate the order in question must be denied.

STEARNS, Atty. Gen., et al. v. NEWPORT HOSPITAL.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. June 29, 1905.)

1. CHARITIES—TRUSTEES—POWERS OF TOWNS.

Under the express provisions of Gen. Laws 1896, c. 38, § 2, towns may take, hold, and manage real and personal estate in trust for any charitable, other than religious, uses.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Charities, § 30.]

2. SAME—SUPERVISION BY MUNICIPALITY.

The capacity given a municipality by Gen. Laws 1896, c. 38, § 2, to become a trustee of a charitable trust on appointment, does not give the municipality a supervisory jurisdiction over funds intrusted to other trustees, although such funds may be so administered as to help or hinder the performance of the duties of the municipality, and the trustees of such funds are not accountable for the administration of their trust to the municipality in which it is located.

3. HOSPITALS—EX OFFICIO TRUSTEES.

A mayor of a city, who is ex officio one of the trustees of a hospital located in the city, but not under the supervision of the city as trustee, should exercise his own judgment and perform his duties as trustee without dictation from any other branch of the city government.

4. SAME—ACTIONS FOR ENFORCEMENT—PARTIES.

A mayor of a city and ex officio trustee of a hospital located in the city is not, as such, nor in his individual capacity as a citizen and taxpayer, a proper party complainant in a suit against the trustees of the hospital to correct alleged abuses of trust and to remove such trustees, but the Attorney General is the proper person to represent the public in any judicial inquiry into the conduct of the trustees.

5. CHARITIES—CONSTRUCTION—CHARTER PROVISIONS.

A corporation may generally execute a trust not expressly forbidden by its charter, if the purposes of the trust are germane to the object stated in the act of incorporation; and the scope of an act establishing a public charity should not be constrained by construction of its words, so as to forbid the action of the trustee corporation in ways germane to those specified in its charter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Charities, § 30.]

6. SAME.

Laws 1873, p. 222, constituted certain persons a corporation for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a hospital to receive, care for, and heal the "sick or hurt," and authorized it to take and hold real and personal estate for that purpose. Laws 1893, p. 554, amended the act of 1873, so as to authorize the corporation to hold property and to apply the same to the support and maintenance of the hospital, or to the care of "sick, hurt, injured, or infirm persons." A will, admitted to probate after the passage of the original act, but before the passage of the amendment, bequeathed and devised property to the hospital in trust to apply the same to taking care of "sick, hurt, injured, or infirm poor persons." Held, that the hospital corporation was authorized by its original charter, and without the aid of the amendment, to accept and administer the trust declared in the will.

7. SAME—PURPOSES OF GIFT.

Under a will giving property to a hospital corporation in trust to apply the same and the proceeds and profits thereof to receiving, healing, and taking care of sick, hurt, or infirm poor persons free of charge as far as may be,

and declaring that the object of the trust was to benefit as many such poor persons as practicable, it was not the imperative duty of the hospital to maintain a ward for the care of contagious diseases, and its failure to do so was not a breach of trust, regardless of the effect that the action of the trustees in such respect might have upon the performance by the city in which the hospital was located of the duties imposed by Gen. Laws 1896, c. 40, § 13, and chapter 94, §§ 15-17, requiring towns to guard against the spread of contagious diseases, and to establish quarantine regulations, etc.

8. SAME—ADMINISTRATION OF FUNDS—USE OF CAPITAL—DISCRETION OF TRUSTEES.

Where a will giving property to a hospital corporation in trust to apply the same and the proceeds, issues, and profits thereof to the receiving and taking care of sick and injured poor persons provided that the object of the trust was to benefit as many such poor persons as practicable, and at the same time provide a permanent source of aid and relief, and authorized the employment of the trust funds and property for the general support and maintenance of the hospital so far as might be requisite to perpetuate the charity thereby created, it was left to the judgment of the trustee to determine in the first instance whether the corpus of the estate might be used to meet current expenses; and the propriety of its action in a particular case would depend upon the attendant facts.

9. SAME.

The use of a part of the capital in the erection of buildings for the accommodation of sick persons was directly in pursuance of the conditions of the trust.

Bill in equity by Charles F. Stearns, Attorney General, and others against the Newport Hospital. Heard on demurrer and answer. Case to stand for hearing.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DU-BOIS and BLODGETT, JJ.

J. Stacy Brown, for complainants. Darius Baker and Rathbone Gardner, for respondent.

DOUGLAS, C. J. The defendant is a corporation established in the city of Newport, under an act of the General Assembly passed February 12, 1873 (Laws 1873, p. 222), of which the first two sections are as follows:

"Section 1. Benjamin Finch, T. Mumford Seabury, George C. Mason, Edward King, George A. Richmond, R. B. Cranston, Henry Ledyard, Samuel Engs, David King, Austin L. Sands, Henry E. Turner, William H. Brickhead, George S. Engs, and their associates who may be hereafter admitted members of the corporation hereinafter created according to the by-laws thereof, are incorporated and made a body corporate and politic by the name and style of the 'Newport Hospital,' for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a hospital in Newport for the purpose of receiving, caring for, and healing the sick or hurt by accident or otherwise, with the rights and privileges and subject to the duties and liabilities provided for corporations in general by the provisions of chapter 139 of the General Statutes.

"Sec. 2. The said corporation may take and receive, hold, purchase and possess real and personal estate, to be used and improved for the erection, support and maintenance of said hospital in the city of Newport: Provided that the income of its real and personal estate together does not in any one year exceed the sum of twenty thousand dollars; and the property and estate of said corporation, both real and personal, shall not at any time be liable to be assessed in the apportionment of any state or town tax."

An act was passed March 10, 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 554), amending section 2 of this act so that it should read as follows:

"Sec. 2. The said corporation may continue to hold all property heretofore given or conveyed to it and shall have power to take and hold all property which may hereafter be given or conveyed to it for the purpose of being invested for or in any way applied to the support and maintenance of said hospital or for the caring for and healing of sick, hurt, injured, or infirm persons in said Newport, and to take and execute all trusts in relation thereto, and to do all things appertaining to the receiving of property and estate and of applying the same to the support and maintenance of said hospital and to the care and healing of sick, hurt, injured, or infirm persons that a natural person could lawfully do. And the property and estate of said corporation, both real and personal, shall be exempt from taxation, provided that the income of its real and personal estate together does not in any one year exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars."

In November, 1882, after the organization of the defendant corporation under its charter, but before the passage of the foregoing amendment, the will of John Alfred Hazard was admitted to probate in Newport, and by the terms of said will the residue of his estate was devised and bequeathed to the Newport Hospital, its successors and assigns, forever, in trust, as follows:

"(1) To set apart and invest five thousand dollars, raising said sum by sale of my real estate, if necessary, and pay and apply the income thereof to and for the use of Samuel C. Clinton (a man of color who has worked for me many years) as long as he shall live. (2) To set apart and invest, also, ten thousand dollars, raising said sum by selling my real estate, if needful, and pay the income thereof to Mrs. Rebecca Stanley (daughter of Capt. John Wood, formerly of said Newport) for and during her natural life. (3) To forever keep in good order the monuments, graves, ground, and fences of the Easton Burial Lot on my farm at Sachuest Beach, in Middletown in said state. (4) To forever use and apply the whole residue and remainder of said trust property, and the proceeds, rents, issues, profits and income thereof, to and for the receiving, healing, and taking care of sick, hurt, injured, or infirm poor persons at said hospital, free of charge to such poor persons or patients as far as may be, and under and pursuant to such rules and regulations in the premises as the trustees, directors, or managers of said hospital may from time to time in their discretion prescribe forever, the object hereof being to benefit as many such poor persons as practicable, and at the same time provide and secure a permanent source of aid, remedy and relief, to which end the employment of said trust funds and property for the general support and maintenance of said hospital is hereby authorized, so far as may be requisite, to uphold it and preserve it and perpetuate the charity hereby created and designed. Said Newport Hospital corporation, and the trustees, managers, or directors thereof, shall always have power to sell and change the investment of said trust property and every portion and parcel thereof, whenever and as often as it may seem desirable to do so, and to perform every act requisite to effect such sales and changes, holding and investing the proceeds of every such sale upon and in conformity to the trusts herein declared of and concerning said trust property, and with continuous power to sell and change investments as aforesaid.

"But I particularly desire and recommend that no part of my said farm in Middletown shall ever be sold, or in any way aliened or disposed of, except by lease or leases for a term of not more than ten years each from time to time as may seem proper. In case said Newport Hospital shall refuse to accept said trusts, or if ever, from any cause, it cannot be trustee or act or continue to act as trustee hereof, or cannot be compelled to execute said trusts, then it is my will and expectation that new and competent trustees shall be substituted and appointed to take and hold said trust property and perform said trusts, and that the requisite and appropriate proceedings and conveyances shall be ordered in the premises by the Supreme Court of said state or other proper court having equity jurisdiction in such matters."

This bill is brought against the Newport Hospital by the Attorney General, representing the public as beneficiary under the charitable trust created by the will of John Alfred Hazard, and by Patrick J. Boyle in his capacity as mayor of the city of Newport, acting under the direction of a resolution of the city council of said city, which instructs him, in his name as a trustee ex officio of the Newport Hospital, or in the name of the city, to institute proceedings, and also as a taxpayer of the city of Newport for himself and such other taxpayers as may join therein. The bill recites the charter of the defendant and the trust provisions of the will aforesaid, and alleges that at the time of the probate of the will the Newport Hospital could not legally take such a devise and bequest; that the hospital illegally took possession of the property, becoming a trustee in its own wrong, and has ever since remained in the wrongful possession thereof; that, while thus in wrongful possession, the respondent has violated the terms of the trust in that it has expended a portion of the principal of the trust estate; that it has further violated its trust by borrowing money upon the security of the principal of the trust estate, quoting as the foundation of this charge the last account of the treasurer of the hospital, and a statement in a recent report of the trustees to the effect that they had anticipated the further sale of land belonging to the corpus of the trust estate by incurring a debt; that by this use of the principal of the estate it has so diminished the income thereof that it has closed a ward which it formerly conducted for the treatment of contagious diseases, and has refused to open said ward, although requested so to do by the board of health of the city of Newport, alleging a lack of funds available for this purpose; that the city council, relying on the provisions of the Hazard trust to secure treatment of indigent persons suffering from contagious diseases, have made no other provision therefor, and that there is therefore no means of caring for such persons; that the continued expenditure of the principal of the trust estate, and the assumption of obligations in anticipation of the sale of land which is a part of the corpus of the trust estate, will ultimately result in its extinction; that the hospital has received from taxpayers of the city of Newport moneys amounting to upwards of $100,000 for the endowment of free beds for the use of poor persons suffering both from contagious and noncontagious diseases; and that these funds have been so negligently invested that there are now no free beds for contagious cases. The relief asked for is an accounting of the dealings of the respondent with the trust estate, an injunction against the expenditure of any more of the principal of the trust estate, a schedule of the balance and securities held by it for the benefit of the trust, and a list of all notes, mortgages, and other obligations incurred by the respondent and chargeable to the trust estate, and, finally, the appointment of new and competent trustees under the will of John Alfred Hazard. The respondent has filed a demurrer to the bill, on the ground that Patrick J. Boyle, in his several capacities, is not a proper party to this suit, and has also answered, denying certain allegations of fact and claiming certain defences in law.

The questions of law raised are: (1) Is Patrick J. Boyle, in his capacity as mayor of the city of Newport and ex officio trustee of the Newport Hospital, or individually as a taxpayer of the city, for himself and other taxpayers, a proper party complainant to this bill? (2) Was the respondent, the Newport Hospital, at the time of the probate of the will of John Alfred Hazard, in November, 1882, competent to take the residue of the estate of said John Alfred Hazard under said will, and to administer the trusts thereof, and is it now competent so to do? (3) Is the respondent, as trustee under the will of John Alfred Hazard, under obligation to open and maintain a ward of its hospital for the treatment of poor persons suffering from contagious diseases, and can the city of Newport, by reason of the existence of said trust, transfer to the respondent the duty which rests upon it as a municipality to care for poor persons suffering from contagious diseases? (4) Are the allegations as to the use by the respondent of moneys given to it for the endowment of free beds relevant to any issue raised in the cause or to the relief asked for by the bill? (5) Have the acts of the trustees of the respondent, as alleged in the bill, created the resulting contingency, under the will of John Alfred Hazard, calling for the appointment of new and competent trustees? Several of these questions are based partly upon new matter introduced by the answer, and cannot strictly be considered as upon demurrer. They have, however, been argued before us, and may be considered as if they had been raised by exceptions to these parts of the answer.

1. The first question must be decided in the negative. The complainant's counsel argues that a municipal corporation, being charged with the duty of caring for the poor, is competent to hold in trust funds given to it for that purpose, citing Lawrence County v. Leonard, 83 Pa. 206; In re Robinson's Estate, 63 Cal. 622; Webb v. Neal, 5 Allen, 575; Philadelphia v. Elliott, 3 Rawle, 170. The law is undoubtedly so in this country (2 Dillon, Munic. Corp. § 567). but the citation of authorities is quite unnecessary in this case, as our statute provides that "towns may take, purchase and hold real and personal estate, and alienate and convey the same; and may also take, hold and manage the same in trust for any charitable other than religious uses." Gen. Laws 1896, c. 36, § 2. But this capacity to become trustee upon appointment gives the city no supervisory jurisdiction over funds intrusted to other trustees, though such funds may be so administered as to help or hinder the performance of the duties of the municipality. The Newport Hospital is not accountable for its administration of the Hazard trust to the city of Newport, and the mayor, as one of the trustees of the hospital, should exercise his own judgment in the performance of his duties upon the board, without dictation from any other branch of the city government.

It is not argued that his appearance in either of his other capacities can be sustained. It is a novel situation for a trustee of a public charity to appear in this court as complainant against himself and his co-trustees, alleging that they have abused their trust and ought to be removed. As a citizen and taxpayer, he has no standing in this cause. The trust was not intended to benefit him by diminishing his private charities or public burdens. Incidentally it may have that result, but the intention of the founder was to increase the comfort of the poor and sick, not to substitute his aid for the benefits which they could already claim under the law. There is no limitation in the declaration of trust to the benefit of poor people who have a settlement in the city of Newport and are entitled to the care of the city. The bounty of the testator may be extended to aliens and sojourners, as well as to citizens, if the trustees of the hospital choose to receive such "sick, hurt, injured, or infirm poor persons" into their institution, and the expense of the care of such persons may exhaust the whole revenue of the trust. The trust is a public one, and the Attorney General is the proper person to represent the public in any judicial inquiry into the conduct of the trustee in administering it. Tudor on Charities (3d Ed.) 323. In Burbank v. Burbank, 152 Mass. 254, 25 N. E. 427, 9 L. R. A. 748, the court say: "This duty of maintaining the rights of the public is vested in the commonwealth, and it is exercised here, as in England, by the Attorney General." To the same effect are Green v. Blackwell (N. J. Ch.) 35 Atl. 375; Nelson v. Cushing, 2 Cush. 519; Ass'n for Relief of Indigent Females v. Beekman, 21 Barb. 565.

The demurrer to the joinder of Patrick J. Boyle in any of his said capacities as complainant in this bill must be sustained.

2. The second question must be answered in the affirmative. The objects of the hospital are similar to those contemplated by the trust. The difference between the language of the charter, as originally passed, and of the will, is slight. The hospital is to care for the sick and hurt. The will provides for the sick, hurt, injured, and infirm. The scope of an act establishing a public charity is not to be constrained by construction of its words, so as to forbid the action of the corporation in ways germane to those specified in its charter. It is no violent interpretation of language to include infirm persons among sick and hurt, and the decision in any particular case, whether the infirmity of an applicant for care amounts to sickness or hurt, may fairly be left to the decision of the officers of the corporation. The law allows the broadest interpretation of the powers of a charitable corporation when the question is as to the inclusion of objects who need its aid.

A corporation may generally execute a trust not expressly forbidden by its charter, if the purposes of the trust are germane to the objects stated in the act of incorporation. In Vidal v. Girard's Executors, 43 U. S. 127, 189, 11 L. Ed. 205, the Supreme Court of the United States hold that there is no objection in point of law to a corporation taking property upon a trust not strictly within the scope of the expressed purposes of its institution, but collateral to them. In Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174, 2 Sup. Ct. 336, 27 L. Ed. 401, the same court say: "A corporation may hold and execute a trust for charitable objects in accord with or tending to promote the purposes of its creation, although such as it might not, by its charter or by general laws, have authority itself to establish or spend its corporate funds for." In De Camp v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. 36, it is held that only the state can interfere to question the holding of trust funds by a corporation of a value beyond the amount allowed by its charter, citing Perry on Trusts, § 45; Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 633; Wade v. Am. Col. Soc., 7 Smedes & M. 663, 45 Am. Dec. 324. And it is said, further: "This court, which will not suffer a trust to fail for want of a trustee, will uphold a trust for a reasonable time, when necessary, in order to enable the trustee to obtain the requisite authority to take and execute it," citing Bridges v. Pleasants, 39 N. C. 26, 30, 44 Am. Dec. 94; Inglis v. Trustees of Sailors Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 115, 7 L. Ed. 617. Other cases to the same general purport are cited by the defendant's counsel, e. g., Phillips Academy v. King, 12 Mass. 546, approved in Inhabitants of First Parish v. Cole, 3 Pick. 232; Sohier v. St. Paul's Ch., 12 Metc. 250; Wetmore v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 450; Kerr v. Dougherty, 59 How. Prac. 44.

The counsel for the complainant cites no case or authority to the contrary. The reference which he makes to 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 922, is directly against his contention. The author of the article says in that place: "While it may be somewhat doubtful whether a corporation could stand seized to a charitable use prior to the statute 43 Eliz., it is now well settled that a corporation may act as trustee, if the trust be not repugnant to or inconsistent with the purposes of its organization."

We conclude, therefore, that the Newport Hospital was amply competent to accept and administer the charitable trust declared in the will of John Alfred Hazard under the provisions of its original charter, without the aid of the amendment.

3. The third question is not directly argued by the complainant's counsel, but the inability of the hospital to continue its care of contagious diseases is cited by him as proof that it has wasted the trust funds committed to its care. It cannot be successfully maintained, under the terms of the will, that it is the imperative duty of the trustee to maintain such a ward. The widest reasonable discretion is given to the hospital in the application of the trust fund to the relief of the beneficiaries. It may well appear that the object of the gift, which the testator declares to be "to benefit as many such poor persons as practicable," can be attained most successfully by excluding persons afflicted with contagious diseases, and the trustee must decide whether such is the case at all times while the trust continues. An erroneous decision of such a question would not in any event constitute a breach of trust.

It is of no importance, in this connection.

what effect this action of the trustees has had upon the performance by the city of Newport of its duties imposed by Gen. Laws 1896, c. 40, § 13, and chapter 94, §§ 15-17. The duty of the city is fixed by law. The discretion of the hospital depends upon the terms of the will.

4. The allegation of the bill to which the fourth question relates is that the respondent had received contributions from charitable persons for the establishment of free beds in the hospital, and has expended portions of the capital of the Hazard trust fund in making up deficiencies in the income of the free bed fund. It is alleged, further, that such deficiencies were caused by mismanagement of the free bed fund. Obviously the latter inquiry is foreign to the scope of this bill. We are here concerned with the respondent only in its administration of the Hazard trust. The appropriation of some portion of the capital of the Hazard fund to the current expenses of the hospital is the principal ground urged against the conduct of the trustee.

It is argued by the complainant's counsel that the will, by fair implication, requires that the capital of the fund shall be preserved in perpetuity, and that any expenditure out of the fund beyond the income thereof is a breach of trust, which invokes the interposition of the court. To this it is replied that there is no express limitation of the power of the trustee to expend the capital in the words of the will; that it is forever to use and apply "the whole residue and remainder of said trust property," as well as "the proceeds, rents, issues, profits, and income thereof" for the purposes of the trust; and that, the object being "to benefit as many such poor persons as practicable, and at the same time to provide and secure a permanent source of aid, remedy, and relief," the further provision, "to which end the employment of said trust funds and property for the general support and maintenance of said hospital is hereby authorized, so far as may be requisite, to uphold it and preserve it and perpetuate the charity hereby created and designed," is a sufficient authority to the trustee to expend part of the capital, if, in its opinion, such expenditure is desirable. We do not find in the provisions of the will either a definite prohibition or a plenary license on this subject. The testator desired that the trust he created should continue indefinitely, and he also hoped that it would be so managed as to do the most possible good. It is very evident that any habitual encroachment upon the principal of the fund would tend to defeat the object of the testator with respect to its perpetuity. But it is also conceivable that in stress of necessity a portion of the capital might be usefully employed even in the defraying of current expenses, and the fund again be restored by accumulation of income after the exigency had passed. Here again, in the first instance, the judgment of the trustee must determine its conduct. The answer denies many of the allegations of the bill in this regard, and the determination of the question, as applied to the past administration of the trustee, must be left until the issues of fact are made up and evidence has been taken upon them. We may say, however, at the present time, that the use of a part of the capital in the erection of buildings for the accommodation of sick persons is, in our opinion, directly in pursuance of the conditions of the trust. If no income in money is derived from the funds which have been paid for the buildings, the use of the buildings takes the place of such income.

As neither the demurrer nor the legal defenses set up by the answer are to the whole bill, the questions as to the conduct of the trustee, which take the form of issues of fact, remain for consideration. If the Attorney General desires to controvert the assertions of the respondent, and shall file a replication within 20 days, evidence may be taken on these issues, and the case will proceed; otherwise, it will stand for hearing upon bill and answer.

ROBBINS v. BANGOR RY. & ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. WATERS—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—RIGHTS UNDER CONTRACT.

The promoters of a water company contracted with the town for water for municipal purposes. The contract provided that the promoters should organize a corporation to which the contract should be assigned. It was also provided in the contract, among other things, that "the rates for water used in dwelling houses shall not exceed the following: For each dwelling house containing a family of not more than four persons, with one faucet for use within the tenement, five dollars per annum; for each additional person in the family, fifty cents per annum; for the first wash hand basin set, two dollars per annum; for each additional hand basin, one dollar per annum; for one bathing tub, three dollars per annum; for one additional bathing tub, one dollar per annum; for one water-closet three dollars per annum; for each additional water-closet, one dollar per annum; for a dwelling house occupied by two or more families, each family to pay three-quarters of the above rate per annum." The corporation thus provided for was organized, accepted the assignment, and assumed and agreed to perform all the duties and obligations which the promoters had agreed to perform, according to the terms of the contract. The corporation built a system of waterworks and entered upon the business of supplying water to the town under its contract, and to the inhabitants for power and for domestic purposes. It charged annual or flat rates, payable semiannually in advance, for the supply of water to dwelling houses, according to the terms of the promoter's contract, and to hotels, boarding houses, and other buildings, at other varying amounts. All the franchises and other property of the water company have now come to the defendant. Before this petition was brought, the corporation owning the plant revised its schedule of rates, and thereafter charged customers meter rates, monthly, for all water services, except to "dwelling houses containing families," the rates for which were left unchanged. The corporation then classified the petitioner's house as a boarding house, and for that reason, and also because of an alleged waste of water, put in a meter, and thereafter charged the petitioner with meter rates. The petitioner, claiming the building to be a "dwelling house containing a family," declined to pay at meter rates, but tendered the full amount due according to the flat rates for dwelling houses. Thereupon the company shut off the water.

Upon a petition for mandamus, praying for restoration of the service, it is held:

While a town is not an agent of the individual citizens, and authorized to make contracts binding upon them personally, yet when a person or corporation, as a consideration, or even as a mere inducement for the making of a hydrant contract with a town for fire purposes, engages to supply water to the inhabitants at rates not exceeding certain specified sums, and so obtains the contract and its benefits, the contractor is under obligations to fulfill the agreement as to services and rates to individual water takers.

2. SAME—CONTRACT OF PROMOTERS.

If a corporation expressly or impliedly adopts a contract made by its promoters, and thereby obtains its benefits, it must take it with its obligations and burdens. It must do what the promoters agreed to do, and so must all its successors, taking its property rights and franchises by conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1790.]

3. MANDAMUS—WHEN LIES.

Mandamus lies by an individual to compel a water company which is a public service corporation to supply water to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 83, Cent. Dig. Mandamus, § 289.]

4. WATERS—WATER COMPANIES—RATES.

A public service corporation may adopt reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of its business, to which individual water takers must conform. It may require payment for a reasonable time in advance, and it may cut off water from a customer who refuses or neglects to pay reasonable rates.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, § 276.]

5. SAME—CHANGE OF SCHEDULE.

A public service corporation may revise or change its schedule of rates, if no contract prevents, provided that the new rates are reasonable and do not discriminate. Within these limitations a water company may change from an annual or flat rate to a meter rate.

6. SAME—WATER METERS.

In case of unnecessary waste, a water company may apply a meter and charge reasonable meter rates.

7. SAME — WATER CONTRACT — DWELLING HOUSE.

A house occupied as a place for carrying on the business of keeping boarders, although while prosecuting the business, and as a means of prosecuting the business, the occupant and his wife and children live in the house also, is not a "dwelling house containing a family," within the meaning of a water contract fixing a rate for dwelling houses containing families, but is a boarding house.

8. SAME.

Under this definition the court finds that the plaintiff's house was not "a dwelling house containing a family," within the meaning of the contract, and his petition, based upon that contention, must be dismissed.

9. SAME—REASONABLENESS OF RATES.

The petition in this case is not framed to raise the question, nor are there sufficient data shown to enable the court to determine. whether the meter rates charged to the petitioner for the house as a boarding house are excessive or not. Nor does the court say that the rates which the defendant demands are or are not unjust, by reason of unlawful discrimination in the classification made by it, and in the charges made to the several classes; nor that the defendant has or has not the right to demand as much of the petitioner as it does for the unpaid water service.

(Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Penobscot County, at Law.

Petition of Chester W. Robbins for writ of mandamus to the Bangor Railway & Electric Company. Case reported, and petition dismissed.

Petition for a writ of mandamus to require the defendant company to furnish water to the petitioner at a house owned by him in Old Town and occupied by a tenant. Heard upon the petition and answer, as upon an alternative writ and return, and, at the conclusion of the evidence, the case was reported to the law court for "a determination as to whether a peremptory writ of mandamus shall issue or the petition be dismissed."

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Clarence Scott, for petitioner. E. C. Ryder, for defendant.

SAVAGE, J. Petition for a writ of mandamus to require the defendant company to furnish water to the petitioner at a house owned by him, and occupied by a tenant, in Old Town. The case was heard upon the petition and answer, as upon an alternative writ and return, and, at the conclusion of the evidence, the case was reported to this court for its "determination as to whether a peremptory writ of mandamus shall issue, or the petition be dismissed. Some technical questions of procedure and pleading have been argued, but as the case comes up on report, it is unnecessary to consider them. Pillsbury v. Brown, 82 Me. 450, 19 Atl. 858, 9 L. R. A. 94; Elm City Club v. Howes, 92 Me. 211, 42 Atl. 392; Rush v. Buckley, 100 Me. 322, 61 Atl. 774.

The essential facts are these: On October 16, 1889, Laughton & Clergue were promoters of a water company to be incorporated in Old Town. In fact the organization had been partly perfected at that time, but the approval of the certificate of incorporation by the Attorney General was not given until October 24, 1889. October 12, the inhabitants of Old Town, in town meeting assembled, appointed a committee to make a contract with "Laughton & Clergue, or such corporation as Laughton & Clergue may organize, or with any other party or parties, to furnish and supply the town of Old Town with water for proper municipal purposes." October 16th, the committee, acting for the town, entered into a contract with Laughton & Clergue which provided that Laughton & Clergue should organize a corporation, which should accept an assignment of the contract and undertake to carry it out. In the contract the promoters also agreed, among other things, to put in 60 hydrants for the use of the town for fire purposes for a rental named, and to be paid by the town. They also agreed to furnish water for a display fountain, and for certain other public purposes. The fifth paragraph of the contract reads as follows:

"Said first party (the promoters) agrees that the rates for water used in dwelling houses shall not exceed the following: For each dwelling house containing a family of not more than four persons, with one faucet for use within the tenement, five dollars per annum; for each additional person in the family, fifty cents per annum; for the first wash hand basin set, two dollars per annum; for each additional hand basin, one dollar per annum; for one bathing tub, three dollars per annum; for each additional bathing tub, one dollar per annum; for one water-closet, three dollars per annum; for each additional closet, one dollar per annum; for a dwelling house occupied by two or more families, each family to pay three-fourths of the above rate per annum."

Thereupon Laughton & Clergue completed the organization of the corporation known as the Penobscot Water & Power Company, to which they assigned the contract. The corporation accepted the assignment and assumed and agreed to perform "all the duties and obligations by said Laughton & Clergue to be performed according to the terms of said contract." Among the corporate purposes of the Penobscot Water & Power Co. was "the construction of waterworks and laying of pipes in any place or places, and buying, selling, or leasing of water." The corporation built a system of waterworks in Old Town, and entered upon the business of supplying water to the town under its contract, and to the inhabitants for power and for domestic purposes. Annual or flat rates were fixed by the corporation payable semi-annually, in advance, for the supply of water to dwelling houses according to the terms of the Laughton & Clergue contract, and to hotels, boarding houses, and other buildings and places at other and varying amounts.

June 1, 1891, the Penobscot Water & Power Company conveyed all its franchises and other property to the Public Works Company, by which they were conveyed, April 7, 1905, to the defendant corporation. The business of supplying water to the town or city of Old Town has been carried on continuously by these corporations in succession to the present time. And the water system referred to has been the only source of public water supply for the city or its inhabitants during all this time.

About the beginning of the year 1903, the Public Works Company, then owning the plant, revised and changed its schedule of rates, and thereafter charged customers according to the new schedule. For water supplied to dwelling houses containing families the rates were left unchanged, being the same annual amounts provided for in the Laughton & Clergue contract. All other services were metered, and were charged for monthly, according to the amount of water supplied. The charge for water used for power was 11 cents for the first 10,000 cubic feet, 8 cents for the second 10,000 feet and 6 cents per 10,000 feet for all water in excess of 20,000 feet in each month. For all other metered service, including hotels and boarding houses, the charge was 25 cents per 100 feet for the first 2,000 feet, 20 cents per 100 feet for the second 2,000 feet, and 15 cents per 100 feet for all water in excess of 4,000 feet in each month.

The petitioner, an inhabitant of Old Town, owned a house on Main street, which was piped for water, and connected with the water company's mains. The house was occupied from time to time by tenants, who kept boarders. From the outset down to 1904, this house was classed as a dwelling house, and the company charged and the petitioners paid the annual flat rates for dwelling houses, which were named in the Laughton & Clergue contract. In the later years, the tenant's own family consisted of five persons. The number of boarders varied, but was estimated by the company. The company charged and the petitioner paid for 15 persons in the family, boarders and all, $5 semiannually. In 1902 or 1903, a water closet was put into the house for which the petitioner paid at the rate of $5 per annum. Prior to January, 1904, the company complained to the owner of waste of water, through defects in piping and plumbing. It also claimed that the house should properly be classed as a boarding house and pay according to the meter rates established for boarding houses. About the beginning of 1904 the company notified the petitioner of its intention to put in a meter. A meter was put in April 6, 1904. In May following, a bill was rendered to the petitioner for flat rates from January 1, 1904 to April 1, 1904, and for 3,003 feet of water in April, at meter rates for boarding houses. From that time on the petitioner was charged at meter rates. He declined to pay, and on September 10, 1904, the company shut the water off. There was then due, according to its rates, the sum of $23.71 for water from January 1, 1904. Both before and after the water was shut off the petitioner tendered the full amount due according to the flat rates for dwelling houses, and now offers to pay the same. He prays that the company be commanded to restore his service.

Upon these facts, concerning which there is little dispute, the defendant contends that the petitioner is not entitled to mandamus against it, as a matter of law. It says that the petitioner's rights, if any, rest in contract, and, so far as alleged in the petition, in the Laughton & Clergue contract, that the contract was made by the town, and that the petitioner was not a party to it, or in any privity with the parties, and that mandamus will not lie to enforce contractual duties in any event. Furthermore, it is argued that the defendant is not bound by the Laughton & Clergue contract. We will consider the last proposition first.

It is not necessary to inquire when and how far and in what manner a corporation is bound by the engagements entered into by its promoters. It is at least settled that if the corporation adopts such a contract expressly or impliedly, and obtains its benefits, it must take it with its obligations and burdens, cum onere. It must do what the promoters agreed to do. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. 241; 10 Cyc. 262; note to Pittsburg Mining Co. v. Spooner, 17 Am. St. Rep. 161. In this case, the Penobscot Water & Power Company took an assignment of the Laughton & Clergue contract and its benefits and expressly assumed its obligations. That contract limited the rates for water supplied to dwelling houses containing families. The corporation became bound by that limitation. While a town is not an agent of the individual citizens, and authorized to make contracts binding upon them personally, we have no hesitation in saying that when a person or corporation as a consideration, or even as a mere inducement, for the making of a hydrant contract with a town for fire purposes, engages to supply water for the inhabitants at rates not exceeding certain specified sums, and so obtains the contract and its benefits, the contractor is under obligations to fulfill the agreement as to service and rates to individual water takers. And the rights of the Penobscot Water & Power Company, with the corresponding duties and obligations, have come to the defendant.

It is true that mandamus is not the proper remedy for the enforcement of mere contractual duties. It does not lie to enforce rights of a private or personal character, or obligations resting entirely upon contract, and not involving any question of trust or official duty, or growing out of public relations. 2 Spelling on Extraordinary Relief, § 1379. But that is not the situation in this case. The defendant is a public service corporation. By undertaking a public service, namely that of furnishing a supply of water for the public, it comes under obligations to the public, not only to the public as a whole, but to the public as individuals, and that independent of its contract duties. It must serve impartially, or on equal terms and at reasonable rates, all who apply for service. Indeed, from the existence of such a public duty, the law will imply a contract, if necessary, with each of the inhabitants served. McEntee v. Kingston Water Co., 165 N. Y. 27, 58 N. E. 785. It is the duty of the defendant as a public service corporation to supply water to this petitioner at reasonable rates, fairly, and without discrimination. Kennebec Water District v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 54 Atl. 6, 60 L. R. A. 856. The duty is a public one which does not depend on the Laughton & Clergue contract, although that limits the maximum rate in some instances, but it arises from the character of the service it undertakes to perform. Because a duty of this kind is public, each owner of a building which may be served is entitled to have the water served to him. That is his particular, personal right, and is independent of the rights that others or the general public may have. He does not hold that particular right in common with the public. Mandamus lies to enforce the performance of public duties. It does not lie at the suit of an individual for the enforcement of those rights which he holds in common with the public at large, but it does lie when his personal and particular rights have been invaded beyond those that he enjoys as a part of the public, and that are common to everyone. Sangerville v. County Commissioners, 25 Me. 291; Baker v. Johnson, 41 Me. 15; Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 538, 18 Atl. 325; Knight v. Thomas, 93 Me. 494, 45 Atl. 499. The petitioner therefore may prosecute the writ.

It is not questioned but that a public service corporation may adopt reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of its business, to which the individual water takers must conform, that it may require payment for a reasonable time in advance, or that it may cut off water from a customer who refuses or neglects to pay reasonable rates. Wood v. Auburn, 87 Me. 287, 32 Atl. 906, 29 L. R. A. 376. And we think there can be no question of the right of such a corporation to revise and change its schedule of rates, if no contract prevents, provided that the new rates are reasonable, and do not discriminate. Within these limitations, it may change from an annual or flat rate to a meter rate. In fact, a reasonable meter rate seems the more equitable and just. We have recently discussed what are reasonable rates in Kennebec Water District v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 54 Atl. 6, 60 L. R. A. 856, and Brunswick & Topsham Water District v. Maine Water Co., 99 Me. 371, 59 Atl. 537, and this case calls for no further discussion. Nor do we think there can be any doubt that in case of unnecessary waste the company may apply a meter, and charge reasonable meter rates. Again, while it may be lawful to classify water takers, not arbitrarily, but upon reasonable grounds, as for instance as between boarding houses and private dwelling houses, and while it may be true in instances that a charge to small customers is not necessarily unreasonable, because in excess of what a large customer would have to pay for the same amount of water, still, as bearing upon the question of discrimination, it must be true that the quantity of water used and the cost of the individual service are the principal elements for consideration in fixing the charges as between individual water takers or classes of takers. And it has been held that a public service company cannot make a difference in price according to the use made by the customer, nor is a discrimination proper based on the value of the service to the customer. Baily v. Gas-Fuel Co., 193 Pa. 175, 44 Atl. 251; Richmond Nat. Gas. Co. v. Clawson, 155 Ind. 659, 58 N. E. 1049, 51 L. R. A. 744. And, of course, the water company had the right to establish reasonable rates for service to all customers not provided for in the Laughton & Clergue contract.

An application of these principles will eliminate from further consideration all essential questions except two, and these are questions of fact. The petitioner bases his claim upon the dwelling house clause in the Laughton & Clergue contract. He says that his house was a "dwelling house containing a family," within the meaning of that contract, and therefore that the maximum charge for a family of 15, exclusive of the water-closet, was $10 a year, and further that the family in the house did not exceed 15 in number. All his tenders and his offer in the petition to pay are limited upon that theory. And if it were otherwise, the record does not disclose sufficient data to enable the court to pass upon the reasonableness of the meter rates themselves. The defendant on the other hand claims that the building is not a dwelling house within the meaning of the contract, but is a boarding house, and further that its predecessor was justified in putting in a meter, by reason of the unreasonable waste of water.

The decisive question, and the only one we need to consider, is whether the petitioner's building was a "dwelling house containing a family," as specified in the original contract, or was a boarding house. It is urged in the first place that the company itself has so classified it for quite a long period of years, and that, in consequence, its status is now fixed beyond the power of the company to change. The construction which the parties by their acts place upon a contract frequently is, in cases of doubt, of great value in determining what the contract meant. And when, by long-continued usage, they have given a practical construction to it, it may be beyond the power of one party to change it. West Hartford v. Water Commissioners of Hartford, 68 Conn. 323, 36 Atl. 786. But if it were to be assumed that such a usage should control, it ought to be a usage which has been practically fixed and unvarying. The case shows that all three of the tenants who have occupied the house since the petitioner bought it have kept boarders, but to what extent and under what conditions the two earlier tenants kept them does not appear. And as we shall hereafter see, the mere fact that boarders are kept in a house is not necessarily inconsistent with the claim that it is a "dwelling house containing a family." Moreover, the house was first classified at a time earlier than the petitioner's ownership, and the record shows nothing in regard to the nature of the occupancy at that time, except that boarders were kept. This ground therefore is not tenable, and we must inquire further.

The building itself seems to have been built originally for family use. But it had been used by tenants for keeping boarders, and was being so used when the meter was put on. The tenant, his wife, and three sons lived there. The number of boarders was as low as 3 at times, and at others as high as 10, and perhaps more. The boarders were not transients. They stayed more or less permanently. The term "dwelling house" does not always have the same sense in all cases. It may mean one thing under an indictment for burglary or arson, and another under a homestead law, and another under a pauper law, and another under a contract or devise. A boarding house certainly is a dwelling house. So is a hotel; or a jail (People v. Van Blaricum, 2 Johns. 105); or a single room (People v. Horrigan, 68 Mich. 491, 36 N. W. 236).

But the Laughton & Clergue contract limited the meaning which might be given to the term "dwelling house." The phrase there is "dwelling house containing a family." The word "family" is also of flexible meaning. The meaning varies as the question arises under homestead laws, or exemption laws, or pauper laws, or under insurance policies or wills, or other conditions. Its primary meaning is a collection of persons who live in one house and under one head or management. Dodge v. Boston & Prov. Railroad, 154 Mass. 299, 28 N. E. 243, 13 L. R. A. 318. In that sense it has frequently been defined as synonymous with "household." Webster gives the primary meaning as "persons collectively who live together in a house or under one head or manager; a household, including parents, children, and servants, and, as the case may be, lodgers or boarders." This definition is sometimes quoted in the cases, but we have found no cases sustaining the definition as to boarders in which the matter of boarders was in issue or decided, except two, and they were decided on grounds not involved here. Oystead v. Shed, 13 Mass. 520, 7 Am. Dec. 172; Race v. Oldridge, 90 Ill. 250, 32 Am. Rep. 27. To constitute the family relation between persons so living together it must be of a permanent and domestic character, and not of those abiding together temporarily as strangers. Tyson v. Reynolds, 52 Iowa, 431, 3 N. W. 469. They must be living in one domestic establishment. Pearson v. Miller (Miss.) 14 South. 731, 42 Am. St. Rep. 470. Family means all whose domicile or home is ordinarily in the same house and under the same management or head. Cheshire v. Burlington, 81 Conn. 326. It is all the individuals who live together under the control of another, including the servants. Poor v. Hudson Ins. Co. (C. C.) 2 Fed. 452. It embraces a household composed of parents or children, or other relatives, or domestics; in short, every collective body of persons living together within one curtilage, subsisting in common and directing their attention to a common object, the promotion of their mutual interests and social happiness. Wilson v. Cochran, 98 Am. Dec. 553. It may mean the husband and wife, having no children, or it may mean children, or wife and children, or any group constituting a distinct domestic or social body. Grand Lodge v. McKinstry, 67 Mo. App. 82. Lord Kenyon said: "In common parlance, the family consists of those who live under the same roof with the pater familias; those who form (if I may use the expression) his fireside." The King v. Darlington, 4 Term Rep. 800. The relation is one of social status, not of mere contract, and usually is held to include a legal or moral obligation on the head of the family to support the other members, and a corresponding state of dependence on the part of the other members for their support. 3 Words & Phrases, 2673, and cases cited.

If the foregoing definitions gathered from the cases give a correct view of the various phases of a family relationship as applicable to this case, from the judicial point of view, as we think they do, it is clear that boarders do not constitute the family or a part of it. A family living together in a house as a home is none the less a family, because incidentally there are boarders in the same house, and perchance eating at the same table. But a boarding house is none the less a boarding house, when used as such, because the boarding house keeper and his wife and children live in it while the business of keeping a boarding house is being carried on. The Laughton & Clergue contract limited the rates for "a dwelling house containing a family" to annual flat rates for specified amounts. It contemplated as we think a dwelling house containing a family living together in domestic and social relations in the house as a home, and not a place of carrying on the business of keeping boarders. The test is whether the petitioner's tenant occupied the house as a home for himself and his wife and children, and incidentally kept boarders also, or whether he occupied it as a place for carrying on the business of keeping boarders, although while prosecuting the business, and as a means of prosecuting the business, he and his wife and children live in the house also. Under this test, neither the size of the house, nor the number of the boarders are of importance, except as evidence that may have weight in determining which is the principal use for which the building is occupied.

Applying the test to the evidence in this case, we are satisfied that the petitioner's house should be classed as a boarding house, and that it is not within the limitation for dwelling houses in the Laughton & Clergue contract. The tenant used the house for carrying on the business of keeping boarders, and his living there was incidental to that. That was his business, and his only business of any consequence, as he testified.

Accordingly the petitioner's claim is not sustained, and his petition must be dismissed. But we decide nothing more. The petition is not framed to raise the question whether the rates charged to the petitioner for the house as a boarding house are excessive or not. Neither, as we have already said, is there sufficient evidence upon which to answer such a question. Nor do we say that the rates which the defendant demands are or are not unjust by reason of unlawful discrimination in the classification made by it, and in the charges made to the several classes, nor that the defendant has or has not the right to demand as much of the petitioner as it does, for the unpaid water service. When a customer charges 25 cents a hundred feet to one customer for one use, and only 11 cents for 10,000 feet to another customer for another use, if the water be supplied from the same source, by the same system, in the same pipes, there is an apparent discrimination, but whether it is real or not cannot now be said. See Baily v. Fayette Gas Fuel Co., and Richmond Nat. Gas. Co. v. Clawson, supra. Petition dismissed.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. RAILROADS — STATION PURPOSES — WHAT CONSTITUTE.

The land and right of way of railroad corporations, used for "station purposes," within the meaning of section 20, c. 18, Rev. St. 1883, or section 31, c. 23, Rev. St. 1903, must be determined from the existing conditions in each case.

2. SAME.

The statutory designation "for station purposes" includes such grounds at a station as are convenient, necessary, and actually used by the railroad for approaches and exits for the public requiring passenger and freight transportation, for the location of depot buildings, warehouses, platforms, fixtures, and apparatus for taking water and fuel supplies, lighting, heating, transmitting messages and giving signals, sidings for passing trains and shifting and storing cars and other property, switches, and space where passengers may get on and off trains and goods be loaded and unloaded.

3. SAME—QUESTION OF FACT.

When the facts are clear from undisputed evidence, the question whether the place of a proposed crossing of a railroad by a town way or highway is land or right of way used for station purposes may be one of law, but it must generally be considered one of fact.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

At the hearing in the Supreme Judicial Court on the appeal from the decision of the railroad commissioners, evidence somewhat voluminous and conflicting was presented, and the presiding justice refused to rule as matter of law that the locus in quo was land and right of way of the railroad corporation used for station purposes, and found otherwise upon the evidence as matter of fact. Heid, that his ruling was correct, and that his finding of facts could not be disturbed.

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Androscoggin County.

Appeal by the Atlantic & St. Lawrence Railroad Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada from the decree of the railroad commissioners determining that a certain public highway within the city of Auburn, Androscoggin county, located by the county commissioners of said county over the land and right of way of the appellants, should cross the railroad track of the appellants by an underpass, and apportioning the expense of the construction and maintenance of the crossing.

At the hearing in the appellate court the appellants requested the presiding justice to rule as a matter of law that, upon the facts presented by the evidence, the decree of the railroad commissioners must be set aside, and the appeal sustained. This ruling was refused, but, instead thereof, the presiding justice ruled that the aforesaid decree be affirmed, with costs, and the appeal be dismissed. To this ruling and refusal to rule the appellants excepted. Exceptions overruled.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

C. A. & L. L. Hight, for appellants. Newell & Skelton, for appellees.

PEABODY, J. The proceedings in this case originated November 20, 1900, in the petition of various citizens of the city of Auburn, in the county of Androscoggin, to the county commissioners, asking for the location of a public highway within the city of Auburn over the land and right of way of the Atlantic & St. Lawrence Railroad Company, leased to the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The county commissioners, after notice and hearing, on the 2d day of April, 1901, filed with the clerk of the county commissioners their report for the location of the highway.

On the 23d day of March, 1903, the municipal officers of the city of Auburn petitioned the board of railroad commissioners to determine the manner and conditions of crossing the railway with said highway, and apportion the expense of the crossing. Upon this petition as amended June 13, 1904, after notice and hearing, the railroad commissioners, on the 16th day of August, 1904, made a decree determining that said highway should cross the track by an underpass, and apportioning the expense of construction and maintenance of the crossing. An appeal from this decree was duly taken and entered in the Supreme Judicial Court for the county of Androscoggin at the January term, A. D. 1905.

At the hearing on the appeal, evidence was introduced showing the location of the intersecting tracks of the Maine Central Railroad and of the Grand Trunk Railway at Danville Junction, and of the buildings, signal houses, freighthouses, passenger depots, standpipes for water, carhouse, and pump-house; that the proposed crossing over the land and tracks of the railroad company was north of the depot, and from 50 to 75 feet north of the northerly switch of the longest siding, and 1,340 feet north of the center of the old county highway immediately south of the station, and 823 feet north of the northerly end of the station platform; and showing other conditions existing at and in the vicinity of the station and proposed crossing at the time of the location of the highway in 1901, and subsequently thereto, materially bearing upon the question at issue. The evidence also showed the transfer of freight between the two railroads; that the greater part of the freight transfer business was done south of the old county highway, near the junction of the two railroads; that the cars going west, delivered to the Grand Trunk Railway by the Maine Central Railroad, were sometimes placed on the westerly siding north of the county highway; that in handling these cars, and making them into trains, it was frequently necessary to pass over the switch 50 to 75 feet south of the proposed crossing, and to move them back and forth over the place of the proposed crossing, and for the trainmen, in making up trains and in shunting cars on and off the sidings, to work at the place where the crossing is located; that the long siding, which runs up to within 50 or 75 feet of the proposed crossing, was used principally in 1901 as a passing track for trains; that at the crossing, and for some distance south, is a fill from 20 to 23 feet in depth, making it unsuitable for the public to go there, either for the loading or unloading of freight, or in connection with the passenger service; that on the main line and on the passing track trains were at times obliged to stop for water at the station, and at times freight trains going east, stopping for water, extended over the point of the proposed crossing; that on the westerly side of the track was the pumphouse for the supply of water for the trains and the depot, since moved to a point north of the crossing on the main line; that it was and is now necessary for coal cars to be hauled upon the main line opposite the pumphouse, and that the coal therefor was unloaded from the main line; that in 1901 the most westerly track was used for the storage of cars; that shunting was sometimes done on the track next to the main line, but this track was principally used as a passing track; and that in 1902 the track next to the main line was extended north, and has since continued to be used as a passing track.

It was claimed by the appellants that upon the case presented by the evidence the proposed crossing was, as a matter of law, through land or right of way of the railroad corporation used for station purposes; that there had been no adjudication by the railroad commissioners, as required by statute, on the question of public convenience and necessity for said crossing or way; and that, therefore, the laying out of said way by the county commissioners was illegal and void, and there was no legal foundation for the petition to the railroad commissioners to make the decree. They requested the court to rule, as matter of law upon the facts presented by the evidence, that the decree of the railroad commissioners must be set aside, and the appeal sustained. This ruling the court refused to make, and, instead thereof, ruled that the decree of the railroad commissioners should be affirmed, with costs, and that the appeal should be dismissed, to which ruling and refusal to rule the appellants excepted, and upon their exceptions the case comes before the law court.

The real question involved in the exceptions is whether the land and right of way of the railroad corporation at the point of the proposed crossing are land and right of way of a railroad corporation used for station purposes, within the meaning of section 29, c. 18, Rev. St. 1883, or section 31, c. 23, Rev. St. 1903. This statute is as follows:

"Sec. 31. No way shall be laid out through or across any land or right of way of any railroad corporation, used for station purposes, unless after notice and hearing the railroad commissioners adjudge that public convenience and necessity require it. When the tribunal having jurisdiction over the laying out of such way is satisfied, after hearing, that public convenience and necessity require such laying out, such proceedings shall be suspended and petition filed by such tribunal with the railroad commissioners for their adjudication hereunder." This provision originated in section 1, c. 167, p. 134, of the Laws of 1883.

A railroad exercises its franchise in the prosecution of its transportation business, subject to the rights of the public to extend highways over its right of way. Chicago & Alton R. R. v. City of Pontiac, 169 Ill. 155, 48 N. E. 485. In this state its tracks may be crossed by ways laid out in the same manner as other ways, but the manner, condition, and expense of the crossing are placed by statute under the jurisdiction of the railroad commissioners; and when the proposed location is over or across the right of way or land of any railroad corporation before it is finally established, there must be an adjudication by this tribunal that public convenience and necessity require it; the object being both to guard against the recognized dangers of railroad crossings, and to secure the rights of the public when its convenience conflicts with the convenience of the railroad.

It is claimed by the appellants that the term "right of way" in the statute quoted is significant, as implying a more extended use than that of land acquired for station purposes; but we think this construction would logically lead to a harmful limitation of the authority conferred by statute upon municipal officers and county commissioners for laying out townways and highways. The intention of the Legislature in employing both these words was simply to embrace all the property of the railroad constituting station grounds affected by the location of the way.

The legislative intent in the language "land or right of way of any railroad corporation used for station purposes" has not been judicially determined in this state. In the United States the words "depot" and "station," as used in connection with railroads, are synonymous. Goyeau v. Great Western R. Co., 25 Grant's Ch. U. C. 64. The term "station purposes" does not admit of any precise definition. Similar terms have been used in the statutes of other states, relating to railroads, and we may be aided in ascertaining the meaning of the words quoted in this case by analogous decisions. In the western and middle states, where railroads have been required by statute to maintain fences on each side of their right of way to keep cattle therefrom, to diminish the hazard to passengers and loss to cattle owners, depot grounds have been either expressly excepted from this requirement, or the courts, in construing the statutes, have determined that fencing out depot grounds was not required where the public was entitled to free access. Jefferson, Madison & Ind. Railroad Co. v. Beatty, 36 Ind. 15; Evansville & Terre Haute Railroad Co. v. Willis, 83 Ind. 507; Morris v. St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern Railway Co., 58 Mo. 78; Grosse v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co., 91 Wis. 482, 65 N. W. 185.

In Davis v. Burlington & Mo. River Railroad Co., 26 Iowa, 549, under a statute exempting railroads from the duty of fencing in places where the public require access, the term "depot grounds" was applied to a tract of five or six acres extending along either side of the roadway, used for "loading and unloading freight and all purposes incident to the station, including switches and side tracks, elevators and warehouses." In Smith v. C., M. & St. P. Railway Co., 60 Iowa, 512, 15 N. W. 303, it was held that a place a mile and a quarter from the depot buildings is not presumed to be station grounds, in the absence of proof showing it to be such. In Wisconsin in this class of cases the courts have given as a definition of "depot grounds" "the place where passengers get on and off trains, and where goods are loaded and unloaded, and all grounds necessary and convenient and actually used for such purposes by the public and by the railroad company. This includes switching and making up of trains, and the use of side tracks for the storing of cars, and the place where the public requires open and free access to the road for the purposes of such business." Grosse v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co., supra.

In Massachusetts the court, by Judge Holmes, under a statute providing for the taxing of land of railroad companies taken for station purposes, held that all the land described as land "for suitable station purposes, and for tracks and yard room to be used in connection therewith," was included in the term "station purposes," and should be taxed. Norwich v. Worcester R. R. Co., 151 Mass. 69, 23 N. E. 721.

The definitions of "station grounds" in these decisions may be, in their particular application, narrower than should be given to the language "the right of way and land used for station purposes" under our statute; but the reasoning upon which the decisions are based is relevant to the question under consideration. Station grounds or depot grounds at convenient points along the lines of railroads are selected, embracing, not only the land of the right of way, but additional land of such extent as existing and prospective conditions seem to require; but it cannot be considered that the land originally appropriated should be arbitrarily held to limit railroads or the public in the application of statutory provisions. In every case, in determining what are station grounds and depot grounds, three conditions must concur: The grounds must be necessary, convenient, and actually used by the railroads in the transaction of their business. They therefore include sufficient land for safe and convenient approaches and exits for the public requiring passenger and freight transportation, for the location of depot buildings, warehouses, platforms, fixtures, and apparatus for taking water and fuel supplies, lighting, heating, transmission of messages and giving signals, sidings for passing trains, shifting and storing cars and other property, switches, and space where passengers may get on and off trains and goods be loaded and unloaded. An important factor in determining what land may be necessary and convenient for station purposes is the amount and character of the railroad business done at a particular station. McGrath v. Detroit, Mack. & Marq. R. R. Co., 57 Mich. 555, 24 N. W. 854. Within narrow limits, where the facts are clear upon undisputed evidence, this question is properly one of law, but ordinarily it must be considered one of fact. Grosse v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co., supra; Plunkett v. Minn., St. Marie & At. Railway Co., 79 Wis. 222, 48 N. W. 519; Rhines v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co., 75 Iowa, 597, 39 N. W. 912. It is apparent from the authorities cited that in this case it is one of fact and not of law. The appellate court has rendered a decision based upon the evidence. It is a familiar and well-settled rule that this court cannot disturb the findings of the presiding justice upon what might apparently be a preponderance of the evidence. A careful review of the testimony contained in the report fails to show that the findings of the appellate court are erroneous, and the rulings based thereon are clearly correct.

Exceptions overruled.

MCCLAINE v. CARIBOU NAT. BANK.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 8, 1905.)

1. NEGLIGENCE — DANGEROUS PREMISES — DUTY OWED TO LICENSEE.

The defendant bank had partially constructed and built a certain walk, about 8 feet wide, on the south side of its bank building and on its own premises. Said walk fronted on and adjoined a certain public street south of said bank building. In this walk, about 17 feet from the east end of the same, was a rollway to the cellar of the bank building, about 12 feet long, 5 feet wide, and 5 or 6 feet deep. The rollway itself was uncovered, and without protection of any kind. But in the space on the walk, both east and west of the rollway, there were piled various obstructions, such as bricks, barrels, lumber, carpenters' horses, and other debris. These obstructions practically prevented entrance upon the walk from either end. The plaintiff in the nighttime, while going to a fire, fell into this rollway and was injured, and thereupon she brought suit to recover damages for the injuries sustained.

Held, that these various obstructions and unfinished condition of the walk were a plain indication to the plaintiff and the public generally that this walk was not opened for travel, and negatived any implied invitation on the part of the defendant bank for travelers to enter upon it, and that the plaintiff in going upon it was, at most, but a mere licensee, to whom the defendant bank owed no duty, except not to wantonly injure her.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, §§ 42, 54.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Also held, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Action by Carrie McClain against the Caribou National Bank.

Action on the case to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, and caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant. Plea, the general issue. Verdict for plaintiff for $2,500. Defendant filed a general motion for a new trial, and also excepted to certain rulings made by the presiding justice. Sustained.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, and PEABODY, JJ.

Ira G. Horsey and Geo. H. Smith, for plaintiff. Louis C. Stearns and Wm. P. Allen, for defendant.

STROUT, J. In 1903 defendant erected a building in Caribou, on the corner of Washburn avenue and Vaughan avenue. October 24, 1903, the walls were up and roofed in, but the structure was not ready for occupation. It was the plan to have on three sides of the building a concrete walk about 8 feet wide. On the east side, on Vaughan avenue, the walk had been completed, and also on the north side; but on the south side, facing Washburn avenue, a curb had been put in upon defendant's land adjoining the avenue, and dirt filled in between that and the building, up to within about 4 inches of the top of the curbing—that space being left for the concrete, that was to be filled in later. About 17 feet from the southeast corner of the building, on Washburn avenue, in this walk, was a rollway to the cellar of the building, about 12 feet long, 5 feet wide, and 5 or 6 feet deep.

On the night of October 24th, or early morning of the 25th, plaintiff, while going to a fire, fell into this rollway, which was uncovered and without protection of any kind, and was injured, and this suit is to recover damages for that injury. Plaintiff had a verdict, and the case is here upon motion to set the verdict aside and on exceptions.

The walk on Washburn avenue was not only in the unfinished condition above stated, but at the southeast corner, next to Vaughan avenue, 300 or 400 bricks were piled upon it next to the building; on the curb was a pile of lumber about two feet high, in two tiers, and between them some barrels, which left only a space of about two feet to pass from Vaughan avenue onto the walk. The lumber was some 20 feet long, and extended to the rollway, but did not cover it. At the westerly end of the walk there were a large number of barrels and carpenters' horses and other debris, which nearly or quite prevented access to the walk at that end. These obstructions practically prevented entrance upon the walk from Vaughan avenue or at the other end. They were a plain indication to the public that the walk on Washburn avenue was not opened for travel, and negatived any implied invitation of defendant for travelers to enter upon it. In going upon it that night, the plaintiff, while perhaps not a trespasser, was at most a mere licensee, to whom the defendant owed no duty, except not to wantonly injure her. The principles announced by this court in Dixon v. Swift, 98 Me. 207, 56 Atl. 761; and Parker v. Portland Publishing Co., 69 Me. 176, 81 Am. Rep. 262, apply to this case.

Upon the question of due care of plaintiff, it is difficult to perceive its exercise by her. She says it was dark, and she did not see the rollway, but diagonally across Washburn avenue, and within the distance of less than 300 feet, the Lyndon Hotel was on fire, the flames coming from the roof, and in the opposite direction, and 147 feet distant, a street electric light was burning, which it would seem must have given sufficient light to any attentive person to see the rollway. Several witnesses say they could see without difficulty. It is probable that the plaintiff was under excitement from the fire, and her eyes and attention were upon the burning building, and no heed taken of her steps. Apparently she could not have entered upon the walk from Vaughan avenue, but from Washburn avenue, between the terminal of the walk, and not in the line of travel proposed when the walk was completed; perhaps to obtain a better view of the fire, or be away from passers upon the street and the operations of the fire department, rather than to travel upon the walk.

Upon the two grounds—that the defendant had not thrown open that walk to the public, and thereby impliedly invited the public to use it, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence—this verdict ought not to stand.

Motion sustained.

Verdict set aside.

GREENLAW v. MILLIKEN.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 8, 1905.)

1. NEGLIGENCE — ICY SIDEWALK — SURFACE WATER—LIABILITY OF ABUTTING OWNER.

The plaintiff slipped upon the ice on the sidewalk in front of the defendant's house and sustained an injury. Thereupon the plaintiff brought suit against the defendant, alleging that the defendant wrongfully conducted water from the roof of a part of her house upon the sidewalk, which froze and rendered the sidewalk dangerous. Held, that to entitle the plaintiff to recover it was necessary for her to show that the icy condition of the sidewalk resulted from water artificially conducted upon the sidewalk, and not from surface water naturally flowing upon the sidewalk, or from melting snow which had fallen upon the sidewalk; and this the evidence fails to show.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 1627, 1628.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Also, held, that the plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care.

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Cumberland County.

Action by Emma S. Greenlaw against Mary W. Milliken. Verdict for plaintiff, and defendant moves for a new trial and excepts. Motion for new trial sustained.

Action on the case to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff January 25, 1904, caused by the alleged carelessness of the defendant in having water improperly drawn off and conducted from the roof of her house or bay window on said house and discharged upon the sidewalk in front of said house, and which froze and rendered the sidewalk dangerous, and upon which the plaintiff slipped and was injured. Tried at the April term, 1905, Supreme Judicial Court, Cumberland county. Plea, the general issue. Verdict for plaintiff for $1,250. Defendant filed a general motion for a new trial, and also excepted to certain rulings made by the presiding justice.

Memorandum. This cause was argued at the June term, 1905, of the law court at Portland. One of the justices sitting at said term did not sit during the hearing upon this cause, being disqualified by reason of having ruled therein at nisi prius. See Rev. St. 1903, c. 79, § 42.

Argued before STROUT, SAVAGE, PEA-BODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

William A. Connellan, for plaintiff. Symonds, Snow, Cook & Hutchinson, for defendant.

STROUT, J. On January 25, 1904, plaintiff slipped upon the ice on the sidewalk in front of the northeasterly corner of defendant's house on State street, in Portland, and fell and received injury. She claims that the defendant wrongfully conducted water upon the sidewalk, which froze and rendered the walk dangerous. Hence this suit. Plaintiff had a verdict, and the case is here on exceptions and motion to set aside the verdict.

Defendant's house is on the southerly side of the street, the front facing the northeast. The ground has a rise from the sidewalk to the rear line of the house of three feet and one-half inch, and the flow of surface water from defendant's premises is toward the sidewalk and street. The water from the roof of the main house is conducted into the sewer, and does not reach the sidewalk. The house has a bay window, $4\frac{4}{10}$ feet one way and $12\frac{6}{10}$ feet the other way. The roof of the bay window pitches each way; half the drainage going south and half north. At either end of the bay window roof is a conductor, with a one-inch opening. It is the only northerly half of the bay window roof that by any possibility could discharge water to reach the sidewalk at the place of injury.

From the front of the bay window to the granite curbing next to the sidewalk is 7 feet and 7 inches. On the north end of the house a driveway led from the street to the stable in the rear. From the stable to the street the ground descended. The water from the northerly end of the bay window was conducted through an elbow or offset from the bay window to a perpendicular conductor, which terminated in a wooden spout, having its outlet on the private walk from the sidewalk to the north end of the house to its rear. This elbow or set-off in the fall of 1903 had rusted out at the bottom, so that the water fell upon the grass plot at the side of the house, and would not flow into the conductor. This condition remained till October, 1904, and was in that condition at the time of the accident. The observer at the Weather Bureau testified that from January 15, 1904, to the 26th there were only two days, the 16th and the 24th, when the maximum temperature rose above 32 degrees. Those days were the 16th, when the maximum was 33 degrees, and the 24th, when it reached 36 degrees, and the day was cloudy. During all this time, including the 25th, the total precipitation was $\frac{19}{100}$ of an inch. There was about one foot of snow on the ground. The sidewalk in front of the house was icy, as was also most of the sidewalks having a northerly exposure. Defendant's house was unoccupied at the time of the accident, and had been for the entire winter, and no fire had been in it. If the ice upon the walk was the result of surface water naturally flowing from the higher ground westerly, the defendant would not be liable. To entitle plaintiff to a verdict it was necessary for her to show that the icy condition resulted from water artificially conducted to the walk, and not from surface water naturally flowing there, or from melting snow which had fallen there. We think the evidence failed to show this. It seems incredible that the small surface of one-half of the roof of that bay window could hold and discharge sufficient water that fell through the opening in the rusted-out arm or set-off upon the snow to permeate through one foot of snow to the curbing, and then through, under, or over that to the sidewalk to produce the icy condition. It is much more probable that water flowed down the driveway, not conducted from the bay window, and thus produced the icy condition.

The jury apparently drew an inference not warranted by the evidence. It is also quite apparent that the plaintiff was not in ^{care}.

Motion sustained.

Verdict set aside.

MOBILE COTTON MILLS v. SMYRNA SHIRT & HOSIERY CO.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Kent. Nov. 3, 1905.)

PLEADING—JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS—AFFIDAVIT OF DEFENSE—SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit of defense to an action by a foreign corporation, which alleges that it cannot recover because it has not complied with the laws of Delaware in regard to foreign corporations doing business therein, is insufficient, as against a motion for judgment, for failing to set forth in what respect the corporation has failed to comply with the statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 19.]

Action by the Mobile Cotton Mills against the Smyrna Shirt & Hosiery Company. On motion for judgment notwithstanding the affidavit of defense. Granted.

The following affidavit of defense was filed, viz.:

"State of Delaware, Kent County—ss.: Be it remembered that on this twenty-sixth day of October, A. D. 1905, before me, Walter Pardoe, prothonotary of the Superior Court of the state of Delaware in and for Kent county, personally comes Charles B. Prettyman, treasurer of Smyrna Shirt & Hosiery Company, the defendant in the above-stated suit, who, having been by me duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say that he is the treasurer of the defendant in the above-stated suit; that he verily believes that there is a legal defense to the whole of the cause of action in the above-stated suit, the nature and character whereof are as follows, viz.: That the defendant corporation has a just and true set-off to a part of the cause of action, and as to the whole of the said cause of action, that the plaintiff corporation has no legal right to recover thereon, because it has not complied with the provisions of the statutes of the state of Delaware in regard to foreign corporations doing business in said state of Delaware." The above affidavit was signed by Charles B. Prettyman, treasurer of the Smyrna Shirt & Hosiery Company, with the jurat of the said prothonotary and his seal of office attached.

Plaintiff asked for judgment notwithstanding the said affidavit of defense, for the following reasons: First. Because the affidavit contained no allegation that the plaintiff was a foreign corporation doing business in the state of Delaware. Second. That there was no allegation in said affidavit that the particular transaction referred to was a business transaction which took place in the state of Delaware. Third. Because the affidavit stated a conclusion of law; there being no allegation setting forth in what respect the plaintiff has failed to comply with the statutes of the state of Delaware.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Henry Ridge'v. Jr. for plaintiff. George M. Jones, for defendant.

LORE, C. J. We think, on the point that the affidavit fails to state in what respect the corporation plaintiff has not complied with the statutes of the state of Delaware, that judgment should be given notwithstanding the affidavit of defense.

STATE v. BELL.

(Court of Oyer and Terminer of Delaware.
New Castle. Dec. 9, 1904.)

1. HOMICIDE—MURDER—MALICE.

Malice is an essential ingredient of the crime of murder of both degrees.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 15-18.]

2. SAME—MALICE—PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in a prosecution for murder, it appeared that the fatal act was done deliberately or without adequate cause, malice is presumed and the burden is on the accused to prove that it was done without malice.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 18, 265, 266, 271.]

3. SAME—FIRST-DEGREE MURDER—DEFINITION.

Murder in the first degree is where the killing is done with express malice aforethought, or in perpetrating or in attempting to perpetrate a crime punishable with death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 30-33.]

4. SAME—EXPRESS MALICE.

Express malice aforethought, as an element of murder, is where one kills another with a sedate, deliberate mind and formed design, manifested by lying in wait for deceased, or by antecedent menaces or threats, or any other circumstances disclosing a malevolent intention of the accused toward his victim at the time when the crime was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 16, 17.]

5. SAME—SECOND-DEGREE MURDER.

Murder in the second degree is where the killing is done without a deliberate formed design to take life or perpetrate a crime punishable with death, but without justification, excuse, or provocation sufficient to reduce the offense to manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 39, 40.]

6. SAME—MANSLAUGHTER.

Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of an individual without malice.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 52.]

7. ASSAULT AND BATTERY—JUSTIFICATION—LOOKS—GESTURES—WORDS.

No looks or gestures, however insulting, or words, however opprobrious or offensive, will constitute sufficient provocation to excuse a slight assault.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Assault and Battery, § 95; vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 69.]

8. HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE.

A slight assault is insufficient to excuse the killing of the assailant with a deadly weapon or to reduce the offense from murder to manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 68.]

9. ELECTIONS—OFFICERS—BALLOT BOXES—DUTY TO GUARD.

It is the duty of election officers to safely keep the ballot boxes, and to repel any attempt to capture them with such force as may be necessary for the purpose.

10. HOMICIDE—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the indictment alleged that the prisoner held the pistol in his right hand when he fired the fatal shot, proof that he held the pistol in his left hand did not constitute a material variance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 256.]

11. SAME—KILLING THIRD PERSON.

Where defendant shot at an election officer with intent to kill him or do him great bodily harm, and the bullet hit and killed another whom defendant did not intend to injure, the crime was the same as if defendant had killed the officer shot at.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 23.]

12. SAME—PROMISCUOUS SHOOTING.

If, without aiming at any particular person, defendant unlawfully shot into a room where there were several persons, and one of them was killed, defendant was guilty of murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances, regardless of his intention toward the person slain.

13. CRIMINAL LAW—REASONABLE DOUBT.

A reasonable doubt entitling an accused to an acquittal is not a mere fanciful, vague, or speculative doubt, but a reasonable, substantial doubt, remaining in the minds of the jury after a careful consideration of all the evidence, and such a doubt as reasonable, fair-minded, and conscientious men would entertain under all the circumstances of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1906-1922.]

John Bell was indicted for the murder of one Harvey Miller. Verdict of not guilty.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and SPRUANCE and GRUBB, JJ.

Herbert H. Ward, Atty. Gen., and Robert H. Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State. Daniel O. Hastings, for defendant.

SPRUANCE, J. (charging the jury). The indictment which you have been impaneled to try charges the prisoner John Bell with the murder of Harvey Miller on the 8th day of November last. During the present term you have heard much from the court as to the law of homicide, but it is necessary that we should now instruct you as to such parts of the law as appear to be applicable to this case.

Homicide is the killing of one human being by another. Felonious homicide is of three kinds: Murder of the first degree, murder of the second degree, and manslaughter. Malice is the essential ingredient of the crime of murder of both degrees. Without malice, there can be no murder either of the first or of the second degree. Malice is a condition of the mind or heart. As here used, this term is not restricted to spite or malevolence toward the particular person slain, but also includes that general malignity and reckless disregard of human life which proceed from a heart void of a just sense of social duty and fatally bent on mischief. Wherever the fatal act is done deliberately or without adequate cause, the law presumes that it was done with malice, and the burden is on the prisoner to show from the evidence, or by inference from the circumstances of the case, that the act was not done with malice.

Murder of the first degree is where the killing was done with express malice aforethought, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate a crime punishable with death. Express malice aforethought is where one person kills another with a sedate, deliberate mind and formed design, which formed design may be manifested in many ways; as for instance, by lying in wait for the deceased, or by antecedent menaces or threats that disclose a purpose on the part of the prisoner to commit the act charged, or by former grudges, ill will, spite, hatred, or malevolence toward the deceased, or any other circumstances which disclose the purpose or intention of the accused toward his victim at the time when the crime was committed. The deliberate selection and use of a deadly weapon is a circumstance which, in the absence of satisfactory evidence to the contrary, indicates the existence in the mind of the person committing the act of a deliberate formed design to kill. All homicides with a deadly weapon are presumed to be malicious until the contrary appears by the evidence, and the burden of proof to the contrary lies on the accused. Where the killing by a deadly weapon is admitted or proved, malice aforethought is presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, and the burden of showing the contrary is on the accused, as the natural and probable consequences of the act are presumed by the law to have been intended by the person using a deadly weapon. If, when the slayer killed his victim, he deliberately intended so to do, the length of time that such intention existed is not material.

Murder in the second degree is where the killing was done with implied malice. Implied malice is an inference or conclusion of law from the facts found by the jury. Murder of the second degree is where there was no deliberate mind or formed design to take life or perpetrate a crime punishable with death, but where the killing was done without justification or excuse and without provocation, or without sufficient provocation to reduce the offense to manslaughter.

Manslaughter is where one person unlawfully kills another without malice. In order to reduce the crime to manslaughter, the provocation must be very great; so great as to produce such a transport of passion as to render the person for the time being deaf to the voice of reason. While murder proceeds from a wicked and depraved spirit and is characterized by malice, manslaughter results from no malignity, but from unpremeditated action and unreflecting passion. No looks or gestures, however insulting, no words, however opprobrious or offensive, can amount to a provocation sufficient to excuse or justify even a slight assault. Nor can a slight assault excuse the killing of an assailant with a deadly weapon, so as to reduce the offense from the grade of murder to that of manslaughter.

It appears from the undisputed evidence in this case, that shortly after the closing of the polls on the evening of the day of the general election, on the 8th day of November last, when the election officers were about to begin to count and tally the votes, a riotous mob, with force and violence, broke into a polling place in this city, known as 110 East Second street, for the avowed purpose of taking possession of the ballot box. The mob was composed of a large number of persons, some of whom were armed with pistols, and a number of shots were fired by them. It was the duty of the election officers to keep safely the ballot boxes, and to repel any attempt to capture them; and it was lawful for them to use such amount of force as was necessary for that purpose. The inspector did resist the assailants and finally repulsed them, and, in so doing, fired several shots. During the affray Harvey Miller, who was with or near the attacking party, was shot and killed, and the prisoner is now charged with his murder. The prisoner admits that he took part in the attack, and that he fired one shot into the polling room, but he denies that he shot Miller. While all who participated in, or aided or abetted in, the said riotous attack upon the polling place, were guilty of a grave offense which merits and should receive severe punishment, the indictment against the prisoner is not for that offense.

There is but one count in the indictment, and that charges, in substance, that the prisoner fired the shot which killed Miller. This is a material allegation which must be proved to your satisfaction to warrant a conviction of the prisoner of any offense whatever. If upon mature consideration of the evidence, you shall not be able to determine who fired the shot which killed Miller; or if you shall determine that some other person than the prisoner fired said shot, even though such person was one of the prisoner's fellow riotors; or if you shall not be satisfied from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that said shot was fired by the prisoner—you should acquit him.

The allegation of the indictment that the prisoner held the pistol in his right hand when he fired the fatal shot is not material, and proof that he then held the pistol in his left hand would not be a material variance. If you shall be satisfied from the evidence that the prisoner unlawfully fired the shot which killed Miller, it will then be your duty to determine the degree of the offense, and for this purpose you should take into consideration the evidence and the admission of the prisoner that he took part in the riotous attack upon the polling place.

Where one unlawfully shoots a gun or pistol at one person and kills another, the crime is the same as if he had killed the person at whom he shot. If the prisoner shot at an election officer with intent to kill him or do him great bodily harm, and the ball hit and killed Miller, whom he did not intend to injure, the crime would be the same as if he had killed the officer. If, without aiming at any particular person, one unlawfully shoots into a room where there are several persons, and one or more of such persons is killed, the slayer is guilty of murder or manslaughter according to the circumstances, irrespective of his intention toward the particular person slain.

Where the testimony is conflicting, you should reconcile it if you can; but if you cannot do so, you should accept that part of it which you deem worthy of credit, and reject that which you deem unworthy of credit, having due regard to the intelligence or ignorance, and impartiality or bias, of the witnesses, and their opportunity to know the facts to which they have testified.

In every criminal case, the accused is presumed to be innocent, until his guilt is proved to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. If, after carefully and conscientiously considering and weighing all the evidence in the case, you should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner, that doubt should inure to his benefit, and you should acquit him. But such doubt must not be a mere fanciful, vague, or speculative doubt, but a reasonable substantial doubt, remaining in your minds after a careful consideration of all of the evidence, and such a doubt as reasonable, fair-minded, and conscientious men would entertain under all the facts and circumstances of the case.

Under this indictment, if the evidence shall so warrant you, you may find the prisoner guilty in the manner and form as he stands indicted; that is, guilty of murder in the first degree, or guilty of murder in the second degree, or guilty of manslaughter, or not guilty.

Verdict: Not guilty.

JONES et al. v. PURNELL.

1. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

Under Rev. Code 1893, p. 798, c. 107, § 1, providing that in actions by or against administrators neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with the deceased, a defendant, in an action by an administrator, is incompetent to testify to any transactions with decedent.

2. PARTNERSHIP—EXISTENCE—QUESTIONS FOR COURT AND JURY.

What is a partnership is a question for the court, but whether a partnership exists is a question of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partnership, § 185½.]

3. SAME—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where two or more persons engage in a business under an agreement, express or implied, to share its profits and losses, a partnership exists between them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partnership, §§ 15, 27.]

4. SAME—MANNER OF PROVING.

A partnership may be proved by direct evidence, or by evidence of the acts, conduct, and declarations of the alleged partners.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partnership, §§ 64-81.]

5. SAME—PROOF AS BETWEEN PARTNERS.

A partnership, as between the alleged partners, must be shown by proof of the actual existence of the partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 38, Cent. Dig. Partnership, § 76.]

Suit by George F. Jones, administrator of Isaac N. Fooks, deceased, and another against Charles T. Purnell. Issues submitted to jury and answered.

The issues sent to the Superior Court by the chancellor in the above case are stated in the charge of the court.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Charles W. Whiley and Robert C. White, for plaintiffs. Charles F. Richards and Charles S. Richards, for defendant.

At the trial the defendant, in reply to a question asked him by his counsel, was proceeding to state certain conversations and transactions he had with Isaac N. Fooks in his lifetime relative to the alleged partnership. This was objected to by counsel for plaintiffs, on the ground that under the statute (Rev. Code 1893, p. 798, c. 107, § 1) the defendant could not testify to any conversations with or transactions by Fooks, he being now deceased and being a party to the suit through his administrator, and any judgment rendered against the plaintiffs in this case would affect the estate of the Fookses.

LORE, C. J. Under the statute, this defendant is not permitted to testify to any conversations or transactions with Mr. Fooks.

LORE, C. J. (charging the jury). The questions you are impaneled to try differ somewhat from ordinary suits that are brought before juries, where the parties originally come into this court and submit their differences to your adjudication, in this: that it is one where, in a case before the chancellor between the parties, the testimony as to certain questions of fact was so conflicting that he desires to have the information and the benefit of the verdict of a jury, and, in order to get that under the laws of this state, he sends what is termed an issue to be tried—in this case, by a jury of Sussex county. That issue contains two questions, which you are to answer by your verdict for his information and guidance.

The first of those questions is this: "Whether Isaac N. Fooks, Charles T. Purnell, and Alfred B. Robinson, under the name of Fooks, Purnell & Robinson, entered into a partnership for the purpose of buying and selling peaches and other fruit and produce at the railroad station at Georgetown, in Georgetown hundred, Sussex county, and state of Delaware, and any point or points at which they might conclude to operate for and during the fruit season of the year 1895." When you return your verdict, that question will be put to you, and you are bound to answer either "Yes" or "No"; that there was such a partnership formed as you are there asked to determine, or that there was not.

What constitutes a partnership—that is, the legal elements of a partnership—is a question of law for the court. Whether in fact a partnership existed between the parties is a question of fact for you. We will say to you, as a matter of law, that wherever two or more persons engage in a legal business or occupation, under an agreement, either express or implied, to share the profits and the losses, that is what is ordinarily and broadly denominated a partnership. In Plunkett v. Dillon, 4 Houst. 396, we find it expressed in this language: "A partnership can be formed only, however, by a voluntary agreement, either express or implied, by two or more competent persons joining together their property, their labor, their skill and experience with one or more of them, in the transaction of business for their joint benefit and profit. It may be for a specific purpose, or confined even to a particular transaction. When the question of its existence arises between the alleged partners themselves, there must be a common interest and risk in it, and an agreement between them, either express or implied, reciprocally to participate in the losses as well as in the profits of the business." And it has been said in one of the judicial decisions of this state on this subject that it is this community of interest in sharing the profits and losses of the business which constitutes a complete partnership, as well between the parties themselves as in respect to strangers who deal with them as partners.

In order to answer this question in the affirmative, you must be satisfied from the preponderance of the evidence that these three persons did enter into a partnership, under the name of Fooks, Purnell & Robinson, to buy and sell peaches and other fruit and produce at the railroad station at Georgetown, in Georgetown hundred, Sussex county, and state of Delaware, and any point or points at which they might conclude to operate for and during the fruit season of the year 1895. A partnership may be proved between the parties, as well as with others, by evidence of the acts, dealings, conduct, admissions, and declarations of the parties themselves, as well as by direct proof in different lines. As between the parties, you must be satisfied by a preponderance of the proof of this fact, that a partnership actually did exist, and it differs where the parties contesting are partners, and where a third party is suing; for in the latter case, although the parties may not in fact be partners, yet they may so conduct themselves towards the third party as to make themselves liable. But between partners themselves, in order to establish a liability from one to the other, there must be an actual partnership proved, either directly or indirectly, by a preponderance of proof. So that, after considering all the evidence that you have had produced before you in this case, it is for you to say, in answer to that first question, either that there was or was not such a partnership.

The second question contained in the issue is "whether, if the said Isaac N. Fooks, Charles T. Purnell, and Alfred B. Robinson engaged together to buy and sell peaches and other fruit and produce, as aforesaid, during the year 1895, such engagement was or was not limited to the purchase of two car loads." You must specifically answer this latter question, as well as the first one, according as the evidence may warrant you. In deciding this latter question, when you come to answer it as the evidence shall warrant, you will say either that it was limited, if there was an agreement to buy peaches, to two car loads, or that it was not so limited.

There are really no questions of contested law in this case. The law is clearly defined and laid down in our own decisions, and it is a question of fact for you to determine as to what your answer will be to the two questions propounded in this issue, which the court have already detailed to you. It is a question of fact for you to determine from the evidence. When you return with your verdict, these questions will be put to you in the form contained in the issue, and your answer to the first will be "Yes" or "No"—that they were or were not such partners; and to the second, that the agreement was confined to two car loads or was not so confined.

Verdict: As to the first query, "Yes." As to the second query, "No."

Appeal of MELONY.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — ADVANCEMENT—INTENTION.

Questions of advancements made by a decedent are always questions of intention.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Descent and Distribution, § 402.]

2. APPEAL—REVIEW OF FACTS—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FINDINGS.

Where there are no facts from which a conclusive legal presumption of an intention on the part of a decedent to make an advancement arises, and the question presented by the evidence is purely one of fact, the determination of the lower court is conclusive on the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 3962.]

3. SAME—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—MATTERS NOT PRESENTED BELOW.

The question of the admissibility of evidence for a certain purpose is not before the Supreme Court for review, where the offer of the evidence in the trial court obviously indicated that it was made for another purpose.

4. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — ADVANCEMENTS—CREATION FROM LOAN.

A loan made by a father to his son may not be converted by the father into an advancement without the consent and against the will of the son; but in order to effect such a change there must be a meeting of the minds between the father and the son such as to create a new contractual status.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Descent and Distribution, §§ 403, 410.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Windham County; William S. Case, Judge.

In the matter of the settlement of the estate of Norman Melony, deceased. From an order of the probate court allowing the amount purporting to be due on certain promissory notes of William H. Melony as advancements to him by deceased, said William H. Melony appealed to the superior court, where the order was reversed, and the administrator appeals to the Supreme Court of Errors. Affirmed.

Charles E. Searls, for appellant. Theodore M. Maltbie and Huber Clark, for appellee.

PRENTICE, J. From April, 1869, to November, 1877, the plaintiff's intestate, Norman Melony, let his son, William H. Melony, the present appellant from the action of the probate court, have sums of money aggregating $2,550. Notes were taken therefor, which were twice consolidated and the accumulations of interest included. These notes were secured by mortgages of real estate. In May, 1878, the real estate thus mortgaged was conveyed by the son to the father to be managed and sold by the latter for the son's benefit. In August, 1882, a sale was made and $3,000 over and above a first mortgage thereon realized. This amount the father indorsed upon the son's note, whose face amount purported to be $4,020, leaving a balance unpaid. No accounting for the use, income, and profits of the property, for the period during which the father held it was ever made, although requested by the son. September, 1885, the son became indebted to the father in the sum of $100, as the result of a business transaction, and borrowed the further sum of $50. For this indebtedness, the son gave his 30-day bank note. This note was never presented for payment, and no request was ever made by the father for the payment of the same, or of any balance due upon the prior note, or of any interest upon either of said notes, nor was any attempt made to collect either of said notes, or anything due thereon, from the dates they were given down to the day of Norman Melony's death in 1896. The two notes last described, the first bearing the indorsement referred to, were found among the deceased's papers, and the attempt is now made to charge the amounts thereof against William's distributive share of his father's estate as advancements made to him. The court of probate passed an order favorable to this contention. The superior court reversed and set aside that order.

The superior court found that the original transactions were all loans. We understand the reasons of appeal as presenting the claim that in so doing and in not holding upon the evidence that they were advancements there was error in law. "Questions of advancements are always questions of intention." Johnson v. Belden, 20 Conn. 322; Meeker v. Meeker, 16 Conn. 383; Hart v. Chase, 46 Conn. 207. In this case, there are no facts from which a conclusive legal presumption of an intention to create an advancement arises.

The question presented was purely one of fact, which the court has conclusively determined.

Upon the trial the appellee offered evidence of declarations made by Norman Melony to a third person some years subsequent to the original transactions between the father and son "as tending to show an intention on the father's part to treat the loans referred to as advancements to be deducted from the son's share of his estate." This offer was accompanied by an admission "that no such intention was then or afterwards communicated to William, and that he was never a party to any such attempted change in the character of the original transactions." The evidence was thereupon, upon objection, excluded. The reasons of appeal impute error to this ruling. In the brief of counsel in support of this contention it is urged that the proffered evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing (1) Norman Melony's original intention to make advancements and not loans; and (2) a subsequent intention on his part to change what had been loans into advancements. The first of these claims evidently was not presented to the trial court. The appellee, while he did not in his answer to the reasons of appeal admit that the original transactions were loans, did set up a change subsequently effectuated by the father, whereby what had been indebtedness became converted into an advancement. The offer of the rejected evidence was plainly made in support of this allegation. The terms of the offer and accompanying admission, when read in the light of both what was said and what was not said, leave little room for doubt upon this point. The offer denominates the original transactions loans, and the admission unmistakably indicates that the appellee conceived himself engaged in an attempt to establish a change in a once existing status. This was the understanding, and we think the rightful understanding of the trial court. Had the appellee desired the benefit of the evidence for the purpose now indicated, he should have made that desire more plainly manifest. We have no occasion therefore to discuss the question of the admissibility of the evidence had it been offered for that purpose.

If the rejected evidence was theoretically admissible to establish a change of relation, either by virtue of section 705 of the General Statutes, or as admissions against interest, it was nevertheless immaterial and irrelevant, and therefore properly excluded. The offer made assumes the unsound proposition that a loan may by the creditor be converted into an advancement without the consent, past or present, and against the will of the debtor. The relation of debtor and creditor is a contractual one involving the meeting of two minds. That relation may not in the nature of things be changed at the will of one only. The minds of the contracting parties must again meet at some time in order to create a new contractual status. The will of neither party can be overridden by the other. We are familiar with cases where loans are turned into gifts, and it has been held that advancements may be. Sherwood v. Smith, 28 Conn. 516; Chapman v. Allen, 56 Conn. 152, 14 Atl. 780. These cases, however, involve no exception to the general principle stated, that there must be a concurrence of minds. In all of them the new status is necessarily a better one for the donee, and his assent to the change of relation always appears at some point of time. His claim is the one which is always urged, never repudiated. By this very action, assent enters into the situation and dissent disappears from it. The unwilling donee has not yet been discovered. When he is, it will be time to inquire whether even he can be compelled to take what he does not want and has never agreed to accept. This case presents the bald attempt to force upon a man at the will of another a contractual relation with that other which is injurious to his interests, to which he has never given his consent, express or implied, and against which he rebels. The law sanctions no such proceeding.

There is no error.

DUESSEL et al. v. PROCH et al.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES — CHANGE — INCORPORATION — REAL ESTATE — CONVEYANCE — USE.

Where certain land was conveyed to trustees of a certain Lutheran church, following the Unaltered Augsburg Confession of Plymouth, and to their successors or assigns, trustees of such church, "to them and their own proper use and behoof," such church being congregational in government, having a mere optional affiliation with national associations or synods of such churches, the use of the property by a corporation subsequently organized from the old congregation, following the general Lutheran belief and the Unaltered Augsburg Confession of Plymouth, etc., was authorized.

2. SAME — CONSTITUTION — VOTING.

Where the constitution of a religious corporation, adopted by the unanimous consent of the members of the society, provided that controversies should be determined by a majority rule, the fact that it also provided that the management of its affairs should be vested in the "whole congregation" did not require the assent of every member to every vote; such provision being construed merely to refer to action at a meeting which all the members were entitled and had an opportunity to attend.

3. SAME — DEPOSED PASTOR — CHURCH BUILDING.

Where a church corporation had power to depose its pastor by a majority vote, and was subject to congregational government and under no compulsory affiliation with any superior body in the church, a pastor so deposed was not entitled to maintain a suit in equity to prevent the use of the church building by any other pastor than himself, and to secure its use for services held by him.

4. ACTION — EQUITIES ARISING AFTER COMMENCEMENT.

In a suit in equity, facts occurring subsequent to the filing of the bill and prior to final hearing may be pleaded and proved to establish the equities at the time of the hearing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hartford County; Alberto T. Roraback, Judge.

Bill by Otto Duessel and others against Ludwig Proch and others for an injunction and a decree invalidating a certificate of incorporation of a certain Lutheran church. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

An appeal was originally taken to this court at the May term, 1905. When reached for argument, the court suggested that, unless additional parties were joined, no judgment could be pronounced that would conclude all those legally interested in the controversy. That appeal was accordingly withdrawn, the judgment of the superior court opened by consent, new parties added in that court, and a new judgment rendered in June, 1905, similar in effect to the original one.

Noble E. Pierce, for appellants. Epaphroditus Peck and Frederick A. Scott, for appellees.

BALDWIN, J. Otto Duessel, alleging himself to be pastor of a Lutheran church in Plymouth, and sundry members of that church and of the congregation by which it is supported, have brought this action against the congregation, the other members of the church and congregation and the trustees who hold the title to the land occupied by the church building. The finding of the trial court establishes these facts: The congregation, which is named the "German Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Congregation, Unaltered Augsburg Confession," was organized in 1892. German Evangelical Lutheran churches are congregational in polity. There are several different national associations or synods of such churches, but their powers over any particular local church are advisory and similar to those of associations and conferences of Congregational churches. There is no church tribunal with jurisdiction to determine the questions in controversy in this action, or any matters of faith or church organization. St. Paul's church and congregation has never affiliated itself with any of the national associations or synods. In 1896 it had as pastor one Jentsch, who was affiliated with one of these associations known as the "General Council." While under his charge, the congregation adopted a constitution. This provided that it should be maintained as a branch of some neighboring congregation, calling the pastor of that to be its pastor, and that "the call extinguishes whenever the congregation dissolves itself, whenever the pastor leaves the German Lutheran church, whenever the pastor publicly stirs up strife and must be deposed, or whenever the pastor voluntarily gives up his office to the congregation." In 1896 Mr. Jentsch resigned the pastorate, and the plaintiff Duessel, who was affiliated with the national association known as the "Missouri Synod," and pastor of a neighboring church in Bristol, began to serve in his place. No formal call to him was voted, nor was he ever installed; but by continued services, payment of salary, and the common understanding of all parties he became, and in 1904 was, pastor of the church, as well as of the Bristol church. German Evangelical Lutheran churches of the General Council and of the Missouri Synod alike hold to the canonical books of the Old and New Testament as the Word of God, the Unaltered Augsburg Confession as the standard of faith and theology, and the symbolical books, so called, including the Apology of the Augsburg Confession, the Smalcald Articles, the Catechisms of Luther, and the Formula of Concord, as true and orthodox expositions of that faith. Theologians and ministers of the General Council and of the Missouri Synod differ in some points of interpretation of the above-named standards; the theological teaching of the Missouri Synod as to the doctrines of conversion, predestination, and election differing from those of the General Council. These differences are deemed vital to orthodoxy by theologians of the Missouri Synod.

In 1901 a building lot in Plymouth was conveyed to three persons, described as trustees of the German Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Church, Unaltered Augsburg Confession of Plymouth, "and to their successors or assigns, trustees of said church," habendum "to them and their own proper use and behoof." Thereafter members of the congregation and others subscribed funds with which and with the proceeds of a mortgage a church building was erected on said lot. No purpose was expressed in the contributing or raising of the money nor any trust created in connection therewith devoting said church building to the uses of either the Missouri Synod or any other general organization of the Lutheran Church. In 1902, having voted to abandon its existing constitution, the congregation adopted one framed, at its request, by Mr. Duessel. This provided that the right to call a pastor should belong to the whole congregation, and that a call should never be given for a fixed period nor to a service to be terminated at the will of the congregation, so long as the minister teaches "the Word of God pure and lives a Christian life, till God Himself will call him to another field. But if the minister or teacher will teach false doctrines or leads an immoral conduct, and will stay therein in spite of all admonition of the congregation and Synod, then he shall be discharged." Another article declared that "the congregation, as a whole, has the sovereignty of the interior or exterior management of all affairs," and a third that "to pass a resolution requires a majority of the members present." Early in 1904 the congregation voted to discharge the defendant Proch, who was then its collector, from that office, and Mr. Duessel in a sermon remarked in words understood to refer to Mr. Proch: "There is in this congregation a worse than Judas Iscariot. Judas carried the bag, and this man also has the money. Judas went out and hanged himself. What will this man do?" At about the same time Mr. Duessel excluded one of the congregation from partaking of the communion, because he refused to make a public declaration of repentance for having been married by a Baptist minister, who was the pastor of the bride; such a marriage being forbidden by the rules and practice of the Missouri Synod. Mr. Duessel also declined one Sunday to step into the house of one of the congregation, at the request of the latter, and baptize his infant child, who was lying at the point of death. The house stood next to the church. The child had received lay baptism, which Mr. Duessel thought sufficient. The Lutheran Church regards lay baptism as valid, but has provided a special ceremony for its confirmation by a pastor. Both the parents of the child were very anxious that it should receive clerical baptism, but it died without it. These incidents caused much bitterness of feeling towards Mr. Duessel on the part of many in the congregation.

Mr. Duessel frequently declared to the congregation, in the spring of 1904, that he desired to relinquish the pastorate, and advised the choice of one who would be pastor of that congregation only, but insisted that his successor should be affiliated with the Missouri Synod. On July 20, 1904, the congregation abolished the article regarding calling a pastor contained in the constitution adopted in 1896. It is a well-settled rule of the Lutheran denomination that a pastor cannot be dismissed except by his own consent or for persistent unchristian life, or upon the ground that he willingly teaches false doctrine. On August 8, 1904, a certificate was filed with the Secretary of State, stating that on August 2d the members of the church of the German Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Congregation of Plymouth had by a two-thirds vote, pursuant to Gen. St. 1902, c. 222, organized as a corporation under the name of the German Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Congregation of Terryville, Conn., to take the place of the society known as the "German Evangelical Lutheran St. Paul's Church, Unaltered Augsburg Confession." This was signed by the clerk and treasurer of the congregation and one of the trustees. Between 1902 and 1905 several votes were passed at what were claimed by the defendants to be legal meetings of the congregation, repealing the constitution of 1902, readopting the previous constitution, dismissing Mr. Duessel from the pastorate, declaring that the church would not have a pastor belonging to the Missouri Synod, and resolving to call a pastor belonging to the General Council. The plaintiffs claimed that these meetings were not legally warned or conducted. In January, 1905, pending this action, at the suggestion of the trial judge, a meeting of the congregation was held under a proper call, and by a vote of 29 to 20 all those votes were formally ratified. The fact of such ratification was set up and admitted in supplemental pleadings. The defendants, prior to the commencement of the suit, had forbidden Mr. Duessel to enter the pulpit of the church again, and had caused the locks on the church edifice to be changed, so that a key which he possessed would no longer admit him.

Under these circumstances the superior court properly dismissed the complaint. It did not present a case of the use of a trust estate for purposes foreign to the trust. The only trust to which the church edifice was subject was a trust for the benefit of St. Paul's Church, described as a "German Evangelical Lutheran Church adhering to the Unaltered Augsburg Confession." The acts complained of have been sanctioned by the congregation which supports that church and is entitled to speak in its behalf. It is not disputed that the church still is and always has been a German Evangelical Lutheran church adhering to the unaltered Augsburg Confession. It was entitled to affiliate itself with any synod or council of the denomination, and to change its affiliation from time to time, should it so desire, by a vote of a majority of its members. Lutheran Congregation v. St. Michael's Evangelical Church, 48 Pa. 20. Being congregational in polity, this was one of its inherent rights. It did less than this in voting, pending the action, to call a pastor belonging to the General Council, and not to call one belonging to the Missouri Synod. Unanimous consent to such action, even if the congregation were an unincorporated association, was unnecessary for two reasons: First, because it worked no change in the purposes of the organization; and, secondly, because the constitution of 1902 expressly provided for majority rule. That constitution, so far as appears, was adopted by unanimous consent, and is alleged in the complaint to be a binding instrument which governs the rights of the parties to the cause. The claim that, as the management of its affairs was by this constitution vested in the "whole" congregation, the assent of every member to every vote was required is plainly untenable. This phrase referred to action at a meeting which all the members were entitled and had an opportunity to attend.

If Mr. Duessel be now the pastor of St. Paul's Church, he is not in this proceeding suing for his salary as such. So far as he is concerned, no question of property right is presented. He and his coplaintiffs have appealed for judicial aid to prevent certain acts and to compel the performance of certain other acts in accordance with what they assert to be equitable duties. His exclusion from the pulpit, for reasons previously stated, violated no trust attaching to the church edifice. So far as concerns the claim in the complaint that the paper purporting to be a certificate of corporate organization be declared void, it was not disposed of by the judgment of the superior court, and the omission to pass upon it has not been made a cause of exception by either party. There is thus left to support the complaint nothing but the equity which it sets up to prevent the use of the church building under the ministry of any other pastor than Mr. Duessel, and to secure its use for services held under his charge. To grant such relief would be to use the compelling power of a court of equity to dispossess the majority of the church and turn the church building over to a minority. It would be to subject a church, which by the polity of the denomination to which it belongs is self-governing, to the overruling authority of that court, as to the mode of conducting its religious services. It would, since the plaintiffs could not prevail without showing the continued existence of the pastoral relation between Mr. Duessel and the congregation, be to preclude a court of law from subsequently determining that question with the aid of a jury, should he bring suit for salary during the time which has elapsed since his exclusion from the pulpit. Cox v. McClure, 73 Conn. 486, 47 Atl. 757.

Upon the evidence before it on the trial of this cause the superior court was justified in view of these considerations in declining to rule, as requested by the plaintiffs, that Mr. Duessel was still the lawful pastor of the church, and, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, in refusing the injunction claimed in the complaint. If he be its lawful pastor, it would be not in furtherance of equity, but against it, to interpose for his restoration to the pulpit of a Congregational church the majority of whose members have by repeated votes, under such circumstances as are set out in the finding, manifested their unwillingness to continue under his ministry, or that of any clergyman who is affiliated with the synod to which he belongs and the theological views of which he deems of such controlling importance. The plaintiffs objected by demurrer to the sufficiency of the supplemental pleadings which set up the doings of the meeting of 1905, and later, after pleading over, to the competency of the evidence offered in their support. These objections were all properly overruled. In equitable proceedings, any events occurring after their institution may be pleaded and proved which go to show where the equity of the case lies at the time of the final hearing. Woodbridge v. Pratt & Whitney Co., 69 Conn. 304, 334, 37 Atl. 688.

There is no error.

GANS SALVAGE CO. v. BYRNES.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—LAW OF THE CASE.

The concession of a prayer for a ruling of law by the opposite party makes the legal proposition announced therein the law of the case, whether such proposition is right or wrong.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—FALLING SHAFT—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

Where, after the destruction of a building by fire, a brick vault shaft, extending from the cellar to the top story, some 35 feet high, was left standing, but appeared to be solid and not dangerous until it suddenly fell without warning, several days after the fire, and injured plaintiff, a member of a salvage crew working in the debris, the mere falling of the wall was not of itself evidence of negligence on the part of plaintiff's master in charge of the work of salvage.

3. SAME—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

Where plaintiff, a member of a salvage gang engaged in working in the debris of a building destroyed by fire, was injured by the falling of a vault shaft, and there was no evidence that the shaft was dangerous, unsafe, or liable to fall prior to the time it did fall, defendant was not guilty of negligence in failing to provide plaintiff with a safe place in which to work because such shaft was not razed.

4. SAME—ASSUMED RISK.

The condition of the vault shaft being equally obvious to plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff by voluntarily working in the debris surrounding the same assumed the risk of injury therefrom.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Action by Robert Byrnes, to the use of James Higgins, against the Gans Salvage Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Carroll T. Bond and George Weems Williams, for appellant. James Fluegel, for appellee.

McSHERRY, C. J. The appellant is a body corporate engaged in the prosecution of a general salvage business. After the great fire, which caused a vast destruction of property in Baltimore City, on February 7 and 8, 1904, the appellant contracted to remove a quantity of canned goods from the cellar of a building which, before the fire had consumed it, had stood on South street. The plaintiff, who is the appellee on this record, was one of a number of men employed by the appellant to do the work of removal. Several walls or parts of walls of the building were standing after the fire was extinguished and at the time the salvage work was commenced. In the declaration it is alleged that "the building was dangerous and unsafe to work in," and that the "dangerous condition of said building was known to the defendant, but unknown to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff while using due care and caution in the said building was, by the negligence of the defendant in thus having him work in the said dangerous and unsafe premises, * * * seriously and permanently injured * * * by the collapsing of a wall and other parts of the said building." The case went to trial before a jury upon the issue joined on the plea of not guilty, and resulted in a verdict against the defendant. From the judgment entered on that verdict, the pending appeal was taken. During the progress of the trial five exceptions were reserved. Four of them relate to rulings concerning the admissibility of evidence and the fifth brings up for review the action of the trial court on the prayers submitted for instructions to the jury.

As this is a suit by a servant against the master to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by the former in the course of his employment, negligence is the gravamen of the action. The negligence averred in the declaration consisted, if it existed at all, not merely in a failure of the appellant to exercise ordinary care to provide its servant, the appellee, with a reasonably safe place in which to perform the labor he had been employed to do, but in deliberately putting him to work in the ruins of a building known by the appellant, but unknown by the appellee, to be in a dangerous condition. The alleged negligence relied on to sustain a recovery was therefore not simply an omission to discharge some duty which the master owed to the servant, but involved an affirmative act of commission in the assignment of the servant to a situation which the master knew and the servant did not know to be perilous and insecure. Under the declaration it was incumbent on the appellee to prove by legally sufficient evidence, first, not only that some of the walls of the building in question, which were left standing after the fire, were in a dangerous condition and liable to fall, but that the identical wall, which by falling caused the injury complained of, was also in that same condition when the appellee was placed or retained at work in close proximity to it; secondly, that the appellant had knowledge of the dangerous condition of the wall which by collapsing injured the appellee, and that it, the appellant, possessed that knowledge prior to the occurrence of the accident; and, thirdly, that the appellee was ignorant of the danger, and by the exercise of proper prudence and care could not have discovered it before the wall fell upon him.

A brief outline of the facts appearing in the bills of exception must be given before turning to a consideration of the legal principles which underlie and will control the final decision of the several questions presented to this court by the record. The building, in the cellar of which the appellee and others were working when the accident happened, had been completely destroyed by the fire. Some partition walls and a brick vault, which extended from the cellar to the top story, were left standing. All of the wood material had been consumed by the flames. The fragments of the walls still standing and the brick vault were not supported by any of the timbers which had formerly tied the outer and the inner walls together. The ruins showed merely a heap of debris, a few fragments of walls, and the remnant of the brick vault. This vault was built of brick, and was about four or five feet square, with openings into it on each floor. These openings in the face of the vault had iron doors attached. Thus the tenants of each floor were provided with a vault for the protection of their books and papers. After the fire this vault stood for a height of 30 or 35 feet, and presented the appearance of a square stack or chimney with iron doors opening into it at each floor. The cellar of the house was divided up into arched compartments, and in these the cases of canned goods were closely packed. In order to get them out after the fire, it was necessary to dig through the arched tops of the compartments, and this was done by the appellee and the other laborers engaged in the work of removing the goods. The work of removing the cases had progressed for several days under these conditions. There was a foreman who had charge of the hands, and both the foreman and the hands worked under a man named Ratinger, who had full charge of and supervision over the salvage work for the appellant company. Several days before the accident happened James W. McCuen, an inspector of furnaces, who was a subordinate of Building Inspector Preston, went to the premises where the appellee and the other employes of the salvage company were working, and told the foreman "to take care of the walls as they were coming down, as it was dangerous for the men to go further down without taking care of them, and he said he would." This message was delivered to the foreman, because Building Inspector Preston, who had not seen the condition of the walls and who had no personal knowledge concerning them, had been informed "that there were some men working in a cellar on South street, where it was dangerous." The building inspector directed McCuen "to go down there and notify them to take care of the walls if they continued working there," and McCuen without making any minute or even casual inspection of the walls, because, as he says, he did not have time to do so, merely communicated to the foreman the warning sent by Mr. Preston. The foreman thereafter repeated to Ratinger the message delivered to McCuen. After McCuen had left, and after Ratinger had learned from the foreman what the building inspector had directed to be done, one of the walls was thrown down under the supervision of Ratinger, but the vault stack was allowed to remain. There is not a particle of evidence in the record to show that the vault walls, the four walls forming the four or five foot square vault stack, were unsafe or dangerous or even impaired. On the contrary, three witnesses examined on behalf of the appellee, they being the foreman and two of the 18 men employed by the appellant, distinctly and emphatically say they thought the vault walls perfectly safe because they were solid. McCuen did not tell the foreman that the vault walls were unsafe. He did not go into the cellar; he made no special inspection of the vault walls; he is not a builder, but a furnace inspector; and he testified that he thought in his judgment "if they would attempt to clear that debris out without protecting the walls, before they could get away from them, they would weaken and would fall down." He further testified: "The way it looked to me to clear the debris out that was there without first protecting the wall, it might possible fall after the debris was away. I wasn't making any particular inspection of that particular work. I was going around delivering messages to them who had charge of the gangs pulling down different walls." On March 7, 1904, it rained and no work was done by the men on the premises in question, though they had worked there several days the previous week. On the following day, March 8th, work was resumed, and whilst the appellee and other laborers were in the cellar, and whilst Ratinger was standing within a few feet of the vault, the vault walls fell and injured the appellee and another workman. There is nothing in the record to show what caused the vault walls to fall. To all appearances they were solid and safe, and, though McCuen, when testifying in the case a year after the accident had happened, stated that in his judgment, "when they got all this debris and stuff out of the cellar, it seemed to me it would so weaken the wall, there being nothing to support it, it would fall," he did not venture to say how much of the debris would have to be removed before the walls would give away, nor was any evidence whatever adduced to show that the removal of the debris actually caused the walls to fall. This vault stack, as has been remarked, extended up the height of the building, and the upper half toppled over and fell inwards, leaving about a story and a half of it undisturbed. It certainly could not have been foreseen by any one that the upper part of this quadrilateral brick structure would separate from the lower part about midway of its entire elevation, and that the top portion would fall in the way it did.

It is a general rule, not, however, without very important exceptions, at least one of which will be alluded to later on, that it is the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which the servant may perform his services. Eckhardt v. Lazaretto Co., 90

Md. 192, 44 Atl. 1017; Armour v. Hahn, 111 U. S. 318, 4 Sup. Ct. 433, 28 L. Ed. 440. A failure of the master to do this, in the instances where it is his duty to do it, is negligence, and, if an injury to the servant results therefrom and is the direct consequence thereof, an action will lie. A master is not an insurer of the servant's safety. Wood v. Helges, 83 Md. 269, 34 Atl. 872. His liability, if any liability attaches at all, depends altogether upon a breach by him of some imposed duty. Laying aside for the moment all the exceptions to the general rule requiring the master to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place for the servant to work, what evidence is there in this case of a breach of the duty imposed by the rule? The concession by the appellee of the appellant's fifth prayer, which instructed the jury that the mere falling of the wall by itself was not sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the appellant, excluded any inference of negligence from the naked act which caused the injury. Serio v. Murphy, 99 Md. 556, 58 Atl. 435. The concession of the prayer made the legal proposition which it announced the law of the case, whether that proposition was right or wrong. Con. Ry. Co. v. O'Dea, 91 Md. 510, 46 Atl. 1000. But the legal proposition contained in the conceded prayer was right. South Balto. Car Works v. Schaefer, 96 Md. 105, 53 Atl. 665, 94 Am. St. Rep. 560. The case at bar is distinguishable from Treusch v. Kamke, 63 Md. 278. That was an action to recover damages for an injury sustained by the fall of a house which had been so carelessly and negligently erected, and with such insufficient and improper materials, that in consequence it suddenly fell, and in falling injured the plaintiff. It was held that "the fact of the fall itself was at least prima facie evidence of improper construction, and entitled the plaintiff to call upon the defendant to explain it to the satisfaction of the jury." Here, however, we have no inquiry concerning a faulty or negligent construction. A house properly and carefully built, with sufficient and suitable material, would not suddenly fall, and the owner who built it, if it did so fall, would be bound to explain the cause of the collapse, if he wished to free himself from the consequences resulting from conditions for the existence of which he was himself responsible. The case in 83 Md. was not one between master and servant. In the case now before us no question as to improper or negligent construction is concerned, no suit is pending against the builder of the vault walls, and no inference as to the dangerous condition of the walls can be drawn from the mere fact that the walls fell, unless it be assumed that they could not have fallen had they not been in an unsafe and dangerous condition. But to assume that would be to assume as true the precise thing to be proved, and that assumption, when adopted, would then be substituted for evidence tending to establish the fact to be proved. Such a process would permit negligence to be inferred from the simple happening of the accident. In a case like this that cannot be done.

Something else, then, in addition to the mere falling of the vault walls, must be found in the record before it can be held that there was evidence tending to prove that the place where the appellee was employed to work was dangerous. One wall of the building had been torn down by city employes, and after the warning message delivered by McCuen had been communicated to Ratinger by the foreman another wall was demolished by the appellant's workmen; but neither the city employes nor the appellant's workmen disturbed the vault walls. If the vault walls had presented any indications of being in a dangerous condition at the time the other walls were leveled, it is scarcely probable that they would have been allowed to remain standing. Indeed, it is reasonably certain they would also have been destroyed or strengthened. They appeared to be solid and secure, and the fact that they formed a square, compact column which had stood firmly for a month after the fire, seemingly unaffected by it, and without exhibiting any signs of weakness whatever, was calculated to induce a belief that it was not necessarily or even probably hazardous to remove the cases of canned goods from the cellar before either razing the walls or shoring them up. The evidence does not show what caused the vault walls to fall. The conjecture of McCuen that, if the débris were removed, the walls would fall is, at best, a mere speculation, because there is nothing in the record to show either that the débris had been removed, or, if removed, to what extent it had been taken away, or what causative relation existed, if any, between its removal and the collapse of the walls. Nor does the testimony of Emerich, the district chief of the fire department, tend to show that the walls were dangerous before the accident happened. He was summoned to the scene after the walls fell, and he knew nothing concerning them prior to that time. He aided in rescuing the men imprisoned by the débris. He found it necessary then to shore up the portions of the walls left standing before he would permit his subordinates to extricate the appellee. But the condition of the remnants of the walls after the upper half of them had toppled over gave no indication of their condition before their collapse. The physical appearance and the actual status had wholly and completely changed.

But, if it be assumed, or for the moment be conceded, that there was some legally sufficient evidence tending to prove that the walls which fell, and which by falling caused the injury complained of, were in a dangerous and unsafe condition when the appellee was put to or retained at work in the cellar, then it is certain, in the absence of any proof as to what caused them to fall, that the means of knowing the danger and the peril incident to the removal of the canned goods were as open and obvious to the appellee as to the appellant. It will not do to say that the information imparted by McCuen to the foreman, and by the latter to Ratinger, apprised the appellant of a hazard and a risk of which the appellee was ignorant; because, in the last analysis, all that McCuen definitely said to the foreman was to repeat Mr. Preston's instructions "to all people cleaning out débris" that they should "take care of all dangerous walls before getting the débris out." The dangerous walls were not pointed out, and Ratinger, the foreman, and the 18 men at work under the latter each had precisely the same opportunity to see, and to judge as to, the peril involved in doing the work in which they were engaged, under the then existing surroundings. An employé who contracts for the performance of hazardous duties assumes such risks as are incident to their discharge from causes open or obvious, the dangerous character of which he had an opportunity to ascertain. B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Stricker, 51 Md. 47, 34 Am. Rep. 291. One who remains in a service which necessarily exposes him to hazardous risks from causes open and obvious, the dangerous character of which he knew or had an opportunity of knowing, must be considered as having assumed such risks, and, if injured in consequence thereof, has no claim against the employer. Penn. R. R. Co. v. Wachter, 60 Md. 395; Yates v. McCullough Iron Co., 69 Md. 370, 16 Atl. 280. This doctrine, firmly grounded in the law of this state, in the law of England, and of probably every state in the federal Union, though usually stated as a general rule, constitutes, in reality, an exception to or qualification of the broad principle which requires the employer to use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which the servant may perform his work. It may be taken, then, as a postulate, that a servant, who, on entering into a contract of employment, knows of the dangers of the premises or place of work, or by the use of ordinary care could see and understand them, assumes the risks which arise therefrom. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 114. Knowledge by the servant of defects in appliances has been held in legal contemplation to carry with it knowledge of the risk and danger incident to the use of such appliances; and in such instances the law imputes and presumes knowledge of the risk and danger, and will not allow the injured workman to aver or prove that he had no actual knowledge thereof. Yates v. McCullough Iron Co., supra.

Whatever danger or hazard there was in performing the work which the appellee had been employed by the appellant to do was the danger or risk that unsupported and isolated walls, which had been subjected but recently before to the effects of the intense heat produced by a mighty conflagration, would, without warning and without the intervention of other forces than those set in motion by the laws of nature, suddenly collapse and fall, and in falling occasion the precise injury which actually befell the appellee. He saw the denuded walls rising up to a height of 35 feet above the place where he was working—they confronted him as he stepped upon the premises—and he had aided in throwing down one of the walls because it was more threatening than the others, and he must have known that a gale of wind or a vibration produced by the dynamiting of other walls in proximate sections of a burnt district, or a jar resulting from the fall of other walls in the vicinity, or the absorption of rain by the exposed mortar might cause the vault walls to totter and fall. He must have known all this, because we are bound to assume he was a man of average intelligence, as there is "no proof that he was stupid or dull of intellect, that any of his senses were impaired, or that he was not possessed of ordinary powers of observation." Yates v. McCullough Iron Co., supra. If the place was really dangerous, the appellee must have known that it was, because the means of knowledge were as open and obvious to him as to the master, and by voluntarily working there he assumed the risks of being injured by causes which were open and obvious, and he cannot hold the employer responsible in damages, if those open and obvious causes produced the injury. If, on the other hand, the place where he worked was not a hazardous one, if the walls which in falling injured him were not in a dangerous condition, then there was no breach by the master of the duty owed to the servant to use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which the servant might perform his service; and, there being no breach of that duty, no action can be maintained, even though, in consequence of an accident resulting from some unexplained cause, an injury has been sustained. In either event, upon either hypothesis, there was no adequate cause of action. Such being the situation, the eighth prayer presented by the appellant withdrawing the case from the consideration of the jury ought to have been granted. That prayer sought to take the case from the jury because of a failure on the part of the appellee to adduce any legally sufficient evidence to show that the appellant had violated any of the duties it owed to the appellee. Holding as we do, for the reasons that have been given, that the prayer should have been granted, it becomes unnecessary to allude to or discuss the instructions which were given or the questions which are raised by the other bills of exception. As no recovery can be had, the judgment will be reversed without awarding a new trial.

Judgment reversed, with costs above and below, without awarding a new trial.

NEEDY v. MIDDLEKAUFF.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT — LEASE — CONSTRUCTION—QUESTION FOR COURT.

The question as to the meaning of the description of premises in a lease is for the court.

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTION.

A lease of the "north side" of a building, "consisting of a storeroom and five rooms on the second and third floors of the same, together with access to the same through the hallway and porch," did not give an exclusive right to a bathroom situate on the north side and accessible from a porch, and always used by all occupants of the building.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County; M. L. Keedy, Judge.

Suit by Mary V. Middlekauff against William H. H. Needy for an injunction to restrain defendant from excluding complainant and others from the use of certain premises. From a decree for complainant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

Albert J. Long and Roger T. Edmunds, for appellant. J. Augustine Mason, for appellee.

PAGE, J. The appellee, being the owner of a house situate in the city of Hagerstown, leased the north side of the same in April, 1901, to the appellant for a term of 4½ years. The controversy in this case, depending upon the construction of the terms of the lease, is whether the appellant has an exclusive right to the possession and use of a bathroom in the said building, located on the north side thereof. The appellant, so claiming, has taken exclusive possession of the bathroom, and has locked the door, so that, as it is alleged, the appellee and her tenants have been and still are deprived of the use and enjoyment of the same. The appellee has filed her bill for an injunction to restrain the appellant from so excluding the appellee and her tenants from the proper use of the room. The court below granted the injunction, and refused, on motion of the appellant, to dissolve the same; and from this decree the appellant has appealed.

By her answer the appellant admits the following allegations to be true: First. That the building contains two large storerooms on the first floor—one on the north, the other on the south, side—the front door entrance being in the middle. In and by which the second and third floors on the north and south sides are reached by stairways leading from floor to floor. Second. That for many years past the appellee has and does still occupy rooms in the building, and has rented out rooms on the second and third floors to other persons for housekeeping and lodging, and to be occupied as apartments usually are. Third. That for years past there has been a bathroom at the rear end of the north side of the building on the second floor, built upon and outside of the rear end or west wall of the north side of the building, but not a part thereof, accessible from the second and third floors over a porch running along the south side of the northern part of the building; and that it has been always used by the occupants of the buildings until shut off by the appellant. It was also proved that Judge Stake, who, for several years before his death in 1902, occupied the two rooms on the south side of the building on the second floor thereof, about the year 1896 erected a private bathroom in the rear of and adjoining his back room, and the entrance to this room could be had only through his rooms, and not through any hall or other room. This bathroom was never used by any one other than the tenants of these rooms. In April, 1901, the lease of the appellee to the appellant was executed. It demises to the appellant, for the term of 4½ years, "the north side of the building known as No. ——— South Potomac street, in Hagerstown, Md., consisting of a storeroom and five rooms on the second and third floors of the same, together with access to the same through the hall and porch; the storeroom to be used as a jewelry store and sewing machine store, and the second and third floors as a dwelling house to tenants satisfactory to the" appellee. There are no specific words showing that the lease was intended to include the bathroom on the north side of the house; and unless it be held that the general description of the north side of the building has that effect, and unless such intention can be gathered from the lease, there can exist no rights that the appellant is entitled to enforce in this proceeding. Whether it is so included is a matter for the determination of the court, construing the words employed in the light of all the circumstances existing and known to the parties at the time the instrument was executed. Roberts v. Bonaparte, 73 Md. 191, 20 Atl. 918, 10 L. R. A. 689.

The facts of the case show that the storeroom and the five rooms on the second and third floors were a part of a building in which were other apartments maintained by the appellee for her own use and that of her tenants. There are but two bathrooms in the building—the one, the subject of this controversy, on the north side of the house, which was reached from a hallway over the porch; the other, on the south side. The north bathroom, the proof shows, has always been used by all the occupants of the house up to the time when the appellant set up his claim to the exclusive use of it in January, 1903. The bathroom on the south side, it seems, has been devoted, since its construction, to the occupant of the room on the second floor of the south side. At the time of the execution of the lease, these two rooms on the second floor of the south side were occupied by Judge Stake. Some years prior thereto he had constructed it, and had always had the exclusive control of it. It was located immediately adjoining his apartments, and could be reached only through his room, and was absolutely inaccessible from any other part of the house. It had never been used by other tenants, and could not be without passing through the room with which it communicated. Under these circumstances, which were well known to both parties, it would require plain and unmistakable words to justify the court in holding that it was intended to deprive the other occupants of the house of the reasonable and proper enjoyment of the only bathroom available for them.

It is insisted on the part of the appellant that the general description is broad enough to include the north side of the building, and that the entire north side of the building, and every right and privilege essential to the enjoyment of the property, passed with it. The words "the north side of the building" are undoubtedly sufficient, if they stood alone and unrestricted by other words, to include the entire north side. But the parties have seen fit, to further say, "consisting of a storeroom and five rooms on the second and third floors of the same, together with access to the same through the hallway and porch; the storeroom to be used as a jewelry store and sewing machine store, and the second and third floors as a dwelling house to tenants satisfactory to the party of the first part." If these words be regarded as restrictive of the general description, then the demise is limited to the six rooms particularly mentioned, with right of access thereto through the hallway and porch. The court below was of the opinion that the principles laid down in the case of Mims v. Armstrong, 31 Md. 87, 1 Am. Rep. 22, are applicable to the facts of this case, and with this we agree. The broad proposition was then laid down as follows: Where, in a deed, "general words are followed by special clause, the latter will restrain and limit their operation." In the case just cited the general description was, "all and singular his goods and chattels," etc., "and property of every kind and nature of and belonging to him" etc.; and the words were added, "which are particularly and fully enumerated in the schedule hereto annexed." The court said "in the grant before us the general descriptive words employed would certainly be sufficient, in the absence of any restrictive clause, to pass all the debtor's property; but we must suppose that the grantor has a purpose in the more particular description which he thought proper to give in the schedule, and that purpose was what he declares to be a more particular and full description of the property conveyed. To withhold this meaning from the words of reference to the schedule, is to deny to them all import whatever and that is justified by no rule of construction whatever."

It is also contended that the exclusive use of the bathroom passed to the appellant as essential to the use and enjoyment of the rooms. It may be that it would be comfortable and even desirable to have an exclusive right, but a bathroom can be enjoyed by one without substantially interfering with the reasonable use of it by another or others.

Finding no error in the decree, it will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

ROBERTS v. ROBERTS et al.

LONDON et al. v. SHRIVER'S ESTATE.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—VESTED OR CONTINGENT ESTATE.

Testator, after making certain bequests, devised and bequeathed all the rest and residue of his estate to his wife "for and during the term of her natural life, in trust for the use and benefit of herself and our children." He then authorized his wife to sell any part of the real estate which she thought proper, "the proceeds of such sale or sales to be invested upon the trusts of this will," and also to lease the real estate. He further gave her authority to use so much of the principal as might be required, "if it shall be necessary for the support of herself and her children, or for their education and advancement in life, all of which I confide to her discretion." Then followed this clause: "I devise and bequeath all my estate, real and personal, remaining at the death of my wife, to my children by my said wife, share and share alike, absolutely in fee simple. The child or children of a deceased child shall stand in its or their parent's place and stead, and receive and have the share and interest its and their parent would have been entitled to if living." Held, that the estates in remainder vested at the death of the testator.

2. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

Under Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 21, § 8, providing that all deeds conveying real estate shall contain a description of the real estate sufficient to identify the same with reasonable certainty, a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors is valid where it assigns "all and singular the real or personal estate, wheresoever situate, and all other property, of every nature, kind, and description, wheresoever situate, belonging to" the grantors.

3. SAME—ASSIGNMENT BY HUSBAND AND WIFE—PROPERTY INCLUDED.

A deed of trust for the benefit of creditors, executed by a husband and wife, recited that the grantors, being "indebted unto sundry persons and corporations in several sums of money and being unable to pay the same in full, have proposed and agreed to assign all our property * * * in trust for the benefit of our creditors, as hereinafter mentioned," and directed trustees to apply the residue in payment of the several debts due to the creditors aforesaid "of us * * * and without any preference or priority of payment," and, after the payment of debts, costs, etc., "then in trust to apply the surplus, if any, unto the said" grantors. Held, that they conveyed, not only the property owned by them jointly, but also the individual property of the wife.

4. DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION—PROPERTY CONVEYED.

A deed conveying all the property owned by the grantor includes a vested remainder in property.

Appeals from Circuit Court, Carroll County, in Equity; Wm. H. Thomas, Judge.

Margaret L. Roberts and Margaret A. Landon and another presented exceptions to audits in a distribution of the estate of Augustus Shriver, deceased. From a judgment rejecting their respective claims, they appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BOYD, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

George Weems Williams and Frank Gosnell, for appellants Landon and Whyte. John Milton Reifsnider and Charles E. Fink, for appellant Roberts. Francis Neal Parke, for trustees.

BOYD, J. There are two appeals in this record—one of which was taken by Margaret L. Roberts from that portion of a decretal order of the court below which determined that her interest in her father's estate passed to Messrs. Roberts and Reindollar, trustees, under a deed of trust made by her and her husband; and the other by Margaret A. Landon and Clymer Whyte, administrators, which involves the construction of the will of Augustus Shriver. The property of the testator having been converted into cash, the questions arising were presented by exceptions to audits. We will first consider the appeal last mentioned.

1. Augustus Shriver was married twice, and died on the 28th of July, 1872, leaving surviving him a widow, two children by his first wife, and eleven by his second. After bequeathing $100 to each of the two children by his first wife, and providing for payment of his debts and funeral expenses, he devised and bequeathed all the rest and residue of his estate to his wife "for and during the term of her natural life, in trust for the use and benefit of herself and our children," expressing his confidence that she would manage it as would be most advantageous to herself and children. He then authorized his wife to sell any part of the real estate which she thought proper, "the proceeds of such sale or sales to be invested upon the trusts of this will," and also to lease the real estate. He further gave her authority to use so much of the principal as may be required, "if it shall be necessary for the support of herself and our children, or for their education or advancement in life [all of which I confide to her discretion]," but recommended that she should not sell the farm on which he resided, unless absolutely necessary. Then follows this clause: "I devise and bequeath all my estate, real and personal, remaining at the death of my said wife, to my children by my said wife, share and share alike, absolutely in fee simple; the child or children of a deceased child shall stand in its or their parent's place and stead, and receive and have the share and interest its and their parent would have been entitled to if living." He appointed his wife guardian of their children, until they were 21 years of age, and sole executrix of his will. Mrs. Shriver, the widow, died May 1, 1902, having disposed of a part of the corpus of the estate, in pursuance of the power conferred upon her. Two of the eleven children died after their father, and before their mother—Alice E., who married George R. Gehr and left four children, and Carrie, who married Edwin Reese, leaving her husband and twin boys surviving her. Those twins died a few days after their mother. Edwin Reese, the husband of Carrie, married Margaret A. Adams after the death of his two children, and died November 22, 1887, leaving all his property of every character and description to his wife, Margaret. She afterwards married Thomas D. Landon. Letters of administration were granted to Clymer Whyte on the estates of the two Reese children. The statement of these facts will suggest the claim of Mrs. Landon; that is to say, that the two Reese children took their mother's interest in the estate of Augustus Shriver, and, having died intestate, their interest went to Edwin Reese, their father, as heir at law and next of kin, who by his last will and testament left them to his widow, who is now Mrs. Landon, one of the appellants—the children of the testator, according to Mrs. Landon's contention, having taken vested remainders in his estate.

It will be observed that the testator left his entire estate (after payment of debts, funeral expenses, and legacies) to his wife "for and during the term of her natural life, in trust for the use and benefit of herself and our children." The legal title was therefore vested in her, and she and their children were the cestui que trustent. The widow and 11 children held the equitable estate, and were the beneficial owners during the widow's life. If the testator had simply left his estate to his widow and their 11 children during the life of the former, and at her death to the 11 children, there could be no doubt that the children would have taken vested, not contingent, remainders in the estate. It is thoroughly settled in this state that "it makes no difference, as to the vesting, whether the legal estate be devised to trustees who are required to convey according to the directions of the will, or whether the interest is provided to take effect without the intervention of trustees, nor that the trust provides for the accumulation of income until the period of payment or distribution arrives." Taylor v. Mosher, 29 Md. 451, Ellicott v. Ellicott, 90 Md. 829, 45 Atl. 183, 48 L. R. A. 58. The power given Mrs. Shriver to sell the real estate and invest the proceeds upon the trusts of the will was certainly not sufficient to show an intention to create a contingent, instead of a vested, remainder, nor was the power to lease it. Nor can it be said that the power to use so much of the principal as was necessary for the support of herself and children, or for their education or advancement in life, necessarily made these contingent remainders. Although that power was expressly confided to her discretion, he did not give the estate to her to do what she chose with it, for her own benefit, but she could only use it for the purposes named; that is to say, for the support of herself and the remaindermen, or for the education or advancement in life of the latter. In Benesch v. Clark, 49 Md. 497, it was said that, where an estate is given to a person generally or indefinitely with the power of disposition, such gift carries the entire estate, and the devisee or legatee takes the property absolutely; but when the property is given to one expressly for life, and there be annexed to such gift a power of disposition of the remainder, the rule is different, and the first taker takes only an estate for life, with the power annexed. That has been approved in Foss v. Scarf, 55 Md. 310, Russell v. Werntz, 88 Md. 214, 44 Atl. 219, and other cases. It is clear from those decisions and authorities cited in them that there may be a valid devise to one for life with a power of disposition, which will not affect the remainder over, unless the power is exercised as authorized; and as to any part of the estate upon which the power is not exercised the remainder is unaffected. It is equally clear that the clause in the will last quoted does not of itself make these remainders contingent. The testator, having given his widow a power of disposition, naturally and properly spoke of his estate "remaining at the death of my said wife," but that would not convert what would otherwise have been a vested into a contingent remainder. The remainder may vest subject to the power, and the uncertainty as to whether the power will be exercised as to all or part of the estate does not make it a contingent remainder. As was well said in Ducker v. Burnham, 146 Ill. 10, 34 N. E. 560, 37 Am. St. Rep. 135: "If the remainder is contingent because it may consist of what remains after the exercise of the power of sale and use conferred upon the life tenant, then, in case the life tenant should fail to sell any of the estate, or to exhaust for her own use any of the principal thereof, the remainder would still be contingent, because it would consist of what remains after paying off the charges created upon the property by the directions to pay the debts and the bequests. To hold that a remainder is contingent, because it cannot be known how much will be left until the debts and funeral expenses and other charges are paid, would make every remainder given by will a contingent one. But it is well settled that a devise to a person after the payment of debts and legacies is not contingent until such debts and legacies are paid, but confers an immediately vested estate. Scofield v. Olcott (Ill.) 11 N. E. 351. In such cases the remainder vests subject to the payment of debts and legacies, and subject to the exercise of the power to use and sell, but liable to be divested as to so much of the estate as may be disposed of for the payment of debts and legacies, and by the execution of the power. The remainder is not made contingent by uncertainty as to the amount of the estate remaining undisposed of at the expiration of the life estate, but by uncertainty as to the persons who are to take." See, also, Heilman v. Heilman, 129 Ind. 59, 28 N. E. 310, Woodman v. Woodman, 89 Me. 128, 35 Atl. 1037, Burleigh v. Clough, 52 N. H. 267, 18 Am. Rep. 23, and other cases cited in 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 389.

It is not necessary to go beyond our own decisions to find authorities on the subject, but the above quotation from Ducker v. Burnham seems to be very apt. In Taylor v. Mosher, supra, the testator, after making certain devises, bequests, and dispositions in favor of his wife and servants, devised his estate not otherwise specifically disposed of to trustees. He directed them to pay certain annuities, and then to invest "the clear income of my estate, if anything remain after the application annually or otherwise of the several sums of money hereinbefore charged thereon," and provided: "Upon the death of my son William, I will and desire that a distribution of my estate be made among all my grandchildren, to wit, the children of my late son, James Mosher, and the children of my aforesaid son, William, provided any child he shall leave. All my said grandchildren to take per capita." The court said: "It is doing no violence to this language or to any rule of law to hold that the children of James, who were in esse at the date of the will and of the testator's death, took vested interests, liable to be divested pro tanto for the purpose of letting in for a share any child that William, who then had none, might, by possibility, have and leave surviving him. The fact that an estate is liable to be divested in whole or in part upon a contingent, does not make it a contingent estate." See, also, Dulany v. Middleton, 72 Md. 67, 19 Atl. 146, for a similar decision. It would seem, then, to be clear that the reference to the estate "remaining at the death of my said wife" did not make the remainder contingent.

But it is argued, and was so held by the learned judge below, that the rest of this clause shows that the interests left to the children were contingent—that their right to participate in the distribution of his estate was contingent upon their surviving the testator's wife. But we cannot see how that clause indicates an intention on the part of the testator to create contingent remainders. The wife might in her lifetime have given one child more than she gave another, and that child might have survived her mother, while the other who received very little might have died, without issue, before her mother. It would seem to be more in accordance with the intention of the testator and more natural for him to vest the remainder in his children at his death. We have seen what confidence he had in his wife's judgment and sense of justice, and he was willing for her to decide what was necessary to be expended for the support of herself and children, and for their education or advancement in life. He did not direct that any charge should be made against them for sums thus advanced in excess of what was given others; and, even if the remainder be treated as contingent, those thus favored might survive their mother, and receive a share of the remaining property. The equality of distribution does not in any way depend upon whether the remainders were contingent or vested. It is a familiar but important rule that the law favors the early vesting of estates, and it is likewise a well-recognized rule of construction that, in doubtful cases, the interest should be deemed to be vested in the first instance, rather than contingent, unless the instrument under consideration does not admit of such construction. It cannot be doubted that Mr. Shriver did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his estate. He prefaced his will with the statement: "Subject to the payment of my debts and funeral expenses, I dispose of all my estate in manner and form following." Yet it was quite possible, although not probable, that all of the children by his second wife might have died without leaving issue before his wife died, and in that event there would have been an intestacy as to the remainder, if it must be regarded as contingent. The children provided for during the lifetime of his wife ("our children"; that is, those of his second wife and himself) were the same who were referred to in the clause under consideration ("my children by my said wife"). Mrs. Reese was one of those children, and left two children who would admittedly have been entitled to their mother's share if they had survived their grandmother. The testator did not leave the remainder to such of his children as survived his wife, or to such children and grandchildren (children of a deceased child) as survived her. He did make provision in that clause for the share and interest of a deceased child who had died leaving a child or children, but made none as to the share of a deceased child who died without leaving issue. The provision that "the child or children of a deceased child shall stand in its or their parent's place and stead, and receive and have the share and interest its and their parent would have been entitled to if living" is not of controlling effect on this question, by reason of the use of the words "receive and have." That was speaking of the period of distribution, and whether vested or contingent, the remaindermen were not entitled to "receive and have" their shares until that time arrived. The trustee was to receive, have, and hold the estate until then, excepting such part as she previously disposed of under the other provisions of the will. Without further discussion of this clause, it is sufficient to say that we do not find anything in it which necessarily indicates an intention on the part of the testator to create contingent remainders, and it will be well to now see what this court has said about the effect of similar or analogous provisions in other wills.

In Meyer v. Elsler, 29 Md. 28, the testator after making certain bequests and legacies, gave all the rest of his estate to his wife and another in trust, to hold the same with surplus or unappropriated revenue or income arising from the same, etc. He then authorized them to receive all rents, issues, interest, and profits arising or growing out of the property, and from the amounts so received to pay insurance, taxes, and repairs, and out of the residue to pay his wife for her use and benefit one-third part, and directed the balance of the income to be invested in Baltimore City stock to be held in trust with the other property, until the end of 20 years after his death, or until his youngest child should arrive at the age of 20 years, and then the whole, including principal and interest, to be divided and paid over as follows: To his wife one-third part "and the other two-third parts to all my children, share and share alike, * * * and in the event of the death of either of my said children, leaving lawful issue, such issue to have and receive the share or proportion that the deceased would have been entitled to if living." He then provided for a similar distribution of the third left to his wife, in case she "shall be dead at the time of such division." Elizabeth, one of the children, after the testator's death, married John Rose and subsequently died before the time had arrived for a division of the estate, intestate, and without issue. The widow also died before that time. This court held that the children took a vested interest in the property devised to them, and that John Rose, as husband of Elizabeth, was entitled under the statute then in force to a life estate in her share of the realty, and absolutely to her share of the personalty. That case is strikingly similar to the one under consideration, and has been fully approved in Taylor v. Mosher, supra, Small v. Small, 90 Md. 568, 45 Atl. 190, and Daughters v. Lynch, 93 Md. 305, 48 Atl. 1055, and other cases.

In Cox v. Handy, 78 Md. 108, 27 Atl. 227, 501, the testator left certain real and personal property to his wife for life, and his will contained this clause: "It is my will that after the death of my wife, Mary Ann Handy, all the property devised to her for life * * * shall be sold if necessary for equal partition, or if the same can be accomplished without a sale, shall be divided amongst my children, share and share alike; the child or children of any deceased child to take the portion to which the parent, if living, would have been entitled." This court held "that a share of the property vested in each of the children of Wm. W. Handy, who survived him, but if any such child should leave children at his death, his share was divested in favor of his children; and that it was not divested by the death of the child in the lifetime of the tenant for life without leaving children," and in the opinion delivered after a motion for reargument, it was said: "A share of the property vested in each of the children who were living at the time of his death, and if any child died before the period of distribution, leaving children, they were substituted in his place; his share however was not divested if he left no children, but it went to his representatives." That case has been recently approved in Hoover v. Smith, 96 Md. 393, 54 Atl. 102, and in Re Rogers' Trust Estate, 97 Md. 674, 55 Atl. 679.

The cases we have cited would seem to conclusively show that these remainders were vested and not contingent. This opinion has already reached such length as to make it undesirable to attempt to discuss in detail the authorities relied on by the appellees, such as Demill v. Reid, 71 Md. 175, 17 Atl. 1014; Larmour v. Rich, Id. 369, 18 Atl. 702; Small v. Small, 90 Md. 550, 45 Atl. 190. In the latter, Judge Fowler referred to Larmour v. Rich, and said: "The distinction is clearly drawn between that class of cases where the estate or interest vests at the death of a testator, because of an absence of any expressed intention that it vest later, and those where the testator by his will fixes a more distant period for the vesting." It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the testator did not by his will express or indicate an intention that the remainder of his estate should not vest until after his wife's death. In the very recent case of Ridgely v. Ridgely (to be found in 59 Atl. 731, but not yet reported in the Maryland Reports), many of the cases affecting this question are cited. Engel v. Geiger, 65 Md. 539, 5 Atl. 249, Small v. Small, and Larmour v. Rich, are there included in the class of cases where gifts were made for life and then over to survivors, in which cases the period of survivorship is generally referred to the period of distribution, and not the death of the testator. There is no reference to survivorship in this will. In Daughters v. Lynch, supra, we repeated what had been said in Taylor v. Mosher, that "estates will be held to be vested wherever it can fairly be done without doing violence to the language of the will, and, to make them contingent, there must be plain expression to that effect, or such intent must be so plainly inferable from the terms used as to leave no room for construction." We are therefore of the opinion that the court erred in rejecting the claims of Margaret A. Landon and Clymer Whyte, administrator, for the shares claimed by them respectively—the one being for this interest in the real property, and the other for that in the personalty distributed.

2. This brings us to the consideration of the appeal of Margaret L. Roberts. Having held that the children of Mr. and Mrs. Shriver took vested estates, it will not be necessary to determine whether a deed of trust such as that made by Mr. and Mrs. Roberts to Messrs. Reindollar and Roberts, trustees, would include a contingent remainder. The appellant contends that the deed of trust did not pass the interest of Mrs. Roberts for several reasons which we will briefly refer to.

(a) It is claimed for her that it does not contain a description of the real estate sufficient to identify it with reasonable certainty, as provided in section 9 of article 21 of Code Pub. Gen. Laws. The description in the deed of trust is "all and singular the real and personal estate, wheresoever situate, * * * and all other property of every nature, kind, and description and wheresoever situate [except so much thereof as is exempt from execution] of us the said" William and Margaret. It is difficult to understand how it would be possible to identify property intended to be conveyed more thoroughly than is done by that description. The intention manifested on the face of the deed was to convey and assign all of their property of every nature, kind, and description. If they had undertaken to specify it, some might have been omitted, and to show on the face of the deed that they intended to make an assignment of all property, it would have been necessary to have added some such clause as the one that was inserted. This court decided in Maughlin v. Tyler, 47 Md. 545, and other cases, that a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors, creating preferences and exacting releases, is void, unless it appears on its face to convey all the property of the debtor. It is true this deed does not create preferences or exact releases, but if the position of the appellant be correct as to the effect of this statute, it would be difficult to ever comply with the requirements of the law as announced in Maughlin v. Tyler. If a grantor intends to convey part of his property, of course he must describe it specifically, but if he intends to convey all of it and uses such language as is in this deed, who could be misled or in doubt as to what he conveyed? The object of section 9 is to require sufficient notice to the public and certainty as to what is conveyed. As well might it be required of a testator to specify his property in detail in a residuary clause in his will as to require a debtor making an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to do so. This statute has never been construed to require a schedule or list of the grantor's property to be set out in such a deed, and so far as we are aware it is the universal custom throughout the state to use terms similar to those in this deed, when it is intended to make a general assignment of all the debtor's property. In Carey's Forms of Precedents, p. 371, a very similar description of property is given for such a deed of trust, and there have been many cases in this court where such descriptions were given, and never questioned. The case of Farquharson v. Elcheiberger, 15 Md. 63, is conclusive of the question. It is said by the appellant that as it was decided prior to Acts 1856, p. 235, c. 154, § 24, which is now the section of the Code above mentioned, the effect of the statute was to change that decision. But that was "An act to simplify and abridge the rules and forms of conveyances," and if such a description was valid before the rules and forms were simplified, surely it is now. In our opinion, the statute does not in any wise invalidate this instrument.

(b) It is further contended on behalf of Mrs. Roberts that the deed of trust only conveyed the joint estates of her husband and herself—that she united in the deed simply to convey her potential right of dower. We find nothing in the deed that sustains that contention. It recites that they are "indebted unto sundry persons and corporations in several sums of money, and, being unable to pay the same in full, have proposed and agreed to assign all our property * * * in trust for the benefit of our creditors, as hereinafter mentioned." It then assigns the property as we have stated, and after giving the trustees authority to convert it into money, and providing for costs, etc., directs them to apply the residue of said moneys in payment of the several debts due to the creditors aforesaid of us, the said William Jesse Roberts and Margaret L. Roberts, his wife, pari passu, and without any preference or priority of payment," and after the payment of debts, costs, expenses, and commissions, "then in trust to apply the surplus (if any) unto the said William Jesse Roberts and Margaret L. Roberts," etc. It seems clear to us, therefore, that Mr. and Mrs. Roberts not only conveyed and assigned any property owned by them jointly, but all they owned individually. Whether or not she owed any individual debts which are entitled to be paid we have no means of knowing, and we do not intend to determine how the money realized from her father's estate is to be distributed by the trustees. That can be disposed of in the proceeding in which they make distribution.

(c) After having determined that the interests of the children of Mr. Shriver under his will were vested remainders, we do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the question as to whether Mrs. Roberts' interest passed by the deed of trust as we think it did. A vested remainder can be devised, mortgaged, or conveyed. It also is liable to execution by a judgment creditor. Armiger v. Reitz, 91 Md. 334, 46 Atl. 990. We are of the opinion, therefore, that Mrs. Roberts' interest should be distributed to the trustees named in the deed of trust, and it can then be determined what creditors are entitled to it. As the court below so decided, although on a different ground, as to Mrs. Roberts' interest that part of the decretal order will be affirmed, but as we do not agree with the court as to the interest that would have gone to Carrie Reese, and is now claimed by Margaret A. Landon, and Clymer Whyte, administrator of Augustus Shriver Reese, and of William Reigart Reese, the portion of the order appealed from by them will be reversed. Of course we do not mean to disturb the portions of the decretal order not appealed from.

Decretal order affirmed in part, and reversed in part—the costs in No. 18 (office docket) to be paid by the appellant in that case, including one-half of the cost of transmitting and printing the record, and the costs in No. 19 (office docket) to be paid out of the estate of Augustus Shriver, including the other half of cost of transmitting and printing the record (one-half by the trustees, and the other by the receiver)—and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

BARKER et al. v. BARKER et al.
(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Strafford.
Oct. 3, 1905.)

1. TRUSTS—REDUCING NUMBER OF TRUSTEES.

Under Pub. St. 1901, c. 205, § 1, giving the superior court full equitable powers in all cases of trust, such court has power to cause the number of trustees to be reduced, where it is shown to be necessary for the effectual performance of the trust that there should be a change in the number of trustees, because that fixed by the creator is excessive.

2. SAME—REMOVAL OF TRUSTEE.

Where it is necessary for the effectual performance of a trust that the number of trustees be reduced, it is no ground for objecting to the removal of a particular trustee that he will thereby be deprived of the opportunity of passing on the question whether he has complied with the condition imposed by the creator of the trust as to sobriety and good conduct, on which installments of the gift to him are predicated.

Exceptions from Superior Court; Wallace and Peaslee, Judges.

Petition by Hiram H. Barker and another for the appointment of trustees to fill vacancies. Charles B. Barker filed an answer, admitting the vacancies and alleging that the number of trustees should be reduced to one, and praying the appointment of one suitable person and the removal of the other trustees. From an order granting the prayer of the answer, petitioners bring exception. Exceptions overruled.

Petition praying for the appointment of trustees to fill vacancies caused by the resignation of four of the seven members previously appointed upon the board of trustees created by the will of Hiram Barker, which is printed at length in Edgerly v. Barker, 66 N. H. 434, 31 Atl. 900, 28 L. R. A. 328. Charles B. Barker, one of the defendants and a member of the board of trustees, filed an answer admitting the existence of the vacancies in the board, but denying that there was any occasion for filling them. He offered to resign his trust, alleged that the number of trustees should be reduced to one in order to preserve the estate for the benefit of the parties interested therein, and prayed the appointment of one suitable person to execute the trust. It was ordered that the trustees then acting be removed, and that a single trustee be appointed in their stead, and the plaintiffs excepted.

Alfred S. Hayes and William S. Bangs, for plaintiffs. Streeter & Hollis, for Charles B. Barker. Elmer J. Smart, for Clara B. Berry. George E. Cochrane, guardian, pro se.

BINGHAM, J. We have here an estate which the testator understood, when he made his will, was worth $800,000, and which in the early years of the trust produced a net income of $20,000. In a period of 18 years it has shrunk, from one cause or another, including payments to trustees and appropriations to beneficiaries, to about $200,000, and now yields an income of less than $5,000, after deducting taxes and incidental expenses, but not including trustees' fees, miscellaneous expenses of management, and necessary repairs. The testator provided in his will for a board of six trustees, and that his son Hiram should be added to the number upon his complying with certain standards of sobriety and habits of living for a specified period. For the greater part of 10 or 11 years prior to January 20, 1904, the trust was managed by seven trustees, and the sum paid annually for their services was $4,500 and expenses incurred in holding meetings of the board. The resignations of the four trustees who were not of the Barker family, having been previously tendered, were then accepted. Since that time the petitioners and the defendant Charles B. Barker have managed the trust. The petitioners ask for the appointment of four trustees to fill the vacancies. The defendant objects to the granting of the request, and asks that the present trustees be removed, and that a single trustee be appointed to execute the trust. The latter request was granted in the superior court, subject to the petitioners' exception. In addition to the estate having been greatly diminished during the existence of the trust, it is found that the only way to prevent its further dissipation is to provide for its administration by a single trustee; that the petitioners persist in attempting to make appropriations to beneficiaries that will in a comparatively short time exhaust the property; that they are not able to agree with the defendant as to the management of the estate and the sums to be appropriated to beneficiaries; that their further continuance as trustees is opposed to the best interests of the estate and the other beneficiaries; that competent trustees cannot be procured to serve with the Barker trustees for $500 a year, or any reasonable fee; that it is impossible to procure competent trustees to act for a less sum than $500 a year; that if a board of seven is maintained and such payments are made the beneficiaries will be practically deprived of the net income of the property and the principal fund will ultimately be exhausted; and that in order to carry out the principal intention of the testator, namely, to provide for the support and maintenance of Hiram and his wife and Clara Barker Berry and to preserve the bulk of the estate for the grandchildren, it is necessary that the Barker family no longer continue as trustees.

As we understand the case, the order of removal includes a finding that the present trustees are unsuitable to continue in the management of the trust. Such a finding is not inconsistent with the special findings above enumerated. This being so, and it being found that the only way to prevent the further dissipation of the estate is to provide for administering it by a single trustee, the question presented is whether under these circumstances the superior court, in the exercise of its equity powers, could legally remove the present trustees and make the order reducing the number from seven to one. The petitioners concede that the superior court has full equity powers in all cases of trusts (Pub. St. 1901, c. 205, § 1; Walker v. Cheever, 35 N. H. 339; Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 503), but contend that the order of the court in this instance is not within the limits of those powers, and is unauthorized and illegal from the fact that it was the intention of the testator that seven trustees, one of whom was to be his son, should manage the trust, and that to remove the present board, of which the son is a member, and reduce the number to one, is in contravention of this known and expressed intent. The defendant admits that, as a rule, in such matters the wish of the creator of the trust, when ascertained, is to be followed, but contends that the rule is subject to the qualification that when it is shown to be necessary for the effectual performance of the trust that there should be a change in the number, because that fixed by the creator of the trust is excessive or insufficient, a court of equity has power to cause the number to be reduced or increased to meet the necessities of the case, and that, if any or all of the trustees are unsuitable, it can order their removal, always being governed by a sound judicial discretion. The latter view meets our approval. It cannot be doubted but that the superior court, as a court of equity, has the power to remove trustees who become unsuitable for the execution of a trust. Under such circumstances power of removal is also conferred by statute upon the probate court. Pub. St. 1901, c. 198, § 8. In this particular the jurisdiction of the two courts is concurrent. Bowditch v. Banuelos, 1 Gray, 220, 228, 229. It is the duty of a court of competent jurisdiction, upon the institution of proper proceedings before it and its being made to appear that trustees appointed to execute a trust are unsuitable, to remove them. Adams v. Adams, 64 N. H. 224, 9 Atl. 100. Trustees whose relations to their co-trustees or the beneficiaries are such as to interfere with the proper management of the estate may be regarded as unsuitable and removed. Wilson v. Wilson, 145 Mass. 490, 14 N. E. 521, 1 Am. St. Rep. 477; Disbrow v. Disbrow, 46 App. Div. 111, 61 N. Y. Supp. 614; Loring's Trustee's Handbook, 20. An instance of this is when trustees unreasonably disagree with their co-trustees in matters involving their joint discretion. Swale v. Swale, 22 Beav. 584; Stott v. Lord, 31 L. J. Ch. 391; Loring's Trustee's Handbook, 47. And, while a court of equity is reluctant to change the number of trustees from that designated by the creator of the trust, yet it seems to be in accordance with reason and authority that it may do so when, by reason of changed conditions in the estate, the number designated by the creator has become excessive or insufficient, and it is necessary to reduce or increase the number in order to effectuate the execution of the trust. Inhabitants of Anson, Pet'rs, 85 Me. 79, 88, 89, 26 Atl. 996; Force v. Force (N. J. Ch.) 57 Atl. 973; Austin v. Austin, 18 Neb. 306, 309, 22 N. W. 116; Birch v. Cropper, 2 De G. & Sm. 255; In re Dickinson's Trusts, 1 Jur. N. S. 724; Sitwell v. Heron, 14 Jur. 848; In re Chetwynd's Settlement [1902] 1 Ch. 692; Letterstedt v. Broers, 9 App. Cas. 371; In re New [1901] 2 Ch. 534; Lewin, Tr. (11th Ed.) 803; 2 Beach Tr. § 387; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1287; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) §§ 1086, 1087; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 970. In Edgerly v. Barker, 66 N. H. 434, 452, 31 Atl. 900, 28 L. R. A. 328, the court, in construing the will, said: "A dominant idea of the residuary clause and of the whole will is that the testator's grandchildren shall have the bulk of his estate. Not less dominant or less manifest is his determination that C. and H. shall not have it. * * * In his mind the main point evidently was the extent to which he disinherited C. and H. and put their children in their places. * * * After years of observation and reflection his unchanged judgment was that the welfare of his issue required an absolute provision for the comfort of C. and H. during their lives, a conditional appropriation of $30,000 for H., other special appropriations (including one for education), and a devise of the remainder to the grandchildren. In this manner, and to this extent, he was convinced it was his duty to modify the operation of the statutory rule of distribution. His exercise of testamentary power to this end was his primary and leading purpose." The order of the superior court does not contravene this primary and leading purpose, for it is not probable the testator intended that, if any or all of the six trustees designated in his will should subsequently become unsuitable, they should be continued in the trust, or that, if Hiram was added to the board and became unsuitable for reasons other than those specified in the will, he should not be subject to removal the same as any other trustee would be for a like cause. And it is equally improbable that he intended the number of trustees should not be reduced, if, by reason of changed conditions in the estate, the number became excessive, so that it was impossible to effectuate his primary purpose without a reduction.

Another contention made by the petitioners is that the order of the court deprives Hiram of the opportunity of passing upon the question whether he has complied with the condition imposed as to sobriety and good conduct, upon which the second and third installments of the gift of $30,000 are predicated, and is in violation of the intention of the testator that he should be permitted to pass upon this question with the other trustees. We do not think the will provides that he should have the right to pass upon his own qualifications with the other trustees; and, as we understand the law, he would not be entitled to pass upon questions in which he is directly interested as a beneficiary and involving an exercise of discretion, but that such questions should be passed upon by the other trustees alone. Rogers v. Rogers, 111 N. Y. 228, 234, 237, 18 N. E. 636; Woodward v. James, 115 N. Y. 346, 357, 22 N. E. 150.

TISDALE et al. v. JOHN H. PRAY SONS CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Strafford. Oct. 3, 1905.)

CHattel Mortgages—Registration—Notice—Attachment.

Under Pub. St. 1901, c. 140, § 6, declaring that a mortgage of personal property is not entitled to registration unless the mortgagors and the mortgagee shall subscribe an oath that the mortgage is given in good faith, etc., registration of a mortgage of personalty containing such affidavit not signed and sworn to by the mortgagee is not constructive notice of the existence of the mortgage, and an attachment of the property while in the possession of the mortgagors and without knowledge, actual or constructive, of the existence of the mortgage, will prevail against the mortgagors and mortgagee.

Exceptions from Superior Court; Stone, Judge.

Bill in equity by Mary E. Tisdale and others against the John H. Pray Sons Company and others. Bill dismissed, and plaintiffs except. Exception overruled.

The Hobarts, who reside in Brookline, Mass., owned certain personal property situated in Rollinsford, and on March 20, 1903, executed the mortgage in question, which purported to secure a note for $1,600. At the time of signing the note and mortgage nothing was due from the mortgagors to the mortgagee, but on March 24th a loan of $1,600 was made. The mortgagors, but not the mortgagee, took and subscribed to the following oath: "We, John W. Hobart and Emma E. Hobart, hereby certify that the foregoing mortgage is given in good faith for a bona fide consideration, and is not intended or given to evade the claims of creditors." The mortgage was recorded in the town of Rollinsford on March 26, 1903. The defendants attached the mortgaged property on September 28, 1903, on writs brought against the Hobarts, without knowledge of the existence of the note or mortgage.

Charles S. Hill and Vere Goldthwaite, for plaintiffs. Arthur G. Whittemore and John S. H. Frink, for defendants.

BINGHAM, J. The affidavit contained in the mortgage, if otherwise sufficient, was not signed and sworn to by the mortgagee. The statute requires that the mortgagee as well as the mortgagor shall take and subscribe to the oath. Pub. St. 1901, c. 140, § 6. This must be done to entitle a mortgage of personal property to registration. The unauthorized registration of such an instrument is not constructive notice of its existence. Lovell v. Osgood, 60 N. H. 71. The defendants' attachment, having been made while the mortgaged property was in the possession of the mortgagors, and without knowledge, actual or constructive, of the existence of the mortgage, must prevail.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

CARR et al. v. CORNING (two cases).

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Merrimack. Oct. 3, 1905.)

1. TRUSTS — APPOINTMENT AND SUCCESSION OF NEW TRUSTEE — POWER OF PROBATE COURT.

As under Pub. St. 1901, c. 182, § 2, the probate court has jurisdiction of wills and of the estates of deceased persons, and as under Pub. St. 1901, c. 185, § 2, cl. 12, the probate court is authorized to appoint the trustees named in a will, and under Pub. St. 1901, c. 198, it is the duty of the probate court to administer trusts created by will, a provision, in a will creating a trust, that whenever a vacancy occurs in the board of trustees the remaining trustees or trustee shall nominate, and appoint in writing a successor or substitute to fill such vacancy, said appointment to be approved by the judge of probate of a certain court for the time being, raises a presumption that the probate court was intended, which is not rebutted by the addition of the words "for the time being," and a contention that the power was vested in the judge in his individual and not his official capacity is untenable.

2. SAME.

The suitability of a trustee to be appointed by the probate court is a fact that must be proved in every case before the court is authorized to make the appointment, and where testator by his will creating a trust made it the duty of the probate court to approve of an appointment to fill a vacancy in the board of trustees, evidence was admissible, on behalf of those empowered to appoint, to show the suitability of their proposed appointee.

3. SAME.

Since the law makes it the duty of the probate court to approve of trustees named in a will before appointing them, the mere fact that testator made it the duty of the probate court to approve trustees named in accordance with the provisions of his will did not make it illegal for the court to approve them, and a contention that, if it was the intention of the testator that the probate court should approve the appointment, the power of appointment fails as an attempt to confer on the court a jurisdiction not conferred by law, is untenable.

Transferred from Superior Court.

Bill in equity by Clarence E. Carr and another, trustees of the will of John H. Pearson, deceased, against Charles R. Corning, for construction of the will. Action for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant, as judge of probate of Merrimack county, to consider and pass on a petition filed by plaintiffs in the probate court of said county. Transferred, without ruling, from the superior court. Case discharged.

The will is the same as that before the court in Haynes v. Carr, 70 N. H. 463, 40 Atl. 638, and Carr v. St. Paul's Parish, 71 N. H. 231, 51 Atl. 920. The testator devised the residue of his estate in trust for various private and public purposes, named three persons as trustees, and provided that "whenever a vacancy occurs in the board of trustees from any cause whatsoever, the remaining trustees or trustee shall nominate and appoint in writing a successor or substitute to fill such vacancy, said appointment to be approved by the judge of probate for said county of Merrimack for the time being. After the decease of a trustee named in the will, the plaintiffs, who are the surviving trustees, duly nominated a suitable person as successor, and filed in the probate court for Merrimack county a petition requesting that the appointment be approved. The defendant, who is the judge of probate, declined to consider the petition in his judicial capacity, but as an individual expressed his disapproval of the appointment, and these actions were thereupon brought. The defendant excepted to the introduction of evidence tending to prove the suitability of the person named by the plaintiffs as successor to the deceased trustee.

Sargent, Remick & Niles and Oliver E. Branch, for plaintiffs. Streeter & Hollis, for defendant.

YOUNG, J. The defendant says: (1) The power of approval is vested in him in his individual and not in his official capacity. (2) If it was the intention of the testator that the probate court should approve the appointment, the power of appointment fails, because it is an attempt to confer upon the court a jurisdiction not conferred by law.

1. There is no force in the defendant's first position. In title 25 of the Public Statutes, entitled "Courts of Probate, and Estates of Deceased Persons," the words "judge" and "judge of probate" are constantly used when it is apparent the probate court is intended. For example, chapter 182, Pub. St. 1901, is entitled "Judges of Probate and Their Jurisdiction." It is a matter of common knowledge that, when a person attending to probate business or considering probate matters speaks of referring anything to the judge of probate, he usually intends the probate court, and not the person who exercises the function of that office. That is probably the sense in which Mr. Pearson used the words in his will, for the probate court has jurisdiction of wills and of the estates of deceased persons. Pub. St. 1901, c. 182, § 2. When he provided that the persons who were to administer the trust he was creating should be approved by the judge of probate, there is a presumption that the probate court was intended; and the fact that the law makes it the duty of that court to approve the appointment of trustees, as will hereafter appear, makes that presumption so strong that the mere addition of the words "for the time being" is not enough to rebut it.

2. The defendant's second position is also unsound, for clause 12, § 2, c. 185, Pub. St. 1901, authorizes the probate court to appoint the trustees named in a will; and a trustee who is named in the way the testator has provided to perpetuate the trust is "named in the will," within the meaning of that statute. Shaw v. Paine, 12 Allen, 293, 296. It is the duty of the probate court to administer trusts created by wills. Pub. St. 1901, c. 198. This duty necessarily carries with it that of appointing the trustees needed to execute such trusts (Pub. St. 1901, c. 185, § 2, cl. 12; Id. c. 198, § 6), and that of removing them if they become incapable or unfit to perform their duties. Id. c. 198, § 8. Since it is the duty of the court to remove trustees who are unfit to administer their trusts, it cannot be the duty of the court to appoint a person to that position unless it appears that he is fit for it, notwithstanding he is named as trustee in the will which creates the trust; for it would be a manifest absurdity to say that it is the duty of the court to appoint a person trustee when it would be its duty to remove him as soon as he was appointed. So it must always appear that the person named in the will is a fit person to execute the trust, for otherwise it would be the duty of the court to refuse to appoint him. In other words, it is the duty of the probate court to appoint trustees whenever they are needed to administer trusts created by wills; but its authority in that respect is limited to persons who are suitable to execute the trust, both when the trustees are named in the will which creates the trust, and when the will contains no provision for the appointment of the trustees. Therefore the suitability of the trustee is a fact that must be proved in every case, before the court is authorized to make the appointment. In other words, the probate court must decide that the person named in the will is a suitable person to administer the trust before it can appoint him to that position. This is the statutory rule in respect to appointing the executors who are named in a will. Pub. St. 1901, c. 188, § 2, cl. 1; Id. c. 188, § 3. There is no more reason for requiring the court to examine into the suitability of executors to administer a deceased person's estate than there is for requiring it to inquire into the suitability of trustees to administer a trust the deceased person created. The fact that the statute makes it the duty of the probate court to inquire as to the suitability of the person named as executor before appointing him to that position tends to prove that the Legislature intended that the court should inquire as to the suitability of the person named as trustee before appointing him to that position. Since the law makes it the duty of the probate court to approve of trustees named in a will before appointing them, it is obvious that the mere fact that the testator made it the duty of the probate court to approve trustees named in accordance with the provisions of the will does not make it illegal for the court to approve them; for it cannot be illegal for the court to do its duty merely because some one requests it.

Case discharged. All concurred.

In re MOEBUS.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Oct. 8, 1905.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS — RETURN OF ESCAPED CONVICT TO PRISON—RIGHT TO PROCESS—ISSUE OF IDENTITY.

A person confined in state prison, on the ground that he is an escaped convict sentenced to a term of imprisonment, is entitled to process which will enable him to try the issue of whether he is the convict or not, unless the question of identity has been determined against him by a court having jurisdiction in a proceeding to which he and the state were parties.

2. SAME—ISSUES.

Where the petitioner, in a petition for a writ of habeas corpus for his discharge from the state prison, where he is confined on the ground that he is an escaped convict under sentence of imprisonment, expressly states that he does not wish to try the issue whether he is the convict or not, and the state asserts that he is, the court will assume that he is the convict.

3. APPEAL—FAILURE TO EXCEPT TO RULING OF LOWER COURT—EFFECT.

The rule that the failure to except to the ruling of the superior court prevents the appellant from raising the same question in the Supreme Court may be waived when justice requires it.

4. HABEAS CORPUS — RETURN OF ESCAPED CONVICT TO PRISON—ISSUES.

Where the person brought into the state and confined in the state prison on the ground that he is an escaped convict under sentence is the convict, there is no occasion for the trial of any question between him and the state, unless the state desires to inflict further punishment for the escape, as authorized by Pub. St. c. 285, § 18; Id., c. 253, § 14.

5. SAME—FAILURE TO PROSECUTE FOR ESCAPE.

The failure of the state to prosecute an escaped convict, brought into the state and confined in the state prison under the sentence, for the escape, punishable by Pub. St. c. 285, § 18, and Id. c. 253, § 14, gives him no ground for complaint.

6. ARREST—AUTHORITY TO ARREST ESCAPED CONVICT.

One under sentence for felony and unlawfully at large may be arrested and returned to imprisonment, even by a private person, without a warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Arrest, § 144.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW—IMPRISONMENT.

A person sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of years escaped after a few months' imprisonment. He was recaptured and returned to prison. Held, that he could be lawfully kept in prison until the expiration of the term.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 8314.]

Petition for writ of habeas corpus by Henry E. Moebus, praying for his discharge from the state prison. Denied.

Petition for a writ of habeas corpus, filed September 21, 1905. The petitioner alleges, in substance, that he was brought into this jurisdiction from the state of New York, of which he is a resident, upon a requisition issued by the Governor of this state, and was committed to the state prison, where he has been held as a convict since November 8, 1900; that he was committed without due formality of law and is illegally detained; and that he has not been informed "by a competent court" why he is thus deprived of his liberty. The prayer is that the warden of the state prison may be ordered to bring the petitioner before the court, for the purpose of examining the question whether he was lawfully entitled to a hearing before a competent court within this state prior to his commitment to prison, and that the petitioner may be liberated if the court should find that he was so entitled. The state claimed that the petitioner is Mark Shinborn, who was committed to the state prison in 1895 for a term of 10 years and escaped after serving a few months of the sentence. The petitioner denied that he is Shinborn, but expressly declined to try the question of his identity, and based his right to a discharge upon grounds considered in the opinion.

Henry E. Moebus, pro se. Edwin G. Eastman, Atty. Gen., for the State.

PARSONS, C. J. The petitioner is now confined in the state prison under a decree of the court sentencing one Mark Shinborn to 10 years' imprisonment. If the petitioner is Moebus and not Shinborn, he is illegally confined and is entitled to be discharged. Unless the question of identity has been determined against him by some court with jurisdiction of the question, in a proceeding to which he and the state were parties, so that he is estopped by legal adjudication to now contend that he is not Shinborn, the petitioner is entitled to process which will enable him to try that question, and to a discharge, if the fact be found in his favor. But the petitioner expressly states that he does not desire to try this question, and asserts his purpose to withdraw his petition if the court permits such trial. In this situation, the state asserting that the petitioner is Shinborn and the petitioner refusing to join issue on that assertion, it must be taken for the purposes of the case that the petitioner is Shinborn. Whether this court has original jurisdiction to entertain a petition for a writ of habeas corpus (Pub. St. c. 239, §§ 3, 18; Laws 1901, p. 563, c. 78, §§ 2, 5, 7) is a question of grave doubt, and one which we are not inclined to pass upon except when necessarily raised and fully argued. If the application were made to the superior court, the two legal questions which the petitioner presents might be readily raised and transferred.

It also appears by the petitioner's brief that application has at some time been made to the superior court, and a ruling had upon one, at least, of the questions now sought to be presented. Failure to except to such ruling would under the rules prevent the petitioner from raising the question here, but the rule may be waived when justice requires; and to send the petitioner to the superior court merely for the purpose of presenting the questions in a formal manner is not usually considered necessary, when the questions are so presented that they can be fairly considered. Hutchinson v. Railway, 73 N. H. 271, 277, 60 Atl. 1011. This court has jurisdiction to determine the legal questions raised. The manner of their presentation is one of form merely. If these questions are determined favorably to the petitioner, the question of jurisdiction to issue the writ will be presented. But the answer to these questions renders it unnecessary to consider whether this court should itself issue the writ or send the petitioner to the superior court.

The petitioner claims that his present detention is illegal because, after he was brought into this state upon the claim that he was an escaped convict under sentence to the state prison, he was not tried upon the issue whether he was the convict the state alleged him to be. If the petitioner was Shinborn, an escaped convict, when brought within this state, there was no occasion for the trial of any question between him and the state, and no question to try, unless the state desired to, and could, inflict further punishment for the escape. Pub. St. c. 285, § 13; Id. c. 258, § 14. The failure of the state to prosecute a person for a crime admittedly committed by him gives him no ground of complaint.

Being under sentence for felony and unlawfully at large, Shinborn could lawfully be arrested and returned to imprisonment, even by a private person, without warrant. State v. Holmes, 48 N. H. 377. The foundation of the petitioner's claim to a trial before his committal to prison rests upon the contention that he was not Shinborn. If he was Shinborn, no wrong has been done him. If he is not Shinborn, he was illegally committed and is illegally confined. He may be entitled now to a trial of that question, if none has been had. As he declines to ask for such trial, and refuses to contest the issue if raised by the state, no ground of error appears. As heretofore said, his refusal to litigate the question of his identity is an admission that he is Shinborn, and it follows that he is legally confined in the state prison, unless his term of imprisonment has expired. This is the second point made by the petitioner.

In 1865, Shinborn was sentenced to imprisonment for 10 years in state prison. After a few months he escaped, but was recaptured in 1900, and has since been confined in prison. He has therefore been imprisoned about 5 years, whereas the term of imprisonment which the sentence of the court imposed upon him was twice that which he has served. "The sentence of the law is to be satisfied only by the actual suffering of the imprisonment imposed, unless remitted by death or some legal authority. The punishment is imprisonment, the period of which is expressed only by the designated length of time. Neither the date of its commencement, nor of its expiration, is fixed by the terms of the sentence." Dolan's Case, 101 Mass. 219, 222; In re Edwards, 43 N. J. Law, 555, 39 Am. Rep. 610; Sartain v. State, 10 Tex. App. 651, 38 Am. Rep. 649, and note 653; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 313. The judgment of the court was that Shinborn should be confined in the state prison for the term of 10 years. It does not appear that the time when the imprisonment should commence or the date when it should end were stated in the order under which the execution of the sentence began. If either was, the order was no part of the sentence. Ex parte Howard, 17 N. H. 545. The warden of the prison can lawfully keep Shinborn until the judgment of the court that he be there imprisoned 10 years has been performed.

Upon neither of the grounds urged by the petitioner can his discharge be justified. It appears by the petition and papers filed therewith that the petitioner has not been deprived of an opportunity to litigate the question of identity, upon which the rightfulness of his imprisonment depends, but that he refused to proceed to such a trial when opportunity therefor was afforded him by the superior court. No occasion appears for the exercise of any supervisory power of this court. It also appears that the petitioner's application to the federal court had the same result. If for reasons satisfactory to himself the petitioner, while contending that he is not Shinborn but Moebus, persists in refusing to submit the question to some tribunal with jurisdiction to decide it, he must submit to confinement as Shinborn.

Petition denied. All concurred.

HADS v. TIERNAN.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

DEED—DESCRIPTION—RESERVATION.

The premises were described in a deed as a lot 38 feet by 33 feet "with a two-story frame dwelling thereon, being one-half of double house thereon, to have and to hold said described lot and one-half of double house now thereon." The lines of the lot which the grantee understood she was to have included the whole of the double house. Held, that all that was reserved to the grantor was one-half of the building.

Appeal from Superior Court.

Action by Bridget Hads against Thomas J. Tiernan. From a judgment of the superior court (25 Pa. Super. Ct. 14), affirming a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before DEAN, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

Thomas H. Greevy and D. Clare Good, for appellant. S. B. Hare and Thomas C. Hare, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The deed from the appellant to the appellee, under which she claims title and right of possession, is for a lot of ground situated in the city of Altoona, on the northeast side of Tenth street, containing in front 38 feet and running back 33 feet. A verdict was directed in her favor by the common pleas, and the judgment on it was affirmed by the superior court. Hads v. Tiernan, 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 14. The defense of the appellant is that a recovery ought to have been allowed for but one half of the lot, because he had excepted the other half under the following clause in the deed: "To have and to hold said described lot or piece of ground and one-half the double house now thereon." The conveyance is of a lot of ground 38 by 33 feet, with no reservation or exception of any interest in it by the grantor. The grantee testified that she understood she was getting just what the deed calls for, and her brother, the grantor, admits that, in compliance with her demand that she should have 38 feet of ground, he executed the deed to her for a lot of the dimensions called for in it, thinking that, because he had reserved one-half of the double house, the deed would not amount to anything for the one-half of the lot on which the same was erected. On this state of facts, whether the rights of the parties are to be determined from the words of the conveyance, or from the admission of the appellant that his sister understood he was conveying to her the lot she is now claiming, with one-half of the building on it reserved, the only conclusion to be arrived at is that of the common pleas and the superior court. The brother thought he was deceiving his sister; but he was not, in law or in fact. The deed on its face gives her just what she thought she was getting, and by his admission he is estopped from saying he conveyed anything less. If he reserved anything, it was but one-half of the building which his sister has agreed he may remove. As to his claim to title by adverse possession, the testimony discloses nothing more than his retention of possession of the land sold to his vendee, for whom he held it in trust, and against whom he could not start the statute of limitations until he manifested his intention to change the character of his possession by some act of hostility to her title plainly indicating to her his intention to deny her right and to hold adversely to it. Buckholder v. Sigler, 7 Watts & S. 154; Olwine v. Holman, 23 Pa. 279; Ingles v. Ingles, 150 Pa. 397, 24 Atl. 677; Connor v. Bell, 152 Pa. 444, 25 Atl. 802.

Judgment affirmed.

CHASE v. CLEARFIELD LUMBER CO., Limited.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

DEED—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE.

An assignment of an interest in land was found in the assignor's safe after his death. The safe had been used by members of the family as a repository for their papers. There was evidence from which the jury could have inferred an actual delivery to the assignee, who was a member of the family of the assignor. Held, that the question of delivery was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 127, 633.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Clearfield County.

Action by Jane Chase against the Clearfield Lumber Company, Limited. Judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See 58 Atl. 813.

Argued before DEAN, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

David L. Krebs and A. M. Liveright, for appellant. J. B. McNally and W. Clark Miller, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. As evidence of her title to the land from which the appellant cut the timber, the plaintiff produced and offered at the trial the assignment to her by John M. Chase, her father-in-law, dated February 28, 1879. To repel the presumption that it had been delivered to her, appellant called B. F. Chase, a son of John M. Chase and one of his executors, who testified that after his father's death he found the assignment in a box or the safe that had belonged to him. He was not certain whether he found it in the box or safe, but thought that most of the papers were in the safe, and the contention of the appellant is that it was there found. The witness, however, testified still further that various kinds of paper, such as contracts and insurance policies, belonging to other members of the family, were found in the safe, and added, "Father's safe was everybody's safe." There were facts and circumstances from which the jury could fairly have inferred that the deceased had actually passed the title to his daughter-in-law; and the finding of the assignment in his safe after his death is entirely consistent with his delivery of it to her, in view of the explanation of the son, called by the defendant, that the safe was "everybody's safe," for she may have deposited it there, as other members of the family had deposited their papers in it. The question of delivery was purely one of fact for the jury, and was submitted to them under proper and careful instructions. The offer, which is the subject of the third assignment of error, was properly disallowed; for it was not to show that the appellee, by anything she had said or done, had estopped herself from asserting her title.

Judgment affirmed.

In re SCRANTON SEWER.

Appeal of LACKAWANNA IRON & STEEL CO.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1906.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — IMPROVEMENTS — APPEAL FROM VIEWERS.

Provisions of Act May 16, 1891 (P. L. 75), providing for an appeal from confirmation of the report of viewers in the matter of municipal improvements within 30 days, are repeated in an amendment of the act, passed April 2, 1903 (P. L. 124). Held, that this permission to appeal does not take away the right given by act May 19, 1897 (P. L. 67), to appeal within 6 months.

2. SAME — ORDINANCE — ALTERATION OF PLAN — LIABILITY OF ABUTTING OWNERS.

A city by ordinance authorized the construction of sewers in certain city streets and alleys, and viewers were appointed to assess the cost. The chief engineer of the city, on the suggestion of the director of public works, erased from the map showing the location of the sewers certain portions of streets and alleys, because in his judgment the improvement thereof was not justified, and the improvements were made in accordance with the map so altered. Held, that a property owner could not be compelled to pay an assessment for benefits to his property arising from the construction of the sewer under the altered plan.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Lackawanna County.

In the matter of the cost and expenses of sewer section G, Seventeenth sewer district, of the city of Scranton. From an order dismissing the exceptions, the Lackawanna Iron & Steel Company appeals. Reversed.

Among the exceptions was the following: "Fourth The plans prepared for the said work and filed in the bureau of engineering, and which are distinctly referred to and made part of said ordinance, included as a portion of the territory to be sewered by said sewer certain lots and blocks situate south of Gallagher court, which said lots and blocks were eliminated by the city engineer after the passage of said ordinance and after approval of the said plans and specifications, and were not taken into consideration by the viewers, so that the viewers' report is based upon a different territory from that which is involved in the ordinance and in the plans and specifications prepared for said work. This change of territory invalidates the ordinance completely." The facts are stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and DEAN, BROWN, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

Everett Warren, John F. Murphy, and Harold A. Watres, for appellant. David J. Davis, City Sol., and H. R. Van Deusen, Asst. City Sol., for appellee.

BROWN, J. There was a motion to quash this appeal, because it was not taken within 30 days from the confirmation of the report of the viewers. It is based upon the act of May 16, 1891 (P. L. 75), which provides that an appeal may be taken within 30 days. This provision reappears in an amendment to the act passed April 2, 1903, P. L. 124. The permission to appeal within 30 days does not take away the right given by the act of May 19, 1897 (P. L. 67), to appeal within 6 months, and the motion is therefore denied.

An ordinance of the city of Scranton, approved September 5, 1902, authorizes the construction of a sewer in certain streets and courts between designated points, to be known as "section G" in the Seventeenth sewer district of that city. On September 8, 1902, the city presented its petition to the court below, reciting the passage of the said ordinance, and asking for the appointment of viewers to assess the costs and expense of the sewer and the benefits resulting from it, in accordance with the act of May 16, 1891 (P. L. 75). Viewers were appointed, who made report, assessing the sum of $16,808.42 to be paid by the appellant for the benefits to its properties. Though the viewers were appointed to assess the cost, expense, and benefits of a sewer to be built on lines clearly designated in the ordinance, they assessed the cost and expense of the construction and the benefits of a different one. No other action than the ordinance of September 5, 1902, was ever taken by the city councils in reference to the sewer; but the chief engineer of the city, upon the suggestion of his superior, the director of public works, blotted out from the map showing the location of the sewer certain portions of streets and courts on which it is to be constructed, because, in his judgment, the improvements in the blotted-out portions do not justify the extension of the sewer through them. Just when he assumed this wholly unwarranted authority does not appear; but, when the viewers met, they confined their investigation to what must be regarded as the sewer system of the chief engineer, and not the one adopted by the city authorities. That official blotted out Irving avenue from Front street to Moosic street, though the ordinance directs the sewer to be constructed from Front street to Moosic street, and thence to River street. He blotted out Front street from South Webster street to Irving avenue, and portions of Gallagher and other courts in the same locality. Though the ordinance called for the sewer in these blotted-out portions of the streets and courts, the viewers passed upon the question of the cost and expense and the resultant benefits, as if it were to be constructed only on the lines indicated on the tampered-with map. They followed the map of an engineer; but they were directed to act in pursuance of the provisions of an ordinance of the city of Scranton, and to ascertain and assess the cost and expense and assess liability for the sewer therein specifically designated. Sewer systems can be adopted only by ordinance, but the one upon which the appellant has been assessed for benefits is nothing but that of a city's employé.

In dismissing appellant's second exception to the report of viewers, the court below said: "There remains to be considered the effect of a variance between the first section of the ordinance and the map or plan attached as part thereof in respect to the extent of the proposed sewer. This section of the ordinance specifies certain blocks of streets and courts in which the sewer is to be built, which were originally included in the map, but afterwards, before the appointment of viewers and without amendment, the department of public works decided to omit, and thereupon they were obliterated on the map, and the view was had according to the map as so altered, and therefore not strictly according to the ordinance. The question so presented is really one of first impressions and by no means free from difficulty. On the one hand, the alteration of the map was entirely unauthorized and in a sense unlawful. At first blush it would seem to go so materially to the integrity of the proceeding as to make it invalid. But, on the other hand, we are unable to discover, and counsel have not indicated to us, how the exceptants have been or may be injuriously affected by that means. There were no damages involved in the case. Neither the cost of the sewer nor the benefits assessed will be increased as a result of the alteration. * * *

As a result of the change in the map, the view and the report do not go outside of the streets mentioned in the ordinance, but certain blocks or parts of streets or alleys are omitted." Whether the appellant had been injuriously affected by the change in the map and the substitution of the sewer system of the chief engineer for the one adopted by the city itself is not the test of its right to complain. The system is not its system, and it may or may not have been in favor of it. Without regard to its wishes, a sewer can be constructed by the municipality after appropriate municipal action; but only after such action and the provisions of a valid ordinance have been followed can it be called upon as the owner of private property to pay for the benefits arising from the public improvement. This is not an arbitrary rule, but a just and wise one, not to be broken in on by any exception. A municipality can impose a valid municipal lien for street improvements only when the improvements are made in pursuance of law and the mode pointed out by the city ordinance is strictly followed. Such liens do not rest on any agreement or specific assent of the owner of the land charged with the burden, and the improvement is often against his wish. A clear right must therefore be shown by the municipality to justify such an act of sovereign power. Municipal charges legally laid on lands are sufficiently large, without subjecting them to any imposed contrary to law. Western Pennsylvania Railway Co. v. City of Allegheny, 92 Pa. 100; Hershberger v. City of Pittsburgh, 115 Pa. 78, 8 Atl. 381; Morewood Avenue, Ferguson's Appeal, 159 Pa. 39, 28 Atl. 130. This is equally true of benefits assessed under the act of 1891.

The appellant can be compelled to help pay for what the ordinance provides. It cannot be assessed for anything else; but the viewers have assessed it for something else, and its complaint is, therefore, a substantial one. In asking that it pay nearly $17,000 for benefits, the city must show a sewer system to be constructed according to the directions of an ordinance; but, instead, its claim is for one mapped out by a city engineer on a map which he was not authorized to make. If his map cuts out a portion of the system as adopted by the city councils, the system is no longer the city's for the purpose of compelling property owners to contribute to the cost of its construction. To help pay for the construction of a sewer adopted by the municipal authorities is a liability to which the appellant may be subjected, but the liability imposed upon him by the report of the viewers is not such. As it must be set aside for the reason stated, the other questions raised need not now be considered.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and the report of the viewers is set aside, at the cost of the city of Scranton.

IN RE SIGEL'S ESTATE.

Appeal of SCHUDT.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CODICIL—EFFECT.

A will and a codicil must be regarded as parts of one and the same instrument, and the codicil will not be allowed to vary or modify the will, unless such was the plain intent of the testator.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 997.]

2. SAME.

Testator, after making several legacies, gave the residue of his estate to his heirs, and on the same day executed a codicil giving a certain sum to three persons, who were his heirs, "and no more." Held, that the three heirs were not excluded by the words "no more" from sharing in the balance of the estate; but such words applied only to the amounts mentioned in the codicil.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Warren County.

In the matter of the estate of Charles Sigel, deceased. From a decree distributing the estate, William Schudt appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and DEAN, BROWN, MESTREZAT, and POTTER, JJ.

John G. Johnson, Perry D. Clark, and Jacob Stern, for appellant. Frank Gunnison and T. A. Lamb, for appellees.

POTTER, J. Charles Sigel died February 21, 1904, unmarried and without issue, and leaving a large estate. On the day of his death he executed a will, by which he revoked all previous wills, gave certain legacies, and, in his own language, "the balance of my estate to the heirs of Charles Sigel"; that is, to his own heirs. On the same day he executed a codicil, which reads as follows: "I give to my sister, Matilda Sigel, of Kirchheim, Germany, Mary Schmidt, of East Orange, N. J., and Mary Schudt, of West Seneca, N. Y., each one thousand ($1,000) dollars, and to Gus Schudt, my nephew, two thousand ($2,000) dollars, and no more." It is agreed that Mary Schmidt and Mary Schudt were one and the same person, the daughter of a deceased sister of testator. Schudt was her maiden name, and Schmidt her married name. Gus Schudt was the son of testator's sister. All three legatees were heirs at law of the testator, and in the absence of the codicil would have been entitled to share in the distribution of his estate under the residuary clause of his will. Upon distribution of the balance shown by the executor's first account, the court below held that the legatees named in the codicil were entitled to receive the legacies there given them and also to share in the residuary estate under the will.

Appellant claims that this construction of the will is erroneous, and that by the use of the words "and no more" in the codicil, the testator expressed his intention that the amounts there given should be all that the legatees named should receive, and that the residue of his estate should be divided among his remaining heirs, to the exclusion of the three named in the codicil. In such a case as this, where a will and codicil are to be construed, the rule is well settled that they must be regarded as parts of one and the same instrument, and that the codicil is not to be allowed to vary or modify the will, unless such was the plain and manifest intention of the testator. In Spang v. Hill, 2 Woodw. Dec. 45, after a consideration of the authorities, the court said: "The general result of the authorities on the subject is that, notwithstanding a codicil, the provisions of a will are to stand, unless in order to effect the purposes of the codicil it is absolutely necessary that the provisions of the will shall give way." Chief Justice Mercur said, in Lewis' Appeal, 108 Pa. 133: "It is not necessary to refer to the numerous English and American authorities which hold as a canon of construction that a clear gift cannot be cut down by any subsequent words, unless they show an equally clear intention. In applying this rule, it is sufficient that the subsequent words indicate the testator's intention to cut it down with reasonable certainty, and it is not necessary to institute a comparison between the two classes as to lucidity. 1 Williams on Executors, 185. It cannot be cut down by any doubtful expressions in the codicil. The language of the latter must be such as to clearly establish the modification claimed before such effect can be given to it." And in Sheetz's Appeal, 82 Pa. 213, this court said (page 217): "The clearly expressed purpose of a testator is not to be overborne by modifying directions that are ambiguous and equivocal, and may justify either of two opposite interpretations. Such directions are to be so construed as to support the testator's clearly announced main intention." The fundamental distinction between the nature of a codicil and a later will should be borne in mind. The later will works essentially a revocation, while the codicil is a confirmation, except as to the express alterations which it may contain; and therefore, while in the case of a later will a revocation may be presumed, this is not true of a codicil. It means rather an addition than a revocation.

While no case has been found which furnishes an exact precedent for the one now before us, yet we think in principle it is to be governed by the authorities which hold that a gift once made by will is not to be cut down by a subsequent codicil, unless the intention of the testator to that effect appears clearly or by necessary implication. Where it is possible to construe the codicil so as to give effect to all the provisions of the will, it certainly should be done. We do not think that it can be said in this case that the intention of the testator to revoke the gifts of proportionate shares in the residue, made to the heirs named in the codicil, is clear from the use of the words "and no more"; for these may be construed to apply equally well as limiting the amount of the additional gifts to the sums named in the codicil. In Brisben's Appeal, reported in 1 Lanc. Bar, October 9, 1869, this court, speaking through Read, J., said: "It would appear to be perfectly reasonable that where a legacy is given by will to a particular individual, and by a codicil another legacy is given to the same person, the second should be considered as additional to the first, and therefore where a paper is codicillary, and two legacies are given to the same person, they are cumulative. The more recent decisions treat this as conclusive, unless a contrary purpose is distinctly manifested by the instruments themselves." In the present case this general principle would unquestionably make the gifts to the individuals named in the codicil cumulative, were it not for the words "and no more." The doubt raised by them is as to whether they limit the words of the will and defeat the right to share in the residue. Or do they limit only additional gifts? We are inclined to the latter construction, under the accepted principle that, where a devise is made of an estate, a revocation will not be implied, unless no other construction can be placed upon the language. In this case we think the construction adopted by the court below, which saves the right to share in the residue, is reasonable and fair. If the codicil be read into the will, it would then read, "and the balance of my estate to the heirs of Charles Sigel, and, in addition, to the persons named in the codicil the amounts therein named, and no more"; that is, in addition to their proportionate share of the residue as heirs, under the language of the will, they get, respectively, the amounts named, "and no more."

We cannot accept the view that the words "and no more" in the codicil clearly and necessarily apply to the provisions of the will and cut down the gift there made. To apply them only in limitation of the amounts named in the codicil as additional gifts seems to us quite as much in line with the probable intention of the testator as the other suggestion. In Render v. Dietrick, 7 Watts & S. 244, which was cited by the court below and by counsel for both sides, the decision was placed upon the ground that "an heir at law can only be disinherited by express devise or necessary implication, and that implication has been defined to be such a strong probability that an intention to the contrary cannot be supposed." Justice Rogers said (page 287), in language peculiarly applicable here: "It seems to me that the expression that they shall have $50, and no more, of his real and personal estate, does not raise such a strong probability, as has been shown, as that a contrary intention may not be supposed. Indeed, the difficulty arising from the imperfection of the will is to ascertain what the testator did intend. His intention is at best but matter of conjecture, and certainly on such grounds no person heretofore has been deprived of his inheritance."

We think the conclusions reached by the court below in this case are justified by reason and the authorities. The assignments of error are overruled, and the decree of the orphans' court is affirmed, and this appeal is dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

POTTER, J. We have just filed an opinion at No. 68, January term, 1905, in the appeal by William Schudt (62 Atl. 175) from the same decree, which disposes of the controlling questions raised by these appellants. Their further discussion is unnecessary. The assignments of error are overruled, and this appeal is dismissed, at the cost of the appellants.

BRENNAN v. PENNSYLVANIA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 28, 1905.)

RAILROADS — ACCIDENT AT CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

It appearing in the evidence that the driver of a team of horses attached to a wagon loaded with two logs stopped his team in the dusk of the evening upon a public highway at a point distant not less than 35 feet from the nearest rail of a railroad crossing; that he saw the flagman at the crossing come out of his shanty with a lantern and set it down, and concluded from that fact that a train was approaching; that from a point where he stopped to a point $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the crossing his view of the railroad was unobstructed; that the headlight of the locomotive was lighted; that while passing over that distance he could see a train approaching for a quarter of a mile, but did not use his powers of observation during any of that time, but drove upon the track and the horses were injured—held, that the driver was guilty of contributory negligence, and that the owner of the horses could not recover for the damage done to them, because of the contributory negligence of the driver.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by John Brennan, Jr., against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Verdict for plaintiff. Rule to show cause made absolute.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON, SWAYZE, and GARRETSON, JJ.

Allan H. Strong, for the rule. Leslie Lupton, opposed.

GARRETSON, J. The plaintiff sued to recover damages to his team of horses, wagon, and harness, caused by their being struck by an engine of the defendant company at a highway crossing known as the "Six Roads Crossing," a short distance west of Rahway. The jury gave verdict against the defendant, which it by this rule seeks to set aside.

The accident occurred January 17, 1903, at about 5:30 p. m. It was dark or twilight. The plaintiff's team was in charge of Harry Hunt, his colored driver, who was using it to haul 60-foot poles from a place called "Hoxie's" across the tracks to Woodbridge. There were two teams, both belonging to the plaintiff, one in charge of Hunt and the other in charge of James Tierney. Each team was drawing a wagon on which were two logs 60 feet in length; the front and hind wheels being about 45 feet apart. Hunt's team was in front and Tierney's was following closely. Both men were familiar with the crossing and had been carting logs over it for a considerable time. They approached the railroad on Leesville avenue, and the train from which the injury was received was west-bound on the first track to be crossed. About 70 feet from the railroad Leesville avenue runs into St. George's avenue, which crosses the railroad at right angles. The plaintiff's drivers went from Leesville avenue into St. George's avenue, and then intended to go directly across the railroad. Hunt, the driver of the injured team, stopped at the junction of Leesville avenue and St. George's avenue, then started on, and continued until his horses were struck on the first railroad track. From the place where Hunt stopped to the crossing, a distance of 70 feet, there was an unobstructed view of at least a quarter of a mile along the railroad towards Rahway (the direction from which the train in question came), except so far as the flagman's shanty interfered. The headlight of the engine was lighted. The shanty adjoins the easterly side of the highway, was 6 feet from the nearest rail of the track, and was $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet in width along the road, so that it would begin to be an obstruction $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the railroad track, while from a point 70 feet from the track to a point $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the track, or for a distance of $57\frac{1}{2}$ feet, there was an unobstructed view for a quarter of a mile.

It appears from the testimony of Hunt that, from the time he started from the place where he had stopped until his team was struck, he did not look to see whether any train was approaching. Upon his direct examination Hunt says: "The first we saw was the crossing, and I stopped right at the curve [this is at the junction of Leesville avenue and St. George's avenue], and when I stopped the flagman came out and set his light down and went back, and the fellow was behind me. He says: 'Go ahead, there is no train; for the flagman has set his light down and gone back.' I says: 'I don't know about that. We cannot always depend upon the flagman.' He says: 'Well, if there was a train coming, he would have to be out there.' So I started on, and as I got on the track he came out, and he says, 'There is a train coming,' and to come on across. Well, I went on, and the next thing I knew the light was on me of the engine, and it was zip, and it was all over." On cross-examination he testified as follows: "Q. Where were you when you stopped your horses first? Was it at the junction of the roads? A. Just; well, you cannot say about the junction of the roads. The hind part of my wagon was about at the junction; yes, the hind part; yes, right at the curve. Q. The point where you stopped as you said to look was where, just as you come from Leesville avenue into St. George's avenue? A. Yes, sir. Q. Just about the junction of the two roads? A. Yes, sir. Q. While you were standing at that point I understood you saw the flagman come out and set down his lamp? A. Yes, sir. Q. And then Jim, who was behind you on the other load, he called out to you to go ahead, that there was no train coming. Then you said you did not know about that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then you went on, did you? A. I did. I went on." He then describes the position of himself with reference to the flagman's shanty, saying: "As you come on here, when you got to the shanty on the wagon, you were right by the shanty, and there is the track.

Q. That is, when you were sitting on the wagon opposite the shanty, the horses are on the track? A. Yes, sir; and the driver is by the shanty. When I reached the shanty, he came out and said, 'Go ahead, a train is coming,' or he said, 'Come on,' or something of that kind, or 'Go ahead, a train is coming.' Q. That is, just when you were sitting on your wagon, just opposite the watchman's shanty? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then he came out and said to you, 'Go ahead, there is a train coming?' A. Yes, sir; and the horse's head was then about on the first track. A. When he said that to you, was your wagon standing or was it moving? A. We were going along. Q. From the time that you stopped up here at the junction of the two roads you went right on, did you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where was the train when you first saw it coming? A. Well, I could not tell you; all I seen was the light and the light was on me then." When the plaintiff rested, counsel for the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's driver in passing over the distance from where he stopped to the track, where there was an uninterrupted view from the stopping place until interrupted by the flagman's shanty. The trial Justice then requested Hunt, the driver, to say how far away from the track the place was where he first stopped, and Hunt then testified it was about 80 or 35 feet from the nearest track.

Upon these facts we think the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's servant is clear. Van Riper v. N. Y. S. & W. R. R. Co. (N. J. Sup.) 59 Atl. 26; Beeg v. N. Y. S. & W. R. R., 70 N. J. Law, 56, 56 Atl. 169; Conkling v. Erie R. R., 63 N. J. Law, 338, 43 Atl. 686; Hoopes v. W. Jersey & Seashore R. R. Co., 65 N. J. Law, 89, 47 Atl. 27; Dotty v. Atlantic City R. R. Co., 64 N. J. Law, 710, 46 Atl. 772; Winter v. N. Y. & L. B. R. R. Co., 66 N. J. Law, 677, 50 Atl. 339; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Leary, 56 N. J. Law, 705, 29 Atl. 678; D. L. & W. R. R. Co. v. Hefferman, 57 N. J. Law, 149, 30 Atl. 578; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Richter, 42 N. J. Law, 180. Nor are we able to perceive how the plaintiff is relieved from the effects of the contributory negligence of his driver by the action of the flagman. The first act of the flagman was to come out of the shanty, put his light outside, and go into the shanty again. This could only indicate that the flagman was preparing to give a signal to an approaching train. It was not a signal for travelers on the highway, else he would have remained outside with his light at all times for the benefit of those likely to come along at any time; while, if it were for the trains, it would only be used at times when a train was due or was seen approaching by the flagman, and the testimony is that the driver understood a white light means there is a train coming. It was testified that the flagman made use of certain words and that these words were an invitation to the driver to cross. These words are variously testified to as "Get across, there is a train coming," or "There is a train coming and to come across," or "Go ahead, a train is coming," or "Come on." These words were used when the driver of the injured team was opposite the shanty and the horses were on the track, as appears by the testimony already referred to, and Tierney, the other driver, testifies that the flagman came out with a light and put it outside, but did not say anything, and he did not come out until Harry struck the crossing with the team, and then said, "Get across, there is a train coming." These words, used under these circumstances, cannot be regarded as an invitation to the driver to cross with an assurance that it was safe. It was rather a notice to the driver that he was in danger and to escape the danger he must get across. But the conduct of the flagman, although amounting to an invitation, can never relieve the traveler from the obligation to look out for his own safety. Swanson v. Central R. R. Co., 63 N. J. Law, 605, 44 Atl. 852; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Pfuels, 60 N. J. Law, 278, 37 Atl. 1100.

The rule to show cause is made absolute.

MILLER et al. v. WILLETT et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. 20, 1905.)

1. EQUITY—BILL—DEMURRER.

A bill of complaint, which states that the complainants jointly have rights of action against several defendants, no one of whom is liable in whole or in part for the others' debt, which asks neither accounting nor discovery, but demands simply the payment by each defendant separately of a definitely ascertained sum of money, which shows no joint or related liability between the defendants, and which alleges neither the breach of a trust, the perpetration of a fraud, nor any other ground for equitable relief, is demurrable for want of equity.

2. SAME—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

Such a bill is multifarious, in that it subjects unrelated defendant, who the bill shows is entitled to defend separately, to the embarrassment of defending a suit in which others are joined as defendants with whom he has no apparent common interest.

3. SAME—WANT OF EQUITY.

A bill which seeks to enforce a statutory obligation in the nature of a guaranty of a debt, by compelling the payment of sums largely in excess of the amount necessary to satisfy that debt, is demurrable for want of equity.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Bill by Alfred L. Miller and others against John A. Willett and others. Demurrer to bill sustained.

The bill of complaint in this cause is filed by Alfred L. Miller and more than 450 other persons, who allege themselves to be residents in the state of Colorado and to be all of the depositors in and creditors of the State Bank of Monte Vista, in the county of Rio Grande, in that state. The defendants are John A. Willett and 19 others, who are in the bill alleged to be the only shareholders in said bank and persons liable for the debts within the jurisdiction of this court. The bill of complaint alleges: That the State Bank of Monte Vista, since the 11th day of August, 1890, has been, and still is, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Colorado, having a capital stock which as increased is $80,000, divided into 800 shares, of the par value of $100 each. That the said bank conducted, in three different places in Colorado, a general banking business, until June 15, 1899, when it became insolvent, and on that day made an assignment under the laws of the state of Colorado and appointed one Norman H. Chapman as assignee. That the assignee qualified and took possession of the property and choses in action of the bank, converted them into money, and paid them out to the creditors of said bank, and that nothing remains for distribution, all the property and choses in action having been disposed of, resulting in the payment by said assignee upon the indebtedness of the bank as of December 15, 1899, of 15 per cent., and of December 1, 1901, of 4½ per cent., and that, if any further moneys are recovered for said bank creditors, it must be from the stockholders upon their stock liability. That the complainants deposited in that bank at times while the defendants were shareholders therein, and that the balances of complainants' deposits remaining in the bank at the date of its failure were the sums stated in the list set forth in the bill of complaint, amounting in the aggregate to $66,115.93. That the present total indebtedness of the said bank (after crediting the payments made thereon by the assignee, amounting to $11,646.90) amounts to $56,469.03, upon which the complainants claim interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from June 15, 1899, being the rate of interest allowed by law in the state of Colorado. The complainants further allege: That the laws of the state of Colorado at the time of the organization of the bank provided as follows (Laws Colo. 1885, p. 264, No. 243, § 1): "Shareholders in banks, savings banks, trust deposit and security associations, shall be individually responsible for debts, contracts and engagements of the said association in double the amount of the par value of the stock owned by them respectively." That said law has been at all times since the organization of the bank, and now is, in full force and effect. The bill of complaint further alleges: That when the complainants became creditors of said bank the defendants in this bill were shareholders therein, and continued to be shareholders at the date of said bank's assignment, and that the number of shares held by each defendant is as follows: John A. Willett, 5 shares; Robert D. Kent, 5 shares; Frederick Lowe, 5 shares; William P. Aldrich, 30 shares; Edo Kipp, 5 shares;

Anna Basch, 40 shares; Moses E. Worthen, 30 shares; Estate of C. Aldrich, 30 shares. The bill of complaint further alleges that said Edo Kipp, died February 16, 1899, seised of certain lands, etc., leaving a last will whereof Arrianna Van Houten and Ella K. Goodlatte were appointed executrices; that they probated said will on March 1, 1899, before the surrogate of Passaic county, and undertook the administration of the estate of said decedent; that said Kipp left him surviving as his heirs at law and devisees of his lands, etc., Arrianna Van Houten, Ella K. Goodlatte, Peter E. Kipp, John M. Kipp, and Mary Kipp; that said Peter E. Kipp has since died; and the complainants charge that said Arrianna Van Houten, Ella K. Goodlatte, John M. Kipp, and John E. Kipp, and Mary Kipp, heirs, and devisees of said Edo Kipp, are severally and individually liable for the obligation of said Edo Kipp under the will as above stated. The bill of complaint further alleges that Anna Basch departed this life on November 24, 1903, seised of certain lands, etc., testate, as by her last will appointed Henry L. Basch, Isaac Basch, and Marion Feeder, executors of her will, who on December 5, 1903, proved the same before the surrogate of Passaic county and took upon themselves the burden of the execution thereof. That said Anna Basch left her surviving as her heirs at law and devisees of her lands, etc., Isaac Basch, Marion Feeder, James S. Basch, Carrie Basch, Matilda Basch, and Anna J. Basch, who, the complainants charge, are severally and individually liable for the obligation of said Annie Basch, under the will aforesaid. The bill further alleges that said Moses E. Worthen departed this life December 26, 1897, testate, seised of certain lands, etc., and by his last will appointed the Passaic Trust & Safe Deposit Company executor and trustee, which company on January 7, 1898, probated said will before the surrogate of Passaic county and undertook to execute the same, and that said Moses E. Worthen left him surviving, as his heirs at law and devisees of his lands, etc., Irene C. Worthen, now Irene C. Mansur, Harry Worthen, Frank Popple, Jr., Bessie Popple; and the Passaic Trust & Safe Deposit Company, trustee, and the complainants charge that the said heirs and devisees are severally and individually liable for the obligation of said Moses P. Worthen, as above stated. The bill of complaint further alleges that William P. Aldrich upon his individual responsibility, but in the name of the "Estate of C. Aldrich," subscribed for 30 shares of the stock of said bank, and was a shareholder therein when the complainants became creditors and at the time of the assignment made by said bank, to the extent of 30 shares, and the complainants charge that said William P. Aldrich, upon subscribing to said stock, became and was individually liable for the obligation entered into as above named, and agreed to assume, and did assume, the liability for the debts of said bank (in case of insufficiency of the corporate assets to liquidate such indebtedness), in double the amount of the par value of the stock subscribed for in the name of "Estate of C. Aldrich"; and the complainants charge that said William P. Aldrich is indebted to complainants in double the amount of the par value of said stock. The bill further alleges that by virtue of the statute of the state of Colorado, pursuant to which said State Bank of Monte Vista was incorporated, each and every stockholder of said bank agreed to assume, and did assume, liability for the indebtedness of said bank (in case of deficiency of its assets to liquidate its indebtedness) in double the amount of the par value of his stock; and the complainants charge that the defendants, by virtue of the provisions of said statute, are severally and individually indebted to the complainants in double the amount of the par value of the stock in the bill of complaint set forth as being held by them respectively. The bill prays that the defendants John A. Willett, Robert E. Kent, and Frederick Lowe, may be decreed to pay to the complainants the sum of $1,000 each; the defendant William P. Aldrich the sum of $12,000; the defendants Arrianna Van Houten, Ella K. Goodlatte, John M. Kipp, John E. Kipp, and Mary Kipp, as heirs at law of Edo Kipp, deceased, the sum of $1,000; the defendants Isaac Basch, Marion Feeder, James S. Basch, Carrie Basch, Matilda Basch, and Emma J. Basch, as heirs at law and devisees of Anna Basch, the sum of $8,000; the defendants Irene C. Mansur, Marry Worthen, Frank Popple, Jr., Bessie Popple, and the Passaic Trust & Safe Deposit Company, trustee, as heirs at law and devisees of Moses P. Worthen, deceased, the sum of $6,000; and for further relief, etc.

Seven separate demurrers have been filed to the bill of complaint; one by John A. Willett, another by Robert E. Kent, another by William P. Aldrich, another by Fred Lowe, another by the Passaic Trust & Safe Deposit Company, trustee, another by Isaac Basch, Marion Feeder, James S. Basch, Carrie Basch, and Emma J. Basch, and another by Arrianna Van Houten, Ella K. Goodlatte, John M. Kipp, John E. Kipp, and Mary Kipp. Thirteen grounds of demurrer are stated by the different demurrants, which are substantially the same. They are as follows: "(1) That the complainants have not in their bill stated such a case as entitled them in a court of equity to any relief against the defendants or any of them, as to the matters contained in said bill. (2) That it appears by the bill of complaint that the names of the natural persons and of the corporations, complainants, are not accurately or correctly set forth in said bill; and their residences are not definitely given. (3) That it appears by the bill that there are divers other persons who are necessary parties to said bill and who are not made parties thereto; and in particular it appears by the bill that the State Bank of Monte Vista named in said bill is a necessary party thereto, and that Norman H. Chapman as assignee for the benefit of creditors named in said bill is a necessary party thereto, but that neither of said necessary parties is made a party to said bill. (4) That it appears by the said bill that complete justice can be done only by the courts of the jurisdiction where the corporation, the said State Bank of Monte Vista, was created, and that, only a part of the stockholders being parties defendant to this proceeding, it is not within the province or power of this court to make the ascertainment and afford the equitable relief contemplated by the Colorado statute, and, therefore, the bill should be dismissed. (5) That it does not appear by the bill of complaint that the complainants have recovered judgments upon their claims against the State Bank of Monte Vista in the state of Colorado or elsewhere, or have had in any way the validity of their claims judicially determined against said bank. (6) That it does not appear by said bill that the validity of the claims of the complainants has been established against the stockholders of said bank by the assignee of said bank or by any court. (7) That it does not appear by said bill that the assets of said bank were legally and properly administered and the proceeds justly and equitably applied to the reduction of the debts of the creditors. (8) That it does not appear by said bill that the assets of the said bank were ascertained and administered in any suit or proceeding to which the stockholders of said bank were parties or wherein the rights and equities of the stockholders of said bank were duly regarded. (9) That the complainants' rights depend upon the statute of the state of Colorado, which cannot be equitably enforced by this court in view of the circumstances set forth in the bill of complaint. (10) The statute of Colorado, upon which the complainants rely, contemplates a proceeding in equity in the domiciliary jurisdiction by the creditors of the corporation against all the stockholders thereof, for the purpose of establishing a pro rata liability. This court will not enforce the liability created by the statute of Colorado in a suit by creditors against a few of the stockholders. (11) That the liability imposed upon stockholders by the provisions of the statute of the state of Colorado quoted in the bill of complaint is not enforceable in the courts of this state. (12) That the said bill of complaint does not set forth any facts showing a liability on the part of this defendant for the debts of Moses E. Worthen, mentioned in said bill. (13) That it appears by the bill that the same is exhibited against this defendant and several other defendants for distinct matters and causes, in several whereof, as appears by the bill, this defendant is in any manner concerned, and that the bill is multifarious."

The cause was argued on these grounds of demurrer.

GREY, V. C. (after stating the facts). The Colorado statute, which is the basis of this suit, declares that the shareholders of banks in that state shall be individually responsible for the debts of the bank in double the amount of the par value of the stock owned by them respectively. The bill of complaint is filed against 11 defendants in different groups, alleging that each group is severally and respectively indebted to the complainants in a certain named sum of money. The complainants pray that each group of defendants may be decreed to pay to the complainants the definite amount of money named in the bill of complaint. This cause has been argued upon the widest possible basis, presenting variant constructions of the Colorado statute above quoted, and citing numerous decisions in different states touching the meaning of that act, the proper mode of procedure to enforce it, and also discussing the constitutionality, operation, and effect of the New Jersey act of March 30, 1897 (P. L. 1897, p. 124), prohibiting suits of this character in the courts of this state, unless the corporation and all of its stockholders shall be made parties.

I have not found it to be necessary to consider each of the grounds of demurrer to the complainants' bill of complaint, inasmuch as several of the objections presented, affect the whole case, as the complainants have stated it in their bill of complaint, and when determined must dispose of these demurrers. The first cause of demurrer challenges the bill of complaint upon the ground that the complainants have not set forth such a case as entitles them to any relief in equity, etc. As the complainants state their cause of complaint, they have a right to the payment of seven definitely ascertained sums of money. They seek separate money decrees, that certain named defendants shall respectively pay these several sums, and they ask no other relief. The following summary of the prayer for relief exhibits this feature of the bill of complaint. The complainants pray that John A. Willett may be decreed to pay $1,000; that Robert D. Kent may be decreed to pay $1,000; that Frederick Lowe may be decreed to pay $1,000; that William P. Aldrich may be decreed to pay $12,000; that Arrianna Van Houten, Ella K. Goodlatte, John E. Kipp, and Mary Kipp, as heirs and devisees, may be decreed to pay $1,000; that Isaac Basch, Marion Feeder, James S. Basch, Carrie Basch, Matilda Basch, and Emma J. Basch, as heirs and devisees, may be decreed to pay $8,000; that Irene C. Mansur, Harry Worthen, Frank Poppie, Jr., Bessie Poppie, and the Passaic Trust, etc., heirs and devisees, etc., may be decreed to pay $6,000. It is not asserted that any group of defendants which is alleged to owe one of these definite sums is in any way liable in whole or in part for any other of them. Nothing in the expressions of the bill suggests that there is any need of an accounting as between the complainants and any or all of the defendants. No discovery is sought by the bill of complaint. No facts are stated which indicate the existence of any trust which is sought to be enforced, nor is any fraud alleged against which relief is asked. Nor is any other element of equity jurisdiction presented by the complainants' bill of complaint. All that is alleged is that certain named defendants are indebted in certain definitely ascertained sums of money to the complainants, which they seek to recover severally in full, from the respective defendants, by this suit. As the complainants state their case, there is no ground of equitable jurisdiction exhibited. The facts set forth in the bill of complaint, if taken to be true, as asserted by the complainants, do show that they have a direct, certain, and adequate remedy by suit at law to recover each sum of money which they claim against the several defendants, respectively. There is therefore no occasion for an appeal to equity jurisdiction. In such cases a demurrer to the bill of complaint will be sustained. Story, Eq. Pl. § 473.

The bill of complaint is also challenged by the demurrants upon the ground that it is multifarious. The face of the bill alleges that the defendants in seven different groups owe seven distinct sums of money, constituting seven separate causes of action, which, as between the separate groups of the defendants (so far as the bill of complaint states the situation), are wholly unrelated. The Colorado statute, which is alleged to have created liabilities sought to be enforced in this suit, is recited on the face of the bill of complaint, to make the shareholders individually responsible in double the amount of the par value of the stock owned by them, respectively. This is obviously a several liability of each shareholder to the creditors of the bank. It was so held in Auer v. Lombard, 72 Fed. 209, 19 O. C. A. 72. The complainants themselves insist that it is several. It has been declared by the Colorado courts interpreting this statute, in the case of Zang v. Wyant, 25 Colo. 551, 56 Pac. 565, 71 Am. St. Rep. 145, that a suit in equity for the common benefit of all the creditors affords the most effectual and convenient proceeding to enforce the provision under examination. This very general statement of the occasion for a suit in equity may define correct equity practice in a state in which the distinction between law and equity tribunals is not maintained, but the course of the procedure there suggested cannot be recognized as authority here without bringing our practice into inextricable confusion. Suits in equity in this state are maintained, not because they are effectual or convenient remedies to complainants, but because the relations of the complainants to the defendants are such that they have, as against them, equitable grounds for relief. In the Colorado case cited it does not appear whether all the shareholders or only some of them were made defendants, nor whether the amount of the bank's unpaid debt exceeded the whole sum for which the shareholders were liable, or only a part thereof requiring an accounting and decree for proportionate payments. In the case presently before me, the bill of complaint contains no allegations of facts which justify joining in one suit these several and respective claims against many different persons. No concert of action by the defendants is alleged; no obligation common to all defendants is set forth; nor is there any tie suggested by which the claims of the complainants against all these defendants should be joined, except that it will prevent a multiplicity of suits. But that would be true if the complainants should join in one suit all the unrelated claims they might have against any number of defendants. The complainants say each defendant separately owes the whole sum which he is asked to pay, but they state no reason for joining in one suit these seven several and distinct and apparently (so far as the bill shows) unrelated claims. This feature of the bill of complaint justifies the defendants' contention that it is multifarious. It subjects the defendants, who the complainants show are entitled to defend separately, to the embarrassments of a suit in which others are joined who apparently have no common interest.

It also appears on the face of this bill of complaint that no equitable decree can be made in this suit against the defendants. It must be noted that the complainants do not ask, nor does their bill contemplate, a collection in this suit from each defendant of that proportion of the bank's debt (not exceeding his whole liability) which he ought to pay. Such a procedure would require, not only an accounting, but also the presence as parties in the suit of all the shareholders who are liable for proportionate shares of the bank's debt. What the complainants here demand is that each defendant shall pay the uttermost sum for which he may be liable, although the total of the payments which may thus be demanded from all the shareholders will far exceed the bank's debt. This seeks to force upon each defendant an obligation beyond what any equitable construction of his statutory liability requires. The Colorado statute declares that the shareholder shall be individually responsible for the debts of the bank, in double the amount of the par value of the stock which he owns. The obvious meaning is that, whatever of the bank's debts its assets, when applied, shall fail to pay, the shareholders shall make good to the creditors; each shareholder being responsible individually, and not jointly, for his proportionate share of the bank's unpaid debts to an extent not exceeding double the amount of the par value of the stock which he may own. It is an obligation severally owned by each shareholder to all of the creditors. In the present suit the complainants allege that the total of the bank's unpaid debts is \$58,469.03; that the par value of each share issued by the bank, \$100, with an issue amounting in the total to \$80,000; that of the 800 shares issued the defendants in this suit hold 150, which are of the total par value of \$15,000. The present suit seeks several and respective decrees against the defendants (who held only $\frac{2}{18}$ of the shares) to the amount in all of \$30,000. Like suits against the other shareholders will make them pay \$130,000. By such a construction of the statutory liability and procedure to enforce it, the creditors will collect \$160,000, to pay the bank's indebtedness, which it is admitted on the face of the bill, is little more than one-third of that amount.

There has been some discussion, in the cases cited, of the question whether this statutory liability is the imposition of a penalty or the creation of a statutory contractual obligation, imposed by the state in granting the franchise, which the shareholder has accepted by taking his shares. The tendency of the courts is to adopt the latter view. It is a familiar principle that courts of equity will not enforce penalties. The complainants in this suit do not present their case as one seeking to enforce penalties, yet their bill of complaint as framed, by insisting upon the several liability of each defendant to pay as an absolute sum double the par value of his shares, the total of which is far in excess of the bank's unpaid debts, and omitting to bring in as defendants all the shareholders, and to invite an accounting and the ascertainment of the proportionate sums which each should respectively pay to satisfy the bank's unpaid debts, in effect seeks to enforce against each defendant the payment of a fixed sum, wholly unrelated and out of all proportion to the amount needed to pay the bank's debts—in short, to enforce a penalty. This defect of the bill of complaint is apparent upon its face, and affects this court's ability to make any decree in this cause which will be just and equitable.

For the reasons above stated, the demurrers to the bill of complaint must be sustained, with costs.

STATE v. NEALON et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13. 1905.)

STATUTES — SPECIAL ACT — REGULATION OF CITIES.

The supplement, approved March 30, 1905, to the act entitled "An act to remove the fire and police departments in the cities of this state from political control," approved May 2, 1885, is a special act to regulate the internal affairs of cities, and therefore is unconstitutional.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Quo warranto by the state against John L. Nealon and others. Judgment for the state.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON, GARRETSON, SWAYZE, and DIXON, JJ.

Gilbert Collins, for the State. Thomas F. Noonan, for defendants.

DIXON, J. At the last February term of this court the Attorney General, ex officio, filed an information against the defendants, charging that they unlawfully exercised the franchises of a board of police commissioners in the city of Bayonne, under color of a supplement, approved March 30, 1905, to an act entitled "an act to remove the fire and police departments in the cities of this state from political control," approved May 2, 1885, which supplement the information alleges to be unconstitutional and void, as being a special law regulating the internal affairs of cities. To the plea of the defendants, insisting upon the validity of the supplement, the Attorney General demurred, setting forth with his demurrer various reasons for holding the supplement to be unconstitutional, among them that stated in the information.

We think that reason is sufficient. The act of 1885 (Gen. St. 1551) applies to all cities in the state which, by vote of the citizens, accept the act, and directs that in each of those cities a board of police commissioners, consisting of four residents in the city, shall be appointed by the mayor and council, that two of the commissioners shall be selected from each of the two political parties which polled the greatest number of votes at the last preceding municipal election, and that every successor of any of these commissioners shall be selected from the same political party as his predecessor. The supplement of 1905 (P. L. p. 155) applies only to cities having a population numbering between 12,000 and 100,000, in which police commissioners have not been appointed in pursuance of any law of this state. It authorizes the mayor alone, in his discretion, to appoint a board of police commissioners, consisting of four residents in the city, not more than two of whom shall be the same political party, but directs that the successors of the commissioners shall be appointed in the manner directed in the act of 1885. The effect of the original act is to vest the perpetual control of the police department in members of the two political parties which at the municipal election last preceding the acceptance of the act polled the greatest number of votes, and the effect of the supplement is to vest such control in members of those political parties out of which the mayor selects his first appointees.

I find it somewhat difficult to perceive how such legislation has for its object the removal of the department from political control, as the title of the act declares. But, waiving that matter, the supplement must be adjudged unconstitutional on the ground that it is a special act to regulate the internal affairs of cities. It attempts a classification of cities on the basis of population, but it excludes from its operation those cities which, although their population is within the prescribed number, have police commissioners appointed in pursuance to other statutes. Hoboken is such a city, and there police commissioners are to be appointed without regard to their party affiliations. It is impossible to suggest a substantial reason for discriminating between Hoboken and other cities of the designated size, with respect to the mode of selecting the police commissioners. The decision of this court in Tetrault v. Orange, 55 N. J. Law, 99, 25 Atl. 268, is directly in point. The classification attempted is unreal.

The Attorney General is entitled to judgment.

TUSTING v. CITY OF ASBURY PARK.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—OBJECTION TO ASSESSMENTS.

When a landowner has notice of the proceedings for making a street improvement in front of his property, for which the law authorizes an assessment thereon to be levied, and refrains from applying for a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings until the improvement is completed and an assessment levied, he will be allowed to question on certiorari only the legality of the assessment.

2. SAME—AUTHORITY OF COUNCIL.

Under clause 3 of section 48 of the city act of March 24, 1897 (P. L. 1897, p. 70), the common council of the city may make the assessment there authorized.

3. SAME—CERTIORARI TO REVIEW.

A certiorari to review such an assessment, allowed after 60 days from the confirmation of the assessment had elapsed, should be dismissed under section 65 of said act (P. L. 1897, p. 79.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Robert Tusting against the city of Asbury Park to review an assessment for grading a street. Dismissed.

Argued June term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

Wm. F. Midlige, for prosecutor. Samuel A. Patterson, for defendant.

DIXON, J. The certiorari in this case brings up an assessment against the prosecutor's land fronting on Bond street in Asbury Park for the grading and graveling of the street. As the prosecutor had ample notice of the proceedings for the improvement at their inception, but delayed to apply for the writ until the improvement was completed and the assessment levied, he cannot be heard with regard to any errors in procedure prior to the assessment. Youngster

v. Paterson, 40 N. J. Law, 244; Jelliff v. Newark, 48 N. J. Law, 101, 2 Atl. 627; Id., 49 N. J. Law, 239, 12 Atl. 770. The chief legal ground of objection to the assessment is that it was levied by the common council, not by the board of city assessors.

An examination of the city act of March 24, 1897 (P. L. 1897, p. 46), under which these proceedings were taken, leaves us in some doubt on this point, but the better view appears to be that, with regard to the grading, graveling, paving, flagging, and otherwise improving and regulating of streets, under clause 8 of section 48, the common council itself has authority to assess the costs and expenses of the improvement upon the owners of property benefited to the extent of the special and peculiar benefit received. Of this tenor are the words used, and the doubt arising from considering other parts of the act is not strong enough to overthrow their plain import. This being determined, we think the last clause of section 65 becomes applicable, which forbids the allowance of any certiorari to review an assessment, unless the same be applied for within 60 days after confirmation of the assessment by the common council.

The present assessment was confirmed by the council on September 2, 1902, but the writ of certiorari was not applied for until July, 1903. It should therefore be dismissed, with costs.

HAUENSTEIN v. RUH.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—LIABILITY OF AGENT.

The defendant, as a collection agent, after informing the plaintiff that he was acting as such, received from the plaintiff the amount of a claim against the plaintiff's brother, which was in his hands for collection, and at once paid it over to his principal. Held that, in the absence of any personal fraud or guaranty of the validity of the claim, the defendant was not answerable to the plaintiff for the amount so received, on proof that the claim was invalid.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Jersey City.

Action by Louis O. Hauenstein against Charles F. Ruh. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued June Term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

J. Emil Walscheid, for plaintiff. James A. Gordon, for defendant.

DIXON, J. The facts on which the judgment of the district court in favor of the plaintiff was based are that the defendant, who was in the collection business, had received from his son, who was in similar business on his own account, a memorandum of the amount of a claim against the plaintiff's brother, which the defendant's son said had been sent to him from a New York law office for collection; that, the brother's property being about to be sold under the Martin act, the plaintiff was present for the purpose of buying it in; that the defendant was also present, and, being asked by the plaintiff, if he was going to bid at the sale, answered that he was, to protect a client, that he had a claim against the brother which came from a New York law office, and, if that was paid, it was all he was after; that the plaintiff then said he would pay it if it was just, and the defendant said if he would pay it it would be all right; that thereupon the plaintiff gave his check for the amount to the defendant's order, and the defendant at once indorsed it over to his son who collected the amount; and that the claim was in truth unfounded. On these facts judgment for the amount of the check was given in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

We think the judgment was erroneous. There was no evidence that the defendant in any way guaranteed the validity of the claim or made any fraudulent statement regarding it. To the plaintiff's knowledge he received the check in order to pay it over to the person whom he represented, and he actually did just what the plaintiff thus, by implication, authorized him to do. Although he did not at the time give to the plaintiff the name of his principal or of the ultimate claimant, yet he was not asked for it, and he distinctly informed the plaintiff that he was but an agent. Under these circumstances the plaintiff's remedy, if any exists, must be pursued against the principal who has wrongfully received his money.

The judgment of the district court should be reversed, and, unless the plaintiff applies to this court before the next term thereof for a different disposition of the cause, final judgment in favor of the defendant may be entered, with costs, pursuant to the act of April 3, 1902 (P. L. 1902, p. 565), regulating such appeals.

PHILADELPHIA & C. FERRY CO. v. INTERCITY LINK R. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. CORPORATIONS—DEFECTS IN ORGANIZATION—WHO MAY QUESTION.

The fact that an amended certificate of incorporation was not acknowledged or proved before a proper officer is unimportant in proceedings taken by the corporation to condemn land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, §§ 77, 78.]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN — CONDEMNATION OF FRANCHISE.

The present location of a footpath leading to the prosecutor's ferry, and which can be changed without detriment to its usefulness, cannot be deemed necessary for the purposes of the prosecutor's franchise.

3. SAME—PETITION—PROOFS.

Condemnation proceedings are not rendered irregular by the omission to state, in the petition and proofs presented to the justice, matters which the eminent domain act does not require to be set forth.

4. CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS—SERVICE OF NOTICE.

Service of notice of such proceedings on the registered agent of a domestic corporation is sufficient, although not made at the registered office because the corporation had removed therefrom.

5. EMINENT DOMAIN—PROCEEDINGS—AMENDMENTS.

Under the seventeenth section of the eminent domain act (P. L. 1900, p. 86) the justice to whom a petition for condemnation is presented has power to permit amendments of the proceedings and to adjourn the hearing on the petition.

6. SAME—PARTIES.

In a proceeding to condemn the rights of an abutting owner in a public highway, the municipality in which the highway lies is not a necessary party.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by the Philadelphia & Camden Ferry Company against the Intercity Link Railroad Company to review an order of a justice of the Supreme Court. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

Gaskill & Gaskill, for prosecutor. Martin V. Bergen, Jr., for defendant.

DIXON, J. This certiorari brings up an order made by one of the justices of this court on April 24, 1905, appointing commissioners to appraise lands owned by the Philadelphia & Camden Ferry Company, in order that the Intercity Link Railroad Company might acquire the same for the construction and operation of a railroad running from Camden beneath the bottom of Delaware river to the Pennsylvania boundary, and there connecting with a railroad from Philadelphia. The petitioner for the order is the Intercity Link Railroad Company, claiming to be incorporated under the general railroad act of this state (P. L. 1903, p. 645), and the prosecutor of the certiorari is the Philadelphia & Camden Ferry Company.

The first objection urged by counsel for the prosecutor against the legality of the order is that the petitioner was not lawfully incorporated, because the original certificate of incorporation and an amended certificate were not acknowledged or proved before a proper officer. As to the original certificate the allegation of fact is untrue, and as to the amended certificate the fact is in this controversy unimportant. The state only can complain of so formal a defect. National Docks R. R. Co. v. Central R. R. Co., 32 N. J. Eq. 755.

The second objection is that the petitioner is not a railroad corporation within the meaning of the act above cited, because the whole of the proposed railroad is to be under the surface of the ground. This reason we find to be untrue in fact.

The third objection is that the land of the prosecutor, it being a corporation of this state chartered to facilitate transportation, is not rendered by the above-cited act subject to condemnation. The thirteenth section of the act provides that land of such a corporation, not necessary for the purposes of its franchise, may be condemned, but that only a right to cross its other lands can be so taken. The evidence in this case shows that the land which the petitioner seeks to condemn is not necessary for the purposes of the prosecutor's franchise. It comprises part of a triangle lying west of the center of Delaware avenue, between the lines of Market and Federal streets, in Camden, which part is wholly unused, save for ornament, except that the southeasterly corner is occupied by a few feet of a cement path leading from the foot of Arch street towards the prosecutor's ferry, which path would be equally useful if moved 20 feet further south, so as to be off the tract condemned. It would be absurd to regard the present location of that footpath as necessary for the prosecutor's franchise.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth objections relate to alleged defects in the petition and proofs presented to the justice who made the order. The necessary contents of such a petition and the requisite verification are prescribed by the second section of our eminent domain act—P. L. 1900, p. 80—(McEwan v. Penna. N. J. & N. Y. R. R. Co. [N. J. Sup.] 60 Atl. 1130), and they do not embrace those matters, the lack of which forms the grounds of these objections.

The seventh objection is that notice of the application to the justice was not legally served on the Camden & Suburban Railway Company, one of the occupants of the land to be condemned. That company is a domestic corporation, and the defect in the service consisted in the fact that the notice, though served on the registered agent of the company, was not served at its registered office, from which the company had removed. Our corporation act (P. L. 1896, p. 291, § 43) does not require service of process to be made at the company's registered office, but only on the registered agent. The service made was, we think, sufficient. On the day first set for the hearing on the petition the petitioner moved to amend the same, and the justice after granting the motion adjourned the hearing for 13 days, in order that the opposing parties might have an opportunity to consider the petition as amended. Then, on the adjourned hearing he appointed the commissioners. This amendment and adjournment form the basis of the eighth and ninth objections. The seventeenth section of the eminent domain act (P. L. 1900, p. 86) authorizes the justice, upon any hearing before an appeal is filed, to make such orders and permit such amendments as may appear reasonable or as may promote the public purposes for which the power to condemn was conferred. This authority is clearly ample for the amendment allowed, and we think warrants also the adjournment; for, although the fifth section of the act directs the justice to appoint the commissioners on the day fixed for the hearing, that does not necessarily mean the day first fixed, but includes any day so fixed in accordance with such orders as the justice may make under the seventeenth section.

The tenth, and last, reason urged is that the city of Camden was not made a party to the proceedings, although a portion of the land to be condemned lay within the limits of Delaware avenue. The explanation of this omission is obvious. The petitioner had no power to condemn the public rights in the highway, but under section 34 of the general railroad act might contract with the city for the exercise of certain privileges in the street, provided it had first acquired the rights of the abutting owner therein by agreement or condemnation. The present proceeding seems to have been framed to comply with this proviso, and clearly the city was not a necessary party thereto.

None of the objections presented is valid, and therefore the proceedings under review should be affirmed, with costs.

COLLOTY v. SCHUMAN.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. WITNESS—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Any questions directly tending to show that the real import of a witness' testimony in chief is materially different from its original aspect are within the range of legitimate cross-examination.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—CONTRACT WITH AGENT.

A contract made with the authorized agent of a known principal binds the principal, but not the agent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Atlantic City.

Action by Eugene M. Colloty against Edward F. Schuman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

Thompson & Cole, for appellant. EH H. Chandler, for appellee.

DIXON, J. In the district court of Atlantic City the plaintiff sued the defendant for a commission claimed by the plaintiff for renting a hotel at the instance of the defendant. The defendant contended that in employing the plaintiff he acted as the agent of his mother who owned the hotel and that the plaintiff knew he was so acting. The plaintiff, having at the trial testified to his employment by the defendant and that $42.50 of his commission had been paid by check, further testified on cross-examination that the check was drawn by Mrs. Schuman, and then was asked the following questions:

"Aside from receiving this check, did you ever meet her with regard to this transaction? Did you have any conversation with her relating to the renting of this property? Did you know at the time you had this conversation with Mr. Schuman that Mrs. Schuman was the owner of this property? Did you ever have any conversation with Mrs. Schuman regarding your pay for your services in securing this tenant for this property?" These questions were overruled, on the ground that they were not proper cross-examination. Such rulings are now assigned as reasons for reversal.

On the surface, the plaintiff's testimony in chief was to the effect that his bargain was made with the defendant as principal. Any questions directly tending to show that its real import was materially different would fall within the range of legitimate cross-examination. The questions propounded were manifestly designed to elicit the fact that the plaintiff knew he was dealing with the defendant as his mother's agent, for such knowledge might be inferable from the plaintiff's being aware that Mrs. Schuman owned the hotel, and that she had talked with him about renting it and about his pay for securing the tenant. If that inference should be drawn, the effect of the plaintiff's testimony would be essentially changed from its original purport. Although the defendant had signed the lease to the tenant as if he himself were the landlord, that would not render him a principal in the contract with the plaintiff. The overruling of this cross-examination was error.

On the defense the defendant testified that the plaintiff knew at the time that he (the defendant) was acting as agent for his mother, but the court refused to instruct the jury that such knowledge would defeat the action. This also was erroneous; the legal rule being that a contract made with the authorized agent of a known principal binds the principal, not the agent.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remitted to the district court for a new trial.

HAINES v. BOARD OF CHOSEN FREEHOLDERS OF BURLINGTON COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

HIGHWAYS—IMPROVEMENT—ASSESSMENT OF COST.

Where a proceeding for the improvement of a public road was initiated by a petition under the eighth section of the road improvement act of March 22, 1895 (Gen. St. p. 2902), before the passage of the road improvement act of April 1, 1903 (P. L. 1903, p. 145), the right to assess land bordering on the road for 10 per cent. of the cost, which the act of 1895 conferred, was not revoked by the act of 1903.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by I. Snowden Haines against the board of chosen freeholders of Burlington county to review a road assessment. Assessment affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

John G. Horner, for prosecutor. Chas. Ewan Merritt, for defendant.

DIXON, J. Prior to April 1, 1903, a petition, duly signed, had been presented to the board of chosen freeholders of Burlington county under the eighth section of the road improvement act of March 22, 1895 (Gen. St. p. 2902), praying for the improvement of the road leading from Burlington to Columbus, and the work of improvement was in progress on said day. According to that act, the land bordering upon the road was subject to an assessment for benefits to the extent of $\frac{1}{10}$ of the cost of the work, and after the improvement was completed, in the year 1904, such an assessment was levied; part of the expense being thus imposed on the land of the prosecutor of the present writ. He now insists that, by force of the road improvement act of April 1, 1903 (P. L. p. 145), the power to assess was revoked.

It may be conceded that, with regard to all proceedings for road improvement begun after the passage of the act of 1903, that act supersedes the act of 1895; but, reserving for further consideration the eighteenth section, it is clear that all the other clauses of the later act are prospective only, and would have no effect whatever on proceedings previously instituted.

The eighteenth section is as follows: "Sec. 18. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this Act are hereby repealed: Provided, that this repealer shall not revive any act heretofore repealed, nor shall any proceeding for the improvement of any public road, entered into before the passage of this act, abate, but such proceeding shall continue, as near as may be, as if the same had been commenced hereunder." Leaving out of view the proviso of this section, the repealing sentence would not impair the force of the act of 1895 upon improvements previously undertaken, because, as the act of 1903 would then be wholly prospective, its terms could not be inconsistent with the application of any law to prior transactions. The prosecutor's contention must therefore rest on the proviso alone.

The proviso declares that no proceeding entered into before the passage of the act shall abate. The proceeding now under review was entered into by the petition presented before April 1, 1903. That petition contemplated and expressly provided for the assessment now before us as a substantial part of the proceeding by which the improvement should be made and paid for. The proviso, by declaring that such a proceeding shall not abate, requires that it should not fail in any substantial provision. The further declaration that it shall continue, as near as may be, as if the same had been commenced under the act of 1903, simply means that, if that act provided a different method for accomplishing the same results, the new method should be pursued. It does not imply that any public right should be abandoned or any private obligation released. As the act of 1903 makes no provision for the conduct of a proceeding under which part of the expense of improving a road is to be charged on the abutting land, such a proceeding must go on, without abatement, as if the act of 1903 did not exist.

The assessment must be affirmed, with costs.

BERNSTEIN et al. v. DEMMERT.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — TERMINATION OF TESTIMONY — NOTICE — TENANCY FROM MONTH TO MONTH.

The prosecutor entered into possession of certain premises under a written lease for the term of five years from May 1, 1903, at a yearly rental, payable in equal monthly payments in advance. The lessor had a life estate only, and by his death, which occurred during the term of the lease, the title to the demised premises vested in remaindermen, until it was by them conveyed to the defendants in certiorari, by whom landlord and tenant proceedings to dispossess the prosecutor were instituted by a one month's notice, dated and served on December 30, 1904, requiring possession to be delivered to them on February 1, 1905. Held: (1) That such notice was insufficient to terminate the tenancy; (2) that the mere fact that the prosecutor after the death of the life tenant continued the monthly payments first to the remaindermen, and afterwards to the defendants in certiorari, did not make him a tenant from month to month; no question as to the character of such payments having arisen and no new agreement having in point of fact been made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari to District Court of Jersey City.

Action by Joseph E. Bernstein and others against Ferdinand Demmert. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings certiorari. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Walter L. McDermott, for the prosecutor. John L. Keller and Peter H. James, for defendants.

GARRISON, J. This writ of certiorari brings up a landlord and tenant proceeding brought to recover possession of leased premises upon the ground that the tenancy had been terminated by a legal notice. The notice that had been given was a one month's notice, and the only question is whether such notice was sufficient. The facts to be dealt with are stated in the landlord's affidavit as follows: The prosecutor took possession of the premises under an agreement made with Augustus H. Vanderpoel, acting as committee of the estate of one Henry Long. This agreement, which was a lease for the term of five years from May 1, 1903, at a yearly rental of $1,800, payable in equal monthly payments of $150 in advance, was immediately recorded. The said Henry Long had a life estate only, and on November 16, 1903, died, whereby the title to the leased property vested in certain remaindermen, who, on the 28th day of November, 1904, conveyed the premises to the defendants in certiorari, by whom landlord and tenant proceedings to dispossess the prosecutor were instituted by a notice dated and served on December 30, 1904, requiring possession to be delivered to them on the 1st day of February, 1905. The affidavit further states that after the death of the life tenant the prosecutor continued the payments of $150 per month without having made any new agreement touching the letting of the premises, and that after the defendants in certiorari purchased the property the prosecutor continued to make the same monthly payments to them without any new agreement.

Upon proof of these facts, without material modification, the district court adjudged that the defendants in certiorari were entitled to possession, thereby deciding that a month's notice was sufficient to terminate the tenancy, and hence necessarily adjudging that the prosecutor was a tenant from month to month. I am unable to concur in this result or to find any support for it either in the affidavit of the landlord or in the facts certified by the district court. If the prosecutor was a monthly tenant, he was so by force of some agreement. The only agreement made by him was the one under which he entered into possession, and that was a lease for a term of years. The affidavit states and the district court found that no new agreement had been made. The rental reserved by the only agreement ever made was a yearly rental, payable in instalments of $150 per month in advance. This the tenant paid continuously and without any question touching its character from the day he took possession, in 1902, until it was refused by the present owners, in 1904.

This course of dealing, standing alone and nothing more appearing, will not justify the inference that the prosecutor by continuing such monthly payments evinced by implication a purpose to enter into a new agreement of letting, viz., from month to month. All of the facts found by the court below touching the conduct of the parties rebut such an inference, chief among which is that both the remaindermen and the defendants in certiorari had actual knowledge of the terms of the prosecutor's lease and accepted the monthly payments which he continued to make without any new agreement, or, so far as the case shows, without ever raising any question as to the character of such payments.

Beyond the mere fact, therefore, that these monthly payments were thus made, there is nothing upon which an implied tenancy from month to month can rest, and obviously this circumstance itself is not sufficient to raise such an implied letting. Where the original letting is for one month, or where monthly payments, begun and continued without any express agreement, are clearly referable to current terms of that duration, it is the natural, and hence the legitimate, inference that the minds of the parties had met upon a monthly tenancy. Hence such relationship will be implied; but, where the circumstances under which monthly payments are made repel such a relationship as a matter of fact, the court will not imply it as a matter of law.

Whether immediately upon the death of the life tenant the prosecutor became a trespasser or a tenant at sufferance or a holding over tenant for years need not now be decided. The question on which the jurisdiction of the court below depended was whether he then was or has since become a tenant from month to month. That he did not become so by force of any agreement made by him has been expressly found by the trial court and that he did not become so by force of any agreement the law will make for him is the result I have reached upon the admitted facts of the case and the other circumstances certified to this court in response to its rule. The judgment of the First District court of Jersey City should be reversed.

LAZARUS v. MARTLING.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT.

The mere fact that the transcript sent up to the court of common pleas on an appeal from the small cause court fails to show that a written notice of appeal, signed by or on behalf of the appellant, had been filed with the justice, and that the appeal bond had been so filed, does not afford legal ground for dismissing the appeal.

2. SAME—CORRECTION OF TRANSCRIPT.

In granting an appeal the justice acts judicially, and, if the legality of his adjudication on that point is challenged in the common pleas, he should be ruled to certify the facts, so as to correct any imperfections or irregularities apparent in the transcript, before such adjudication is reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari to Court of Common Pleas, Bergen County.

Action by Jacob G. Lazarus against Anna M. Martling. Judgment for plaintiff, and on dismissal of defendant's appeal she brings certiorari. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

Alexander Simpson, for prosecutor. Jacob W. De Yoe, for defendant.

DIXON, J. A judgment having been rendered against the defendant in a small cause court, she appealed to the Bergen common pleas, and there her appeal was dismissed, because the transcript sent up by the justice failed to show that a written notice of appeal, signed by or on behalf of the appellant, had been filed with the justice, and that an appeal bond had been so filed. Under a rule from this court the reasons for dismissal are expressly stated by the common pleas to be the alleged defects in the transcript and to test the legal sufficiency of those reasons is the object of the present writ of certiorari. The small-cause court act (P. L. 1903, p. 251) provides (section 81) that the justice who grants an appeal shall send to the clerk of the common pleas a transcript of the proceedings and judgment in the cause, together with the appeal bond, within 10 days after he shall receive notice of the appeal. In this enactment, unless the notice of appeal is included in the phrase "transcript of the proceedings," the statute does not require it to be sent to the common pleas. I think it is not so included, because the entire phrase, "transcript of the proceedings and judgment," suggests that the proceedings intended are those prior to the judgment, a suggestion corroborated by the fact that the bond alone of the steps taken after judgment is mentioned. According to the usual practice the transcript consists of a copy of the docket which the statute (section 112) requires the justice to keep, and such papers as are necessary for the trial of the cause on appeal (English v. Bonham, 17 N. J. Law, 350; Henry v. Campbell, 24 N. J. Law, 141); but no entry upon the docket respecting the appeal is prescribed, except "when and by whom it was demanded, and the date of receiving notice thereof"; and the notice of appeal is certainly not a paper necessary for the trial of the case. No transcript as to the bond is required, the bond itself being produced.

Moreover, in determining whether an appeal should be granted, the justice acts judicially (Tichenor v. Hewson, 14 N. J. Law, 26), and when the sufficiency of the steps taken for perfecting the right of appeal has been adjudged by him, the cause is transmitted to the common pleas, not for a review of alleged errors in the court below, but for a new trial on the merits. Vannoy v. Givens, 23 N. J. Law, 201. No doubt the common pleas has power to ascertain whether an appeal has been legally taken, and to dismiss the cause, if it has not been, but this power should be exercised on an ascertainment of the real facts, not on a mere discovery of defects in the transcript. For as to those parts of the docket which are not essential to a record of the judgment (and the proceedings for appeal are certainly not) the statute is directory only (English v. Bonham, 17 N. J. Law, 350; Houghton v. Potter, 23 N. J. Law, 338, 24 N. J. Law, 735), and it has long been the practice for the common pleas to rule the justice to certify matters which he ought to have entered on his docket, but which he has omitted (Bennet v. Kite, 9 N. J. Law, 106). Indeed the statute which directs what shall be so entered expressly declares that no imperfections or irregularities in the docket shall invalidate any proceedings or judgment, but the same may be corrected to conform to the fact at any time, under rule by the court to certify or otherwise. We conclude that the order of dismissal was made without legal evidence to support it, and should be set aside.

Let the cause be remitted to the common pleas for further proceedings according to law.

SHELDON CO. v. HARLEIGH CEMETERY ASS'N.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

CONTRACT—ACTION—DEFENSES—FRAUD.

In an action on a written contract it is error to overrule an offer to prove that the execution of the contract by the defendant was obtained solely by the false statement of a non-existent fact.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 2012.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari to District Court of Camden.

Action by the Sheldon Company against the Harleigh Cemetery Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings certiorari. Reversed.

Argued at June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

William C. Jones, for prosecutor. John F. Harned, for defendant.

GARRISON, J. This was an action brought to recover the contract price of certain advertising, the contract concerning which was in writing. When the agent for the defendant who had signed this contract was on the witness stand he was asked what statement had been made to him by the person who obtained his signature. This question was overruled, upon the ground that what took place before the execution of the paper could not be shown.

This question and the ruling upon it were too broad to indicate any error in law. Before the matter was finally disposed of, however, the counsel for defendant at the request of the trial court stated specifically what he expected to prove by the witness, to wit: "I want to show, and I think I have the right to show, that the signature to this paper was obtained under a misrepresentation, and the misrepresentation was that I had sent word to Mr. Rhedemeyer to sign it, and I never sent any such word, as I have so testified. Mr. Rhedemeyer would not have signed it—he says he wouldn't have signed it if he had not received that message from me, which he supposed to be a legitimate message. (Exception noted for defendant.)"

The overruling of this offer was clearly erroneous. The effect of the excluded proof was not to vary or contradict the terms of the written contract, but on the contrary to show that but for the false statement of a non-existent fact such contract would not have been signed; and hence that in legal contemplation no contract had been made.

Counsel for the plaintiff argues in his brief that the defendant after knowledge of this fraud ratified the contract, but of this there is no mention in the judge's certificate which constitutes the case with which we have to deal. This certificate, it may be remarked, is faulty in form, but as both counsel have based their arguments upon it without objection, nothing but delay would result from sending it back for a more strict compliance with the rule.

The judgment of the district court of the city of Camden is reversed.

MAYOR & COUNCIL OF BOROUGH OF PARK RIDGE v. REYNOLDS et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REVIEW OF EXPENDITURES—PROCEDURE.

Under the provisions of "An act to provide for the summary investigation of county and municipal expenditures" (P. L. 1898, p. 155), the justice of the Supreme Court who has made an order appointing experts to prosecute such an investigation is not required to institute an inquiry into the truth of the facts sworn to in the jurisdictional affidavit in the manner prescribed by the act.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by the mayor and council of the borough of Park Ridge against N. A. Reynolds and others. Order affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

R. M. Hart, for the prosecutor. E. W. Wakelee and W. J. Wright, for defendants.

GARRISON, J. The return to this writ of certiorari shows that an affidavit signed by more than 25 persons who swear that they are freeholders of the borough of Park Ridge, in the county of Bergen and state of New Jersey, setting forth that they have paid taxes on real estate in said borough within one year last past, to wit, taxes for the year 1904, and that they have cause to believe that the moneys of said borough have been, and are being unlawfully expended, was presented to one of the justices of the Supreme Court, and that thereupon he made an order for a summary investigation into the affairs of said borough pursuant to an act entitled "An act to provide for the summary investigation of county and municipal expenditures," approved March 23, 1898 (P. L. 1898, p. 155); that after said order was entered, the mayor and council of the borough of Park Ridge and certain officials of said borough and two freeholders presented to the said justice of the Supreme Court a petition averring that the affidavit was not signed by 25 freeholders, that some of the signers of said affidavit were not freeholders or residents of the borough, and that some of them were married women; that upon the hearing on the said petition the justice ordered that its prayer be denied, which order is the one the prosecutors seek to have reviewed.

The question raised by this writ is whether under the act referred to, the justice of the Supreme Court to whom the jurisdictional affidavit was presented was obliged to try and determine the issues of fact raised by the denial of the facts stated in such affidavit, and, if such statement was found to be false, revoke the order originally made.

It is not pretended that any such procedure is expressly provided by the statute in question. The most that is claimed is that it is inferentially implied or that it inheres in the nature of the proceeding created by the statute. Neither of these contentions appear to me to be well founded. The Legislature in the creation of a remedial procedure may prescribe that jurisdiction shall depend upon the existence of certain facts or it may declare that jurisdiction shall arise whenever proof of certain facts is made in a prescribed manner. In this latter case, the preliminary inquiry touching jurisdiction is not whether the facts sworn to are true, but whether they are the ones required by statute, and are sworn to as therein prescribed.

The present proceeding is of this latter class, and hence neither expressly nor inferentially was the justice who had correctly passed upon the preliminary question before making his order required to institute an inquiry into the truth of the facts contained in the jurisdictional affidavit.

The order removed by this writ is affirmed.

OSTERHOUT v. JERSEY CITY, H. & P. ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

A conductor was thrown from the platform of a trolley car and injured. It appeared that he knew that the track was rough and uneven, but it did not conclusively appear that he knew or should have known of other defects on the track, which probably caused the derailment. In an action against his employer, the court rightfully refused to nonsuit or direct verdict for the defendant, asked for on the ground that plaintiff assumed the risk of derailment of the car.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Hudson County.

Action by Wallace Osterhout against the Jersey City, Hoboken & Paterson Street Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and GARRETSON, GARRISON, and REED, JJ.

Bedle, Edwards & Thompson and William H. Speer, for plaintiff in error. Weller & Lichtenstein, for defendant in error.

REED, J. The plaintiff below was a conductor on a car of the defendant, the rear trucks of which were derailed. The swerving of the rear of the car threw the conductor from the rear platform and injured him. On the trial below there was a verdict for the plaintiff. The schedule time from North Paterson to Passaic, a distance of $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, was one hour. The rails of the defendant's road between these termini were not uniform. The ends of the road were laid with heavy, solid rails, while for a space of about a mile between there were laid lighter rails of a different pattern, apparently older and much worn, with uneven joints. There is testimony that a piece of the flange at or near the point where the car was derailed was broken from the rail, and that this flange looked as if it had been broken for some time.

The only question which requires consideration on this writ of error is whether the conductor assumed the risk of this accident. The risk of injury from a defect in the track, negligently permitted to remain unrepaired, was not one of the ordinary risks which the conductor assumed in entering upon his employment. He cannot be said to have assumed the risk, in the absence of notification of the danger, unless the danger was so apparent that by a person in his position, using reasonable prudence, it would have been observed. The conductor had been on the run over this road for two or three weeks at the time of the accident. He says that he discovered after a few days that these rails were old by the way the car ran over them, when the car came to the joints it bumped and jumped, and that the car also wobbled. He says that the car ran smoothly over this portion of the track when they had plenty of time. From the testimony of a previously employed motorman it appeared that the car jerked when it came to the end of the rail; that the end of one rail would be higher than the end of the next rail; that the flange of the car wheel ran on the flange of the rail in many places, the rail itself being worn down; that with his eyes in front he would see the mud slop up on one side; when the car struck the rail, it threw the water and sand to one side. He says that in some places there was hardly any dirt between the tracks, and that he could see the iron brace running from one rail to another where the dirt had been washed out. It also appeared that after the car left Passaic, and was within a mile and a quarter of the bad rails, the conductor told the motorman they were five minutes behind time. From what the conductor admits he knew it cannot be said that he took upon himself the risk of derailment of his car. The fact that the track was rough and uneven, and by reason thereof the joints may have been uneven, did not prove that the risk of derailment was apparent. Nor from what he should have known does it seem clear that he assumed the risk of the happening of such an occurrence. From the fact, if true, that a previous motorman had observed conditions which warned him of the danger it does not follow that this conductor should have observed the same conditions. A motorman's attention is directed to the line of the track over which he is passing, but a conductor has other duties which demand his attention elsewhere. It is not so clear that the conductor appreciated the risk, and so assumed if that the court should have granted a nonsuit or directed a verdict. Nor can the warning given by the conductor to the motorman that they were five minutes late be regarded as a direction to run over this portion of the track at a reckless speed. It was the ordinary indication given by a conductor to a motorman to enable him to run his car on schedule time. Nor does the testimony show with any degree of certainty that the car was running at a dangerous speed at the time of the occurrence.

There should be judgment for the defendant in error.

MCCANN v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POLICEMAN — REMOVAL FROM EMPLOYMENT.

The relator was appointed a police officer of New Brunswick in 1897, and in 1902, under an ordinance which authorized the appointment of a roundsman, who was to be a member of and taken from the regular police force, he was made roundsman. In 1905 the office of roundsman was abolished, and thereafter the relator was not permitted to perform duties either as roundsman or policeman. Held:

1. That under the facts of the case the ordinance of 1905, abolishing the office of roundsman, was adopted in good faith for what the council deemed the interest of the city, and was valid.

2. That the relator did not cease to be a policeman by accepting the additional duties and pay of roundsman, and could only be removed from his employment of policeman for cause, after conviction on charges preferred, pursuant to the statute.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by Randall McCann for writ of mandamus to the mayor and common council of New Brunswick. Mandamus granted.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON and SWAYZE, JJ.

George S. Silzer, for relator. Theo. B. Booraem, for defendant.

SWAYZE, J. The relator was appointed a police officer of New Brunswick in 1897. In 1902 the common council was authorized to appoint an officer to be known as "roundsman of police," and the relator was appointed. In the same year, the Revised Ordinances provided that the police department should consist of a chief, two sergeants, a roundsman, and policemen. The duties of roundsman were not specifically defined. In fact the relator acted as an ordinary police officer, and, in addition to his duties as such, checked up the reports of the other officers, for which he received additional compensation. On February 6, 1905, an ordinance was passed abolishing the office of roundsman of police. After March 7, 1905, the relator was not permitted to perform his duties as roundsman or policeman. He now asks a mandamus to compel the municipal authorities to place him on duty as roundsman or policeman, claiming the protection of the tenure of office act of 1885. P. L. p. 163; Gen. St. p. 1534, pl. 328.

The ordinance abolishing the office of roundsman was within the power of the council. It seems to have been adopted in good faith for what the council deemed the interest of the city. The place has not been filled, and no other officer has been appointed to do the same work. The case in this respect is within the rule adopted by the Court of Errors and Appeals in Newark v. Lyon, 53 N. J. Law, 632, 23 Atl. 274, and applied in this court in McManus v. Newark, 49 N. J. Law, 175, 6 Atl. 882; Boylan v. Newark, 58 N. J. Law, 133, 32 Atl. 78. The relator is not entitled to be reinstated as roundsman.

His claim to be reinstated as a policeman rests on a different basis. By accepting the additional duties and pay of a roundsman, he did not cease to be a policeman. The ordinance of May 6, 1902, which authorized the appointment of roundsman, provided that he should be a member of, and taken from, the regular police force. The roundsman was a policeman with additional duties, and from the office or employment of policeman the relator could only be removed for cause, after charges had been preferred and he had been tried and convicted, pursuant to the statute. He is entitled to be reinstated as a policeman, and a mandamus should issue for that purpose.

LUDLAM v. SWAIN et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. HIGHWAYS — APPLICATION — SURVEY — VARIANCE.

An application for a public road gave its course as southeastwardly from the beginning point. The returns of the surveyors gave the first course as south, 54 degrees west. This course was along an ancient highway and within its bounds. Held, that the variance was fatal.

2. SAME—CONSENT OF STATE.

Where a road crosses land of the state, the consent of the Legislature must be obtained before the road is laid out.

3. SAME—VALIDITY OF PROCEEDINGS.

A taxpayer may question the validity of the proceedings to lay out a road across land of the state without the consent of the Legislature.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari to Court of Common Pleas, Cape May County.

Action by Frank S. Ludlam against Linnaeus T. Swain and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings certiorari. Proceedings set aside.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON and SWAYZE, JJ.

Morgan Hand, for prosecutor. Douglass & Douglass, for defendants.

SWAYZE, J. The writ brings up proceedings to lay out a public road. Two objections only need be considered.

1. There is a variance between the road as described in the notice and application and the road as laid by the surveyors. The beginning point is apparently the same in the application and in the return, but the identity is apparent only. In the application the road is described as running a southeastwardly course. In the return the first course is south, 54 degrees west, 662.6 feet, along the Shore Road. The Shore Road is an existing ancient highway, and this course is within its bounds. The result is to shift the real beginning point of the new road 662.6 feet to the southwest, and to change the road for nearly a mile of its length from the course indicated in the notice and application. This is fatal to the proceedings. Whittingham v. Hopkins, 70 N. J. Law, 322, 57 Atl. 402.

2. The road crosses land of the state. No consent has been given by the Legislature. Section 85 of the road act (Gen. St. p. 2822) enacts that no law for laying out or opening public roads shall be so construed as to permit any person to lay out or open any public or private road through or upon any lands belonging to this state, unless the consent of the Legislature be first obtained for that purpose. It is argued that this objection is premature, because the consent of the Legislature may be obtained before the road is built; but the prohibition of the statute is not merely against the opening of the road, but against laying it out. It is of no importance that the exact location may not be known until the surveyors have acted. The consent of the Legislature is a prerequisite, and may be given, so as to leave the precise location to be subsequently determined.

It is also argued that the prosecutor cannot raise the question, because a taxpayer or one of the public cannot merely, as such, complain of encroachment on the public domain. That, however, is not the basis of the prosecutor's right. The necessity of the road depends upon its public importance as a single whole. A road, which may be necessary, if it form a public highway between the termini named in the application, may be of no value, if it fails to afford such communication. The taxpayer can only be burdened in case the road is necessary, and rightfully complains of action which may burden him otherwise.

The proceedings should be set aside, with costs.

STATE BOARD OF REGISTRATION AND EXAMINATION IN DEN-TISTRY v. TERRY.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS—PRACTICE OF DENTISTRY—LICENSE.

Section 8 of the act to regulate the practice of dentistry (P. L. 1898, 123) provides that the act shall not be construed to prohibit the registered student of a licensed dentist from assisting his preceptor in dental operations while in his presence and under his direct and immediate personal supervision. Held, that to exempt the defendant from the penalties of the act for practicing dentistry without a license it was not sufficient that he was a student of a regularly licensed dentist. His practice must have consisted in assisting his preceptor under the direct and immediate personal supervision of the latter.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Trenton.

Action by the State Board of Registration and Examination in Dentistry against George Lee Terry to recover a penalty. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON and SWAYZE, JJ.

Edward D. Duffield, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellant. J. Lefferts Conard, for appellee.

SWAYZE, J. This is an action to recover a penalty for practicing dentistry without a license. The statute (P. L. 1898, 119) subjects to the penalty any person practicing dentistry not being at the time legally licensed to practice as such in this state (section 12), and gives a right of action to recover the penalty to the State Board of Registration (section 16). The act is not to be construed to prohibit the registered student of a licensed dentist from assisting his preceptor in dental operations while in his presence and under his direct and immediate personal supervision. Section 8. The only provision for registration is that there shall be an annual registration of every person practicing dentistry within the state, together with an annual registration of each and every assistant in the employ of every such person. Section 10.

In the present case the judge left two questions to the jury: (1) Whether the defendant was practicing dentistry; (2) whether he was a student of a regularly licensed dentist. He charged that, if the jury found that the defendant while practicing was doing so as a student of a regularly licensed dentist, the verdict should be for the defendant. To this part of the charge exception was duly taken. We think the charge was erroneous. The exception in section 8 is not an exception of all students in all circumstances. It is narrowed to a registered student while assisting his preceptor in the preceptor's presence, and under his direct and immediate personal supervision. It is difficult to determine what the act means by a registered student, since no provision is made for the registration of students as such, but only for the registration of assistants. In the present case that question need not be decided. There was evidence indicating that the defendant was not an assistant, but rather the principal, and that the dental operations he performed were performed independently and on his own responsibility, and not under the direct and immediate personal supervision of the alleged preceptors. The defendant did not bring himself within the exception of section 8 merely by proving that he was a student without proving the other qualifications in that section.

For this error, the judgment must be reversed, and there must be a new trial.

DAVIS v. SCHER.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—RESCISSION OF CON-TRACT—MISDESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

A statement of the number of rooms in a building in Newark contained in a written contract for sale of real estate is so material that its falsity will justify the vendee in rescinding the contract, although the vendor may be able to make the building answer the description before the day for performance.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Newark.

Action by Ignatz Davis against Louis Scher. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON and SWAYZE, JJ.

Philip J. Schotland, for appellant. Michael J. Tansey, for appellee.

SWAYZE, J. This is an action by a vendee of real estate against the vendor to recover $100 paid on account of the purchase price upon the execution of the agreement for sale. By the agreement, dated July 18, 1904, the defendant agreed to convey to the plaintiff, on or before the ensuing 1st of September, premises described as 317 Springfield avenue, in the city of Newark, consisting of a three-story frame building, with a store and two rooms on the first floor, six rooms on the second, and four rooms on the third floor. The plaintiff was unable to examine the interior of the building until about August 10th, and then discovered that there were but five rooms on the second floor and three rooms on the third floor. He then rescinded the contract and sought to recover his deposit. The only question is whether the misrepresentation was so material as to justify a rescission of the contract. The trial judge found in favor of the plaintiff. We think he was right. The mere fact that the parties inserted in the contract this particular statement of the number of rooms on each floor indicates that they thought it was material at the time; and clearly the number of rooms on each floor of a building of that character in a city like Newark may materially affect the income to be derived from the property. The right of the plaintiff to rescind does not depend on a fraudulent misrepresentation. It arises from the fact that he is not getting what he bargained for. The principle is the same that was stated by Justice Depue in Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. Law, 262, 264, 18 Am. Rep. 438.

It is argued in the present case that on September 1st, the day for performance of the contract, the number of rooms might have been as stated in the contract. In the absence of proof, the conditions existing on August 10th would be presumed to continue; but, aside from that consideration, the plaintiff had the right to rescind at once upon discovering that the building differed materially from the description.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

LEHIGH VALLEY R. CO. OF NEW JERSEY v. INHABITANTS OF TOWN OF PHILLIPSBURG.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 22, 1905.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN — OPENING STREETS — COMPENSATION.

The proceeding to condemn lands for laying out, opening, and establishing new streets, authorized by article 5, § 1, of an act entitled "An act to revise and amend the charter of the town of Phillipsburg" (P. L. 1872, p. 497), are superseded by the provisions of "An act to regulate the ascertainment and payment of compensation for property condemned or taken for public use." Revision of 1900 (P. L. 1900, p. 79).

2. SAME—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES.

The provision of section 17 in the act of 1900, supra (P. L. 1900, p. 86), excepting from the operation of the act cases of the "taking of land for a public improvement, where payments of the award for land taken and damages is authorized by the statute to be set off against or made wholly or partially in benefits to be assessed for the same improvement," does not include the charter of Phillipsburg, which contains no provision for any assessment for the cost of the land taken, and which provides only that, in estimating and assessing the damages to the landowner by taking his property, "the commissioners shall have due regard both to the value of the land and real estate and to the injury or benefit to the owner or owners thereof by making such improvements aforesaid."

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Proceedings by the inhabitants of the town of Phillipsburg against the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company of New Jersey to review such proceedings and a resolution of the common council of Phillipsburg. The railroad company brings certiorari. Proceedings set aside.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Smith & Brady, for prosecutor. J. I. Blair Reilly, for defendant.

GARRETSON, J. The writ in this case brings up the proceedings and resolution of the common council of the town of Phillipsburg touching the taking and appropriating of certain lands of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company for the extending and opening of Sitgreaves street between Abbett street and Center street, and the appointment of commissioners to make an estimate and assessment of damages. The resolution attacked was passed March 20, 1905, and the writ allowed April 15, 1905. The resolution recites that the town is desirous of extending Sitgreaves street, from Abbett street to Center street, in accordance with an ordinance passed; that certain lands of the prosecutor are necessary; that it has been unable to agree with the prosecutor for the land necessary, and resolves: "That the common council proceed to take and appropriate sufficient land and real estate of the said the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company of New Jersey for the extending and opening of said Sitgreaves street from Abbett street to Center street. * * * That the said common council proceed to appoint three disinterested freeholders, one of whom shall be a resident of the town of Phillipsburg and two of whom shall be residents of the township of Greenwich, of the county of Warren and state of New Jersey, commissioners to make an estimate and assessment of the damages that the said the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company of New Jersey may sustain by taking and appropriating in the manner provided by law such land and real estate. That the following persons, to wit: James Smith, a freeholder and resident of the town of Phillipsburg, and Owen Oberly and Lewis A. Fisher, freeholders and residents of the township of Greenwich, in the said county of Warren and state of New Jersey—be, and they are hereby, appointed commissioners for the purpose aforesaid. That these proceedings in the premises be entered on the journal, and that the town clerk within nine days from the date hereof furnish the said the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company of New Jersey with a full copy of the said record."

These proceedings were taken under "An act to revise and amend the charter of the town of Phillipsburg," approved March 8, 1872 (P. L. p. 478). By article 3, § 4, subd. 5, the common council is authorized to pass and enforce by-laws and ordinances "to ascertain and establish the boundaries of all streets, highways and public alleys of said town to lay out, open and establish new streets or alleys within said town and to order and cause any street, road, highway or alley already laid out and to be located, straightened, altered or widened and to take and appropriate for such purposes any land and real estate upon making compensation to the owner or owners thereof." P. L. 1872, p. 485. By article 5, § 1 (P. L. 1872, p. 497), it is provided "that whenever the common council shall determine by ordinance to straighten the lines of streets, lanes or alleys or lay out or open any new street, lane or alley within said town or make any sewer or drain in any part of the said town and to take and appropriate for such purpose any lands and real estate, they are hereby authorized to treat and agree with the owner or owners thereof for the same and for this purpose they may purchase said lands and real estate of the owner or owners thereof as they shall judge reasonable and shall receive from such owner or owners a conveyance of said lands to said town: Provided, however, that such agreement shall be in writing signed by the said owner or owners and reported to the common council who shall enter the same upon the journal and shall agree or disagree to the same and shall furnish the owner or owners of the said land and real estate with a full copy of the said record within three days thereafter and until such copy is furnished said agreement shall not take effect." Section 2: "That in case no agreement can be made for such purpose it shall be lawful for the common council to appoint three disinterested freeholders, one of whom shall be a resident of said town and two of whom shall be residents of the township of Greenwich in the county of Warren, commissioners to make an estimate and assessment of the damages that any such owner or owners may sustain by taking and appropriating in the manner aforesaid such lands and real estate; and in estimating and assessing such damages, the said commissioners shall have due regard both to the value of the lands and real estate and to the injury or benefit to the owner or owners thereof by making such improvements as aforesaid."

There is no provision in the charter for the assessment of the cost of lands so taken upon the property benefited. The damages so assessed are to be paid by the town treasurer under the direction of the common council. The prosecutor assigns as reasons for setting aside the resolution appointing commissioners: "First. Because the common council of the town of Phillipsburg had no authority to pass said resolution or to appoint commissioners to make an estimate and assessment of the damages that may be sustained by the prosecutor by reason of the taking and appropriating of its lands for public purposes. Second. Because the practice that heretofore existed in condemnation cases authorized by the charter of the town of Phillipsburg was superseded by the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the state of New Jersey entitled 'An act to regulate the ascertainment and payment of compensation for property condemned or taken for public use.' Revision 1900, approved March 20, 1900."

The seventeenth section of the act last referred to (P. L. 1900, p. 86) provides: "The practice prescribed by this act shall supersede the existing practice in all condemnation cases for the ascertainment of compensation except in cases of the taking of land for a public improvement where payment of the award for lands taken and damages is authorized by statute to be set off against or made wholly or partially in benefits to be assessed for the same improvement in which cases the procedure prescribed by this act shall not be exclusive of the procedure authorized by such statutes and the municipal corporation or other public body taking lands for a public improvement may elect to proceed under such statute and on such election the procedure prescribed by this act shall not apply to such taking." The benefits referred to in the general act are evidently the special benefits which are assessed upon the property specially benefited by the improvement contemplated, and are fixed after the value of the land taken is ascertained. They are an ascertained sum which becomes a debt of the property owner and when he comes to receive the full compensation for his property taken, to which he is entitled by law, he receives that full compensation in whole or in part by the cancellation of a debt he owes the municipality. The benefits to be considered under the Phillipsburg charter are not such special benefits, because none are assessed under that charter, but must be a part of the general benefits shared in by the whole property of the town, as the taxable property of the whole town pays for the cost of the improvement out of the taxes raised. It may be doubtful whether the ascertained value of the landowner's property can thus be reduced, and he be paid such reduced sum as the compensation for his property taken for public use. This general benefit cannot be regarded as a debt due from the property owner to the municipality, it is an increment of value to his property which he is entitled to have added to his property if it has accrued when the commissioners act, in common with all other property owners.

We think the proceedings should have been under the general act for condemnation of property taken for public use and the resolution of the common council appointing commissioners to condemn the land of the prosecutor is set aside. This makes it unnecessary to consider the other reasons alleged against the resolution.

RADLEY v. RADLEY et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. DOWER—EQUITABLE ESTATES.

2 Gen. St. p. 1275, § 1, extending the right of dower to lands whereof any other person was seised to the husband's use during his lifetime, conferred on the wife an estate in dower in all cases in which during the coverture a third person was seised to the use of the husband, under such circumstances as in equity entitled the husband or his heirs to a conveyance of the legal estate and actual seisin and possession of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Dower, § 45.]

2. SAME—RELEASE—DEEDS—EFFECT.

Where a married woman and her husband executed a deed to certain of his property to a trustee, the deed reciting that it was for the purpose of placing the title in the trustee and his heirs, free from the wife's dower or right of dower which she thereby released, the trustee to hold the property for the sole benefit of the husband and his heirs, to whom he should convey on written demand, the deed of itself raised an equitable estate in fee in the husband, as to which the deed was not effective as a release of the wife's dower, conferred by 2 Gen. St. p. 1275, § 1.

Bill by Pauline K. Radley against William M. Radley and others for dower. Decree for complainant.

Francis V. Dobbins, for complainant. George S. Silzer, for defendant heirs at law. E. S. Savage, for defendant Heald. Fred C. Hyer, for defendant Acken.

EMERY, V. C. To a bill for dower, the heirs at law set up by their answer the defense that complainant released her right of dower by a conveyance of the property made by herself and her husband in his lifetime to the defendant Acken. They also deny that complainant was the wife of Alfred N. Radley, the intestate, but this defense was not urged after the proof of marriage made at the hearing. As to the conveyance, the proofs disclosed the following facts bearing on the issues now involved. On November 18, 1901, Alfred N. Radley and the complainant, Pauline K., his wife, as parties of the first part, executed and acknowledged a deed to the defendant Moses H. Acken, reciting as its consideration the payment of $1,000 to Pauline K. Radley, and conveying to Acken in fee the premises in question, and further stating: "The object of this conveyance being to place the legal title of the premises above described in Moses H. Acken, as trustee for Alfred N. Radley, his heirs or assigns, free and clear of the dower and right of dower of the said Pauline K. Radley, she having by these presents, for the consideration above expressed of $1,000, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, sold, assigned, transferred and released all her dower and right of dower in and to the land above described." All estate, right, and demand of the parties of the first part, as well in law as in equity, was also conveyed to Acken, his heirs, and assigns forever, "in trust nevertheless and for the benefit of Alfred N. Radley, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns." This deed was dated November 14, 1901, and before its execution seems to have been submitted to the counsel of complainant. On its execution and acknowledgment on the 18th, Mr. Harris, the commissioner of deeds who took the acknowledgment, received from the husband $1,000 and paid it over to the wife, as the consideration for the deed. Subsequently, and on November 20, 1901, Acken executed and acknowledged a declaration of trust, reciting the conveyance to him and declaring that he held and would continue to hold the premises "in trust only, for the use and benefit of the said Alfred N. Radley, his heirs and assigns, free and clear of the right of dower of the said Pauline K. Radley," to whom the consideration named in the deed was paid by Alfred N. Radley for the release of her dower in said premises, and, for himself and his heirs, he further covenanted to "convey said premises or any part thereof by good and sufficient deed to the said Alfred N. Radley, or to his heirs and assigns whenever and as soon as I or they shall be thereunto requested in writing, free of dower and clear and discharged of and from all and every incumbrance thereon by me or my heirs."

The validity of the transaction as a post-nuptial settlement on the wife, in lieu of dower, which a court of equity would enforce as properly executed and reasonable, is not expressly involved on the pleadings in this case. The wife has not attacked the conveyance as unreasonable or improvidently made; nor, on the other hand, have the heirs alleged or proved that it was a reasonable settlement; at the hearing each party urges that the burden of attacking or supporting the release as a settlement is upon the other, and for the purposes of the present suit each party stands on the deed alone. The only direct issue here between the parties is therefore the effect of the wife's conveyance as a conveyance which is a bar to her dower, both at law and in equity, so long as it stands unimpeached. The dower act (2 Gen. St. p. 1275, § 1) provides: "That the widow, whether alien or not, of any person dying intestate or otherwise, shall be endowed for the term of her natural life of the one equal third part of all the lands, tenements and other real estate whereof her husband, or any other to his use, was seized of an estate of inheritance, at any time during the coverture, to which she shall not have relinquished or released her right of dower by deed executed and acknowledged in the manner prescribed at law for that purpose."

The wife has in this case released her right of dower by deed duly executed, but the question arises whether this deed to Acken operated to release her right of dower in the equitable estate of her husband, which was created by the deed itself. As to dower in equitable estates, under our statute, it was held by the Supreme Court, in Yeo v. Mercereau (1842) 18 N. J. Law, 387, that the effect of the statute in extending dower to lands, whereof any other person was seized to the husband's use, was to give the wife an estate in dower, in all cases in which, during the coverture, a third person was seized to the use of the husband, under such circumstances as in equity entitled the husband, or his heirs, to a conveyance of the legal estate and actual seisin and possession of the lands. It was not thought or decided by the majority of the court (Hornblower, C. J., White & Elmer, JJ. concurring) that dower in all trust estates was created (pages 391, etc.) although Nevius J. (page 402) thought it applied to estates held in trust, and this general scope seems to have been given to the statute by Mr. Justice Depue in Cushing v. Blake (Err.

& App. 1879) 80 N. J. Eq. 689, 695. In Yeo v. Mercereau the widow was held entitled to dower in lands conveyed to a third person "in trust, to and for the use of the husband and his heirs," and as to which the grantee six months subsequently executed a declaration of trust to the husband, covenanting "to convey the premises to him, his heirs, and assigns at any time thereafter." Under this decision, the effect of the deed to Acken, in trust for the husband and his heirs, was to create at once, and by the deed itself as soon as it took effect at all, an equitable estate in fee in the husband, and the question for decision therefore is whether the release of dower given in the deed creating this trust estate operated on this equitable estate of Radley which was the result of the deed. Had the deed simply conveyed the legal estate in fee to Acken, without declaring or raising a trust, and had the equitable estate in Radley arisen by a subsequent conveyance to him, or by a declaration of trust creating a merely passive trust, then clearly the release of dower in the lands made by the previous deed would not reach to or affect the right to dower in the equitable estate arising in the husband subsequently to the deed. In such case the wife, notwithstanding the release to Acken, would be entitled to dower, because of the subsequent seisin of an estate to the use of her husband, just as she would have been entitled to dower under a deed subsequently conveying the legal title of the premises to her husband. But as the wife might, under the statute, by a subsequent deed duly executed, have released her right of dower in this subsequently acquired equitable or legal estate, the question is whether this deed is in fact operative as releasing the wife's dower, not only in the legal estate, which the deed expressly conveys, but also the dower in the equitable estate, which is created in the husband by the deed itself, which dower in the equitable estate arose by operation of law, on the deed taking effect. That the parties intended the deed so to operate appears from the express declaration of the object of the conveyance, taken in connection with the express conveyance "in trust." Taking the whole conveyance, the object was to convey to Acken the legal title to be held in trust for Radley, free and clear of dower and right of dower of Mrs. Radley, in the lands; the trust, so far as it was created by the deed itself, being a merely passive trust to hold the lands. But the case cannot be settled merely as a question of intention of the parties. It is a question as to the operation and legal effect of the deed, and whether this intention was carried into effect by the deed, or whether the deed so far as the dower in the equitable estate of the husband created thereby is concerned, is not ineffective as a release of an estate, and is not merely an equitable agreement in reference to it, which may or may not be carried into effect as a postnuptial settlement. In other words, the question is: Did the release of dower in the equitable estate created by the deed have the operation of an executed conveyance of the estate in dower, or has it, as to this, only the effect of an executory contract?

Treating the case as one merely of the construction of the operation and effect of this deed on the equitable estate thereby created, I think the deed must be held not to operate as a conveyance or release, of the dower in the equitable estate. The reason is that this right of dower in the equitable estate arose in the wife by operation of law, as soon as the trust deed was executed and an equitable estate in the husband was created, and as an incident created by law in such equitable estate, and the parties could not by their deeds or declarations prevent the operation of the rules of law relating to the creation or vesting of estate, or the incidents of such estates. The wife might agree that the deed should bar her against any future claim to dower in the equitable estate, and such agreement might be enforced, and the conveyance may be treated in equity as sufficient evidence of such an agreement; but her mere release of dower to the grantee in trust did not of itself release or pass the right of dower in the trust estate which arose by the deed. The wife was not a party to the subsequent declaration of trust, and her rights to dower depend therefore on the construction of the deed to Acken, the trustee. This deed created a purely passive trust in the grantee "for the benefit of Radley, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns." By the subsequent declaration of trust, to which only the trustee and Radley were parties, the trustee covenanted to convey the premises to Radley, or to his heirs and assigns, upon request in writing, free of dower of the wife, and it may be that by this covenant an active trust was created in favor of the heirs of Radley. If an active trust in favor of the husband or his heirs had been created by the deed itself, a different situation might perhaps have resulted, for the decisions do not seem to go to the extent of giving the wife dower in equitable estates, where the trusts are active, as distinguished from merely passive trusts, where the grantee's sole trust is to hold the legal title for the benefit of the husband. But the trust estate, so far as created by this deed of the wife, was only such purely passive trust to hold the title for the husband and his heirs. And as the trust to convey on request in writing was one subsequently created by a declaration of trust, to which the wife was not a party, she cannot be affected by it, and the question whether this declaration did create an active trust is not material in the present case, and I do not decide it. Under the pleadings and proofs as they now stand, the deed cannot be considered as in itself a bar to dower, nor can it be considered as being a postnuptial settlement which should be enforced to bar the dower, for the reason that, such agreement being executory in its operation, defendants must show that it is a reasonable and proper settlement. The burden is upon them to allege and prove this defense, and it has neither been set up nor proved. Ireland v. Ireland (1887) 43 N. J. Eq. 311, 12 Atl. 184.

As the case now stands, complainant is entitled to a decree.

COMMONWEALTH v. FISHER.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 9, 1905.)

1. STATUTES—TITLE OF ACT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Act April 23, 1903 (P. L. 274), entitled "An act defining the powers of the several courts of quarter sessions of the peace, with reference to the care and control of dependent, neglected, incorrigible and delinquent children under the age of 16 years," and providing for the means in which such power may be exercised, contains only one subject, sufficiently expressed in its title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Statutes, §§ 183, 184.]

2. COURTS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CREATION OF NEW COURT.

Act April 23, 1903 (P. L. 274), defining the powers of the several courts of quarter sessions in respect to incorrigible children, is not unconstitutional as creating a new court; such court being already an ancient existing court, and not simply a criminal court recognized by the Constitution, which does not define its jurisdiction.

3. JURY—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL.

Act April 23, 1903 (P. L. 274), relating to the care and control of dependent and incorrigible children, is not unconstitutional, as denying the right to a child of trial by jury, as such child is not tried by the court for any offense, and the act is operative only when there is to be no trial; the purpose of the act being to prevent a trial.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CLASS LEGISLATION.

Act April 23, 1903 (P. L. 274), providing for the control and treatment of dependent and delinquent children, is not unconstitutional as class legislation.

BROWN, J. In a proceeding conducted in the court of quarter sessions of the county of Philadelphia under the provisions of the act of April 23, 1903 (P. L. 274), Frank Fisher, the appellant, was committed by that court to the House of Refuge. From the order so committing him an appeal was taken to the superior court, which affirmed it. Commonwealth v. Fisher, 27 Pa. Super. Ct.

175. The constitutionality of the act of 1903 was the sole question before the court in that case, and is renewed here. The objections of the appellant to the constitutionality of the act, as presented by counsel, are: (a) Under its provisions the defendant was not taken into court by due process of law. (b) He was denied his right of trial before a jury on the charge of the felony for which he had been arrested. (c) The tribunal before which he appeared, and which heard the case and committed him to the House of Refuge, was an unconstitutional body, and without jurisdiction. (d) The act provides different punishments for the same offense by a classification of individuals according to age. (e) The act contains more subjects than one, some of which are not expressed in the title. In considering these objections, the order in which they are made will not be followed.

The act is entitled "An act defining the powers of the several courts of quarter sessions of the peace, within this commonwealth, with reference to the care, treatment and control of dependent, neglected, incorrigible and delinquent children, under the age of 16 years, and providing for the means in which such power may be exercised." By this title notice of the purpose of the act is distinctly given. It is a single one. It is to define what powers the state, as the general guardian of all of its children, commits to the several courts of quarter sessions in exercising special guardianship over children under the age of 16 years needing the substitution of its guardianship for that of parents or others. This purpose is expressed in the title in as few words as are consistent with clearness. No one, from reading the title, can possibly misunderstand the purpose of the act that follows, and article 3, § 3, of the Constitution is not offended, if, in passing to the body of the act, nothing is there found but this one single purpose. The preamble to it is a recital that, as the welfare of the state requires that children should be guarded from association and contact with crime and criminals, and as those who, from want of proper parental care or guardianship, may become liable to penalties which ought not to be imposed upon them, it is important that the powers of the court, in respect to the care, treatment, and control of dependent, neglected, delinquent, and incorrigible children, should be clearly distinguished from those exercised by it in the administration of the criminal law. After defining the powers of the court the act proceeds to direct how they are to be exercised in giving effect to its purpose. Nothing in the first nine sections can be read as relating or germane to any other purpose than the one named; and there can be no surer test than this of compliance with the constitutional requirement of the singleness of purpose of an act of assembly.

The objection that "the act offends against a constitutional provision in creating, by its terms, different punishments for the same offense by a classification of individuals," overlooks the fact, hereafter to be noticed, that it is not for the punishment of offenders but for the salvation of children, and points out the way by which the state undertakes to save, not particular children of a special class, but all children under a certain age, whose salvation may become the duty of the state, in the absence of proper parental care or disregard of it by wayward children. No child under the age of 16 years is excluded from its beneficent provisions. Its protecting arm is for all who have not attained that age and who may need its protection. It is for all children of the same class. That minors may be classified for their best interests and the public welfare has never been questioned in the legislation relating to them. Under the act of 1887, the classification of females under 16 years of age means felonious rape, with its severe penalties for what may be done one day, though on the next it remains simple fornication, to be expiated by a mere fine. Other acts forbid the employment of minors under 12 years of age in mills; of any boy under 14, or any female, in anthracite coal mines; of minors under 14 in and about elevators; of a boy under 12, or any female, in bituminous coal mines. Others make it a misdemeanor to furnish intoxicating drinks, by sale, gift, or otherwise, to one under 21, and forbid the admission of any minor into certain places of amusement. Such classification is not prohibited by the Constitution, and what has not been therein prohibited the Legislature may enact. Shortly after the adoption of our present Constitution, we said, in the leading case Wheeler v. The City of Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338: "In like manner other subjects, trades, occupations, and professions may be classified; and not only things, but persons, may be so divided. The genus homo is a subject within the meaning of the Constitution. Will it be contended that as to this there can be no classification? No laws affecting the personal and property rights of minors as distinguished from adults? Or of males as distinguished from females? Or, in the case of the latter, no distinction between a feme covert and a single woman? What becomes of all our legislation in regard to the rights of married women, if there can be no classification? And where is the power to provide any future safeguards for their separate estate? These illustrations might be multiplied indefinitely, were it necessary."

No new court is created by the act under consideration. In its title it is called an act to define the powers of an already existing and ancient court. In caring for the neglected or unfortunate children of the Commonwealth, and in defining the powers to be exercised by that court in connection with these children, recognized by the state as its wards requiring its care and protection, jurisdiction is conferred upon that court as the appropriate one, and not upon a new one created by the act. The court of quarter sessions is not simply a criminal court. The Constitution recognizes it, but says nothing as to its jurisdiction. Its existence antedates our colonial times, and by the common law and statutes, both here and in England, it has for generations been a court of broad general police powers in no way connected with its criminal jurisdiction. Innumerable statutes upon our own books during the last two centuries attest this. With its jurisdiction unrestricted by the Constitution, it is for the Legislature to declare what shall be exercised by it as a general police court; and, instead of creating a distinctively new court, the act of 1903 does nothing more than confer additional powers upon the old court and clearly define them. On this point nothing can be profitably added to the following from the opinion of the superior court: "No new court is created, and the ancient court of quarter sessions, which is older than all the Constitutions of Pennsylvania, is given thereby not greater, but different, powers from those previously exercised. The court of quarter sessions has for many years exercised jurisdiction over the settlement of paupers, over the relation of a man to his wife and children in desertion cases, in surety of the peace cases, in the granting of liquor licenses, and in very many of the ways in which the public welfare is involved, where there is neither indictment nor trial by jury. It might as well be said that the court of quarter sessions is not a court of quarter sessions, 'because it keeps a separate road docket, or, for convenience, a separate docket for desertion cases, or appoints days in which it will hear a certain class of cases, or, as it is said in popular parlance, will hold a 'license court.' In the latter class of cases, where there is more than one court of common pleas within a county, it is usual for the courts themselves to designate the judges who shall hold what is known as the 'license court.' It has never been claimed, so far as we know—certainly not successfully claimed—that such designation was in any sense unconstitutional, or that, because of the designation, a separate court was created. It is no more so in the case under consideration than in any of the cases spoken of above." It is a mere convenient designation of the court of quarter sessions to call it, when caring for children, a 'juvenile court'; but no such court, as an independent tribunal, is created. It is still the court of quarter sessions before which the proceedings are conducted, and though that court, in so conducting them, is to be known as the 'juvenile court,' the records are still those of the court of quarter sessions.

In pressing the objection that the appellant was not taken into custody by due process of law, the assumption, running through the entire argument of the appellant, is continued that the proceedings of the act of 1903 are of a criminal nature for the punishment of offenders for crimes committed, and that the appellant was so punished. But he was not, and he could not have been without due process of law; for the constitutional guaranty is that no one charged with a criminal offense shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. To save a child from becoming a criminal, or from continuing in a career of crime, to end in maturer years in public punishment and disgrace, the Legislature surely may provide for the salvation of such a child, if its parents or guardian be unable or unwilling to do so, by bringing it into one of the courts of the state without any process at all, for the purpose of subjecting it to the state's guardianship and protection. The natural parent needs no process to temporarily deprive his child of its liberty by confining it in his own home, to save it and to shield it from the consequences of persistence in a career of waywardness; nor is the state, when compelled, as parens patriæ, to take the place of the father for the same purpose, required to adopt any process as a means of placing its hands upon the child to lead it into one of its courts. When the child gets there, and the court, with the power to save it, determines on its salvation, and not its punishment, it is immaterial how it got there. The act simply provides how children who ought to be saved may reach the court to be saved. If experience should show that there ought to be other ways for it to get there, the Legislature can, and undoubtedly will, adopt them, and they will never be regarded as undue processes for depriving a child of its liberty or property as a penalty for crime committed.

The last reason to be noticed why the act should be declared unconstitutional is that it denies the appellant a trial by jury. Here again is the fallacy that he was tried by the court for any offense. "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," are the words of the Bill of Rights, and no act of the Legislature can deny this right to any citizen, young or old, minor or adult, if he is to be tried for a crime against the commonwealth. But there was no trial for any crime here, and the act is operative only when there is to be no trial. The very purpose of the act is to prevent a trial, though, if the welfare of the public require that the minor should be tried, power to try it is not taken away from the court of quarter sessions; for the eleventh section expressly provides that nothing in the preceding sections "shall be in derogation of the powers of the courts of quarter sessions and oyer and terminer to try, upon an indictment, any delinquent child, who, in due course, may be brought to trial." This section was entirely unnecessary, for without it a delinquent child can be tried only by a jury for a crime charged; but, as already stated, the act is not for the trial of a child charged with a crime, but is, mercifully to save it from such an ordeal, with the prison or penitentiary in its wake, if the child's own good and the best interests of the state justify such salvation. Whether the child deserves to be saved by the state is no more a question for a jury than whether the father, if able to save it, ought to save it. If the latter ought to save, but is powerless to do so, the former, by the act of 1903, undertakes the duty; and the Legislature, in directing how that duty is to be performed in a proper case, denies the child no right of a trial by a jury, for the simple reason that by the act it is not to be tried for anything. The court passes upon nothing but the propriety of an effort to save it, and, if a worthy subject for an effort of salvation, that effort is made in the way directed by the act. The act is but an exercise by the state of its supreme power over the welfare of its children, a power under which it can take a child from its father and let it go where it will, without committing it to any guardianship or any institution, if the welfare of the child, taking its age into consideration, can be thus best promoted. "The true rule is 'that the court are to judge upon the circumstances of the particular case, and to give their directions accordingly.'" This was said in habeas corpus proceedings in Rex v. Sir Francis Blake Delaval et al., 3 Burr. 1434, by Lord Mansfield, in discharging Anne Catley, a minor. And he further said: "In the present case there is no reason for the court to deliver her to her father. She has sworn 'to have received ill usage from him before she was at all put out apprentice'; and, whilst she was with Bates, her master, it appears that her father seldom or never came near her, or ever gave her either advice or reprimand. It is even suspicious 'whether the father and mother were not parties to the conspiracy,' and whether the father does not carry on this prosecution in hopes of extorting money from the defendants. Let the girl, therefore, be discharged from all restraint, and be at liberty to go where she will."

By the act of April 10, 1835 (P. L. 133), which is a supplement to the act establishing the House of Refuge, authority was given to an alderman or justice of the peace, on complaint of a parent or guardian, to commit to that institution an incorrigible or vicious female under the age of 18 years. Mary Ann Crouse was committed to the institution by Morton McMichael, a justice of the peace of the county of Philadelphia, and in remanding her to the institution, in proceedings on a writ of habeas corpus for her discharge, on the ground that the act authorizing her commitment was unconstitutional, as she had not had a trial by a jury, this court, with Gibson as its Chief Justice, said in a per curiam: "The object of the charity is reformation, by training its inmates to industry, by imbuing their minds with principles of morality and religion, by furnishing them with means to earn a living, and, above all, by separating them from the corrupting influence of improper associates. To this end may not the natural parents, when unequal to the task of education, or unworthy of it, be superseded by the parens patriæ, or common guardian of the community? It is to be remembered that the public has a paramount interest in the virtue and knowledge of its members, and that, of strict right, the business of education belongs to it. That parents are ordinarily intrusted with it is because it can seldom be put into better hands; but, where they are incompetent or corrupt, what is there to prevent the public from withdrawing their faculties, held, as they obviously are, at its sufferance? The right of parental control is a natural, but not an unalienable, one. It is not excepted by the Declaration of Rights out of the subjects of ordinary legislation; and it consequently remains subject to the ordinary legislative power, which, if wantonly or inconveniently used, would soon be constitutionally restricted, but the competency of which, as the government is constituted, cannot be doubted. As to abridgment of indefeasible rights by confinement of the person, it is no more than what is born, to a greater or less extent, in every school; and we know of no natural right to exemption from restraints which conduce to an infant's welfare. Nor is there a doubt of the propriety of their application in the particular instance. The infant has been snatched from a course which must have ended in confirmed depravity; and not only is the restraint of her person lawful, but it would be an act of extreme cruelty to release her from it." Ex parte Crouse, 4 Whart. 9.

Appellate courts of other states have expressed this same view. Among the cases which might be cited is Wisconsin Industrial School for Girls v. Clark County, 103 Wis. 651, 79 N. W. 422, where it is said: "The power to place children under proper guardianship has been exercised by chancellors and judges exercising chancery powers from time immemorial. Said Lord Redesdale, in 1828, in Wellesley v. Wellesley, 2 Bligh (N. S.) 124, the right of a chancellor to exercise such power has not been questioned for 150 years. Such a proceeding is not a trial for an offense requiring a common law, or any jury. It was never so regarded in England, nor has it been in this country in but few instances, notably cases in New Hampshire and in People ex rel. O'Connell v. Turner, 55 Ill. 280, 8 Am. Rep. 645. That case was in effect overruled by later cases, and is not now considered as authority. Petition of Ferrier, 103 Ill. 367, 43 Am. Rep. 10; McLean County v. Humphreys, 104 Ill. 378. As said, in substance, in the Ferrier Case, the proceeding is not one according to the course of the common law, in which the right of trial by jury is guaranteed, but a mere statutory proceeding for the accomplishment of the protection of the helpless, which object was accomplished before the Constitution without the enjoyment of a jury trial. There is no restraint upon the natural liberty of children contemplated by such a law, none whatever, but rather the placing of them under the natural restraint, so far as practicable, that should be, but is not, exercised by parental authority. It is the mere conferring upon them that protection to which, under the circumstances, they are entitled as a matter of right. It is for their welfare and that of the community at large. The design is not punishment, nor the restraint imprisonment, any more than is the wholesome restraint which a parent exercises over his child. The severity in either case must necessarily be tempered to meet the necessities of the particular situation. There is no probability, in the proper administration of the law, of the child's liberty being unduly invaded. Every statute which is designed to give protection, care, and training to children, as a needed substitute for parental authority and performance of parental duty, is but a recognition of the duty of the state, as the legitimate guardian and protector of children where other guardianship fails. No constitutional right is violated, but one of the most important duties which organized society owes to its helpless members is performed, just in the measure that the law is framed with wisdom and is carefully administered. The conclusions above expressed are in accordance with adjudications elsewhere, with but very few exceptions. Roth v. House of Refuge, 31 Md. 329; Ex parte Crouse, 4 Whart. 9; Tiedeman, Lim. § 50; Prescott v. State, 19 Ohio St. 184, 2 Am. Rep. 388; People ex rel. Van Heck v. New York Catholic Protectory, 101 N. Y. 195, 4 N. E. 177; Cincinnati House of Refuge v. Ryan, 37 Ohio St. 197; St. Mary's Industrial School v. Brown, 45 Md. 310; Farnham v. Pierce, 141 Mass. 203, 6 N. E. 830, 55 Am. Rep. 452."

None of the objections urged against the constitutionality of the act can prevail. The assignments of error are therefore all overruled, and the order of the superior court, affirming the commitment below, is affirmed.

SAMPLE et al. v. CITY OF PITTSBURG et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. June 22, 1905.)

1. STATUTES—LOCAL OR SPECIAL LAWS.

Act April 20, 1905 (P. L. 221), providing that, where two cities are contiguous and in the same county, the smaller may be annexed to the larger, and describing the method of procedure, is in violation of Const. Art. 3, § 7, subd. 2, providing that the General Assembly shall not pass any local law regulating the affairs of cities, where the only two cities in the commonwealth that are "contiguous and in the same county" are the cities of Pittsburgh and Allegheny, and it is evident that the act was intended to legislate locally for them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Statutes, §§ 79, 81, 101-105.]

2. INJUNCTION—BILL BY CITIZENS—ANNEXATION OF CITIES.

A bill in equity, at the suit of citizens of Allegheny City, will lie to restrain the city of Pittsburg and its municipal officers from taking any steps to annex the city of Allegheny to the city of Pittsburg under the unconstitutional act of April 20, 1905 (P. L. 221).

3. STATUTES—LOCAL LAW—REGULATION OF CITIES.

Act April 20, 1905 (P. L. 221), providing for the annexation of one city by another, is a law "regulating the affairs" of cities, within Const. art. 3, § 7, subd. 2, prohibiting the passage of a local act for that purpose.

Potter, J., dissenting.

Bill by Thomas G. Sample and others against the city of Pittsburg and others. Decree for plaintiffs.

Argued before MITCHELL, O. J., and DEAN, FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, and ELKIN, JJ.

William A. Stone, Harvey Henderson, and W. C. Gill, for plaintiffs. Wm. B. Rodgers and T. D. Carnahan, for defendants. A. Leo Well, for interveners.

MESTREZAT, J. This is a bill filed in this court by the plaintiffs, who are citizens and taxpayers of Allegheny City, to restrain the defendants, the city of Pittsburg and William B. Hays, mayor, James S. Wightman, president of select council, and R. B. Ward, president of common council, from taking any proceedings to annex the city of Allegheny to the city of Pittsburg under the provisions of an act of assembly commonly known as the "Cook Law," entitled "An act providing that, where two cities are contiguous and in the same county, the smaller may be annexed to the larger, prescribing the method of proceeding and the effect of annexation, providing for the division of such enlarged cities into wards, for the apportionment of common council, and for the indebtedness of such cities," approved April 20, 1905 (P. L. 221). It appears from the averments of the bill that the city of Pittsburg, through its mayor and councils, has instituted proceedings in the court of quarter sessions of Allegheny county to have the city of Allegheny annexed to the city of Pittsburg under this act of assembly. The bill avers, inter alia, that the two cities are cities of the second class, located in Allegheny county, and are separated from each other by the Allegheny river and the Ohio river, both navigable streams; "that the said two cities of Pittsburg and Allegheny are the only two contiguous cities in the state of Pennsylvania, and are the only two cities in any county in the state that are contiguous; that there is no other locality in the state of Pennsylvania where there are two cities as classified under the laws of Pennsylvania, nor is there any other locality in the state where any borough or township is contiguous to a city that can be annexed thereto under the present laws of the state of Pennsylvania, except by a majority vote of the electors of said borough or town, as provided by the Constitution of Pennsylvania;" and that "the Cook law, under which the defendants are proceeding, is unconstitutional, because prohibited by article 3, § 7, subd. 2, of the Constitution, which provides that the General Assembly shall not pass any local or special law regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs, or school districts." It is further averred that "the Cook law is a local law, because its provisions can only apply to one locality, namely, the mouth of the Allegheny river, where it empties into the Ohio river, and for some distance above and below its mouth; that there is no other locality in the state of Pennsylvania to which the Cook law can apply, and it was the intention of the Legislature that it should only apply to this locality; that the law is special and class legislation, and is unconstitutional." The defendants filed an answer, in which they denied that the act in question is unconstitutional, and aver, inter alia, as follows: "It may be that the cities of Pittsburg and Allegheny are the only two contiguous cities of the state situate in the same county; but it is submitted that the time is not far distant when contiguity will exist as to the boundaries of other cities of the state, within the meaning of the act of the General Assembly approved April 20, A. D. 1905, * * * and that in the very near future the city of Pittsburg and the city of McKeesport, both of which are in Allegheny county, will be in all probability contiguous."

The first section of the act of 1905 provides, inter alia, that where two cities, situate in the same county, are or may be contiguous to each other, the city having the smaller population, as shown by the last preceding United States census, may be annexed to the city having the larger population, as shown by the said census. It is further provided in this section that, "for purposes of this act, cities separated by a stream, river or highway shall be included under the term 'contiguous.'" The act, then, in several sections provides in detail the proceedings which shall be taken to carry it into effect. The subject of this statute is the annexation of one city to another, and it requires no argument to show, and we understand it is conceded, that it must be regulated by general legislation. A careful consideration of the act, however, convinces us that it was not intended to be general in its operation throughout the state, and that it clearly offends against section 7 of article 3 of the Constitution of 1874, which provides that "the General Assembly shall not pass any local or special law * * * regulating the affairs of counties.

cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts." We do not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion of the power of the General Assembly to classify cities for the purposes of legislation, or the multitude of cases decided by this court on the subject. We are concerned here, not with the subject of classification of cities and whether the Legislature, in enacting the statute in question, has transgressed the Constitution in that respect, but simply whether the act is local or special legislation in contemplation of the constitutional provision prohibiting such legislation.

This section of the Constitution has frequently been the subject of interpretation by this court. Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258, involved the constitutionality of an act of assembly entitled "An act to provide for the holding of courts in certain cities of this commonwealth." The act required that in all counties containing a certain population, and having a city with a certain population, situate at a certain distance from the county seat, the judge of the courts of the county should hold a session of court in such city after every regular term of court for the county. This court held the act to be special legislation, and in conflict with article 3, § 7, of the Constitution. The trial judge in that case found that Crawford county was the only county to which the act could apply at that time. Mr. Justice Paxson, delivering the opinion, says (page 280): "This is classification run mad. Why not say all counties named Crawford, with a population exceeding 60,000, that contain a city called Titusville, with a population of over 8,000, and situated 27 miles from the county seat? Or all counties with a population of over 60,000, watered by a certain river or bounded by a certain mountain? There can be no proper classification of cities or counties, except by population. The moment we resort to geographical distinctions we enter the domain of special legislation, for the reason that such classification operates on certain cities or counties to the perpetual exclusion of all others. * * * That is not classification which merely designates one county in the commonwealth, and contains no provision by which any other county may, by reason of its increase of population in the future, come within the class." A subsequent and similar act intended to accomplish the same result, applying to counties and cities of the future, as well as of the present, was also declared unconstitutional in Scowden's Appeal, 96 Pa. 422. Justice Paxson, again delivering the opinion, says (page 425): "It is no part of our business to discuss the wisdom of this legislation. However vicious in principle we might regard it, our plain duty is to enforce it, provided it is not in conflict with the fundamental law. It requires but a glance at the act to see that it is an attempt to evade the Constitution. It is special legislation under the attempted disguise of a general law. Of all forms of special legislation this is the most vicious. * * * The act of June 12, 1879 (P. L. 174)," the act then under consideration, "makes no attempt at the classification of cities. It is merely an effort to legislate for certain cities of the fifth class to the exclusion of all other cities of the same class. That is to say, it refers only to cities of the fifth class which are situated in a county having a population of 60,000. * * * Classification which is grounded in no necessity, and has for its sole object an evasion of the Constitution, will not be encouraged."

McCarthy v. Commonwealth, 110 Pa. 243, 2 Atl. 423, involved the consideration of an act providing for payment of salaries, instead of fees, to county officers, and requiring the officers to pay the fees to the treasurer in counties containing a certain population. The act was held to be special legislation and void. In delivering the opinion, Mr. Justice Gordon says (page 246 of 110 Pa., page 424 of 2 Atl.): "But by what process of reasoning is this legislation, which has selected for its operation three or four counties from all those composing the commonwealth, to be justified? Is the justification to be found in the well-recognized legislative power of classification? We think not. It is admitted that classification, even where not specially recognized by nature, custom, the laws of trade, or the Constitution, must in certain cases be adopted ex necessitate, as in the case of cities, under the act of May 23, 1874 (P. L. 280). * * * There is here, however, a new and complete classification, and not a mere cutting out of one or more cities, designated by population, from the general class, and in this the act of 1874 is distinguishable from that of 1883 [the one then under consideration], in which no general classification is attempted, but a special legislation adopted for certain counties selected from all others, and to be ascertained by their populations rather than by their names. * * * If, indeed, such legislation were to be recognized as legitimate, vain would be the constitutional prohibition of local or special laws. But little ingenuity in the way of so-called classification would be necessary in order to isolate every single county, borough, ward, township, and school district in the state, and provide for each its own local code." In Morrison v. Bachert, 112 Pa. 322, 5 Atl. 739, we held an act to be local legislation which regulated the fees of county officers, "except in counties containing more than 150,000 or less than 10,000." Mr. Justice Paxson, delivering the opinion, says (page 328 of 112 Pa., page 740 of 5 Atl.): "That the act in question is in direct conflict with the Constitution is too plain for argument. It is only necessary to read the title to this act to see this. It excludes perpetually from its operation all counties having a population of over 150,000 inhabitants. This makes it a local law. If it can exclude Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, it may exclude every other county in the state but the one county seeking such special or local legislation. * * * Nor can this legislation be sustained upon any rational theory of classification. In point of fact, there is no attempt at classification. It was a mere exclusion of certain counties." In Scranton School District, 113 Pa. 176, 6 Atl. 158, an act was declared local legislation which provided for the levying of taxes, etc., but having a proviso excluding all cities of the third class which, by an ordinance, would not accept the provisions of the act. Green, J., delivering the opinion, says (page 190 of 113 Pa., page 159 of 6 Atl.): "The circumstance that the power to determine the question is delegated to another body does not at all affect the question. The practical result is the same, the law of 1875 will be limited to the one or more cities that do accept, and that makes it local. All our recent decisions are to the effect that, if local results either are or may be produced by a piece of legislation, it offends against this provision of the Constitution and is void."

In Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 377, an act giving the right to file a mechanic's lien, with a provision that it should not apply to counties having over a certain population, was held to be local, and therefore void. Mercur, C. J., in the opinion of the court says (page 384): "The main contention is whether the act of 1879 is in conflict with this clause of the Constitution. It shows on its face that it was not intended to apply, and does not apply, to the whole state. It assumes, what was a well-known fact, that some of the counties had each a population greater than 200,000. In the counties of Philadelphia and Allegheny, that greater population had been legally found by the census of 1870. * * * It was not, then, a general act applicable to every part of the commonwealth. It did apply to a great number of counties; but there is no dividing line between a local and a general statute. It must be either the one or the other. If it apply to the whole state, it is general; if to a part only, it is local. As a legal principle, it is as effectually local when it applies to 65 counties out of the 67, as if it applied to the one county only. The exclusion of a single county from the operation of the act makes it local." Perkins v. Philadelphia, 156 Pa. 554, 27 Atl. 356, involved the consideration of "an act to abolish commissioners of public buildings, and to place all public buildings heretofore under the control of such commissioners, under the control of the department of public works in cities of the first class." The act was held to be local and unconstitutional. Mr. Justice Dean, delivering the opinion, says (page 562 of 156 Pa., page 359 of 27 Atl.): "This act purports to be a general law applicable to cities of the first class. We have held, and now adhere to it, that the Legislature may lawfully classify cities for corporate purposes, and that an act to promote such purposes is not local or special merely because at the date of its passage there was but one city to which it applied. But it has been decided in case after case, since the Constitution of 1874 went into effect, in positive, unmistakable language, that if the act was intended to apply to but one particular city, county or township, and was not intended to and could never apply to any other, it was local, and therefore unconstitutional. This act is nominally general, applies in terms to cities in the first class, abolishes commissioners of public buildings for the use of courts and municipal purposes in such cities, created by special acts of assembly, and places all buildings heretofore under their control in the control of the department of public works. At the date of its passage there was just one city, one set of commissioners, one special act of assembly, one public building, to which it could apply. From the very nature of the case, there never could be another city in the first class to which the act could apply, for it transfers to the department of public works buildings heretofore under the control of such commissioners. No matter how many cities come into this class, nor how soon they reach it, this act cannot apply to them; for their affairs have not heretofore been regulated by any such act as that of 1870."

From these and other decisions of the court, it is settled that the test whether a statute is local and special legislation within the prohibition of the Constitution is whether it operates upon all counties or cities alike, and, when they are properly classified, it acts upon all counties or cities of the same class alike, or whether it operates upon certain counties or certain cities, or upon a part of a class of counties or cities, and excludes all others. If the latter is the result or effect of the act, and it was so intended to be, it is local or special, notwithstanding it is in terms general. The court will look at the substance and not the form of legislation in determining the question, and a local or special act, repugnant to the fundamental law, will be declared void, though it may be disguised as a general act. Classification of cities may be used as a basis for legislation which relates to municipal affairs; but if the legislation concern subjects of general, as distinguished from a municipal, character, it passes into the realm of local or special legislation forbidden by the Constitution. However disguised, classification can never be successfully invoked for the purpose of evading the constitutional inhibition against local or special legislation.

The answer of the defendants raises the question of the right of the plaintiffs, citizens and taxpayers of Allegheny City, to maintain this bill and test the constitutionality of the act of 1905. We think this question too well settled to require extended discussion. Wells v. Bain, 75 Pa. 39, 15 Am. Rep. 563; Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 388; Pittsburgh's Appeal, 79 Pa. 317. This last case was a bill to restrain the city of Pittsburgh and its officers from exercising authority over an adjacent municipality admitted to the city by an ordinance passed in pursuance of an act of assembly, the provisions of which the plaintiffs, citizens, and taxpayers of the municipality claimed had not been complied with by councils in admitting the municipality as part of the city. The defendants denied the right of the plaintiffs to maintain the bill. In sustaining the bill, Mr. Justice Gordon, speaking for the court, said (page 324): "The right of a private citizen to maintain a bill, such as that upon which this case is founded, is hardly open for argument. So many are the cases in which such bills have been sustained that one might suppose this matter to be no longer open for debate." It was also said in the opinion that "the plaintiff, who is threatened by most burdensome impositions, should have the power to inquire into the right by which the councils of Pittsburg proposed to act in subjecting his person and property to their jurisdiction for the purposes of municipal government and taxation."

There can be no doubt that the act of 1905 regulates the "affairs of cities" in contemplation of the Constitution. In Morrison v. Bachert, 112 Pa. 322, 5 Atl. 739, the trial court defined "affairs of counties" to be such "as concern counties in their governmental and corporate capacity." This court, however, thought the definition too narrow a construction of these words, and held that, "when it [the Constitution] speaks of the affairs of a county, it means such affairs as affect the people of that county." In that case it was held that an act to ascertain and appoint the fees to be received by certain county officers was an act regulating the affairs of counties. This construction of the clause in question was followed and approved in Frost v. Cherry, 122 Pa. 417, 15 Atl. 782, where it was held that this clause of the Constitution avoided an act of assembly repealing a section of the fence law of 1700. And in Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258, and in Scowden's Appeal, 96 Pa. 422, this court held that an act of assembly authorizing the holding of special sessions of the courts of certain counties away from the county seat was a law regulating the affairs of counties, and was special legislation and void. In Perkins v. Philadelphia, 156 Pa. 554, 27 Atl. 356, it was held that an act of assembly "regulates the affairs of the city" which abolished the commissioners of public buildings and placed all public buildings theretofore under their control in the control of one of the departments of the city government. The act under consideration here not only affects the people of the two cities, but concerns the two cities in their governmental and corporate capacities. It enlarges the territory and population of one, and deprives the other of its charter and government as a city. It is apparent, we think, that the act is a "law regulating the affairs of" cities within its operation.

Is the legislation in question of local or special operation, and therefore within the prohibition of article 3, § 7, of the Constitution? This is the vital and controlling question in the case, and under the well-established rules of constitutional interpretation and our own construction of the clause in question it must be answered in the affirmative. The title of the act clearly indicates the subject of the enacting part, and discloses the local and special features of the statute. It shows that the act was not intended to apply to any two cities of the state, so as to make it general in its operation; but conditions are imposed which restrict its application to certain cities, thereby depriving the other cities of the state of the benefit of its provisions. The statute is operative "where two cities are contiguous and in the same county." Its provisions can be invoked to annex only two cities and when they are thus situated. Two cities of this description may be annexed to each other, and all others are excluded from the operation of the statute. As we take judicial cognizance of the municipal divisions of the state, as well as of their location, we know, as averred in the bill and not denied in the answer, that the cities of Allegheny and Pittsburg, in Allegheny county, are the only two contiguous cities in the state, and that there are no two contiguous cities in any other county in the state. The act, therefore, is limited in its operation to these two cities, and the effect or result of the legislation is the same, and the act as clearly special, as if the names of the two cities had been written in the statute, instead of the periphrase used in the description of the cities subject to its operation.

The identification to the two cities intended to be affected by the act is also aided by the provision of the statute that, "for purposes of this act, cities separated by a stream, river or highway shall be included under the term contiguous." Aside from the contention that the act applies only to cities separated by a stream, river, or highway, this clause of the act clearly suggests the two Allegheny county cities as the cities subject to its operation. We judicially know that Pittsburg and Allegheny are the only two cities in the commonwealth separated by a stream or highway, and the fear that that fact would render those cities not contiguous, within the meaning of the statute, moved the promoters of this legislation to further identify them by inserting this clause in the act. This feature should not and cannot be ignored when the court is called upon to test the constitutionality of the statute, as it clearly earmarks the legislation as local and special.

There is no merit in the contention that at some time in the future there may be two other cities which may become contiguous, and in that event can be consolidated under the provisions of the act. With a knowledge of the facts, known to the Legislature as well as to the court, this is not within the range of probability, but a possibility so remote that it must be excluded from consideration in determining the constitutionality of the statute. It could only occur if a community adjacent to any of the cities of the state should become sufficiently populous to enable it to become a city, and should take the necessary legal steps to make itself a city and subject to the operation of the act, or if the boroughs lying between and connecting certain cities of the state should, by the requisite legal proceedings, be annexed to those cities or form themselves into a city, and thereby connect two existing cities, so as to make the act operative. These are simply contingencies within the realm of speculation, and entirely too remote to support legislation otherwise repugnant to the constitutional mandate.

The statute requires any two cities desirous of availing themselves of its provisions to be located in the same county. This confines the act in its operation to cities within certain territorial limits, and brings it within the domain of special legislation prohibited by the Constitution. The act does not attempt to classify cities on any basis whatever. It provides simply that it shall operate upon two cities situated in the same county. It therefore excludes from its provisions and denies its privileges to all cities separated by a county line, or which are not wholly within the same county, although occupying contiguous territory. All cities whose boundaries are coterminous with the county line are perpetually excluded from the operation of the statute, although other cities may adjoin them at different parts of their boundaries. This distinction made in the act between the cities of the commonwealth is not based upon necessity, nor upon any grounds which the law recognizes as justifying classification. Its effect is to restrict the operation of the statute to two cities located in the same territorial division of the state; and, when considered in the light of the conceded facts, it fixes with unmistakable certainty the two cities to be consolidated under its provisions. A clearer or more palpable attempt to evade the constitutional prohibition against special and local legislation is not disclosed in any of the numerous bills introduced in the General Assembly since the adoption of the present Constitution, not excepting the statute which Mr. Justice Paxson, in Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258, very properly characterized as "classification run mad."

The present Constitution went into effect almost a third of a century ago. Prior to its adoption, there was practically no constitutional restraint on the power of the General Assembly to enact local or special legislation. As has been pointed out in the opinions of this court, one of the manifest objects of the adoption of the last Constitution by the people of the state was to eradicate the evils of local and special legislation which had grown to such an extent as to make its abuse almost unendurable. Such was the purpose of section 7 of article 3, which specifies more than 50 subjects on which the General Assembly is prohibited from passing any local or special law. Notwithstanding this emphatic and comprehensive declaration in the Constitution against this species of legislation, there has not been a session of the General Assembly since its adoption that the framers of legislation have not attempted to evade this provision of the instrument by all the ingenuity at their command. They have done this in the face of repeated warnings of this court that the constitutional mandate would be rigidly enforced. Nearly 20 years ago, in speaking of this provision of the Constitution and the intention of the court to compel a strict observance of it, in Morrison v. Bachert, 112 Pa. 322, 5 Atl. 739, Mr. Justice Paxson said (page 328 of 112 Pa., page 739 of 5 Atl.): "It was a wise provision and will be sternly enforced. It is our purpose to adhere rigidly to that instrument, that the people may not be deprived of its benefits. It ought to be unnecessary for this court to make this judicial declaration; but it is proper to do so, in view of the amount of legislation which is periodically placed upon the statute book in entire disregard of the fundamental law. As we view it, this note of warning at this time is needed." We desire to reiterate and emphasize this admonition. It is within our power, and it is our duty, to strike down legislation repugnant to any provision of the Constitution. It is not the province of either department of the government to criticize or question the wisdom of the people in the adoption of any part of their fundamental law; nor can either department be permitted to ignore or evade its provisions under any pretext or by any device whatever.

We are of opinion that the act of April 20, 1905, providing for the annexation of two contiguous cities in the same county, is local and special legislation, within the prohibition of article 3, § 7, of the Constitution, and is therefore void. It follows that the defendants are without authority to institute or maintain the proceedings taken by them for the purpose of annexing the city of Allegheny to the city of Pittsburg, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief prayed for in the bill.

Decree.

This cause came on to be heard on bill and answer, and was argued by counsel, and now, June 22, 1905, after consideration it is ordered and decreed that an injunction be issued perpetually restraining the city of Pittsburg, and William B. Hays, mayor, James S. Wightman, president of select council, and R. B. Ward, president of common council of the city of Pittsburg, and each of them, from taking or maintaining any proceedings under the act of assembly approved April 20, 1905, for the purpose of annexing the city of Allegheny to the city of Pittsburg. It is further ordered that the costs of this proceeding be paid by the city of Pittsburg.

POTTER, J. (dissenting). I am not able to agree with the reasoning of the opinion which has been adopted by the majority of the court in this case, nor to accept the conclusion therein set forth. Even if it be true that the act in question was intended to facilitate the union of Pittsburg and Allegheny, yet that fact cannot in itself affect the constitutionality of the act. The fact that legislation meets the needs of some particular locality does not render it obnoxious to the Constitution. Perhaps most legislation owes its origin to special or particular needs, which are no less meritorious because they must be included in and satisfied by laws expressed in general terms. In his work, "Restrictions upon Local and Special Legislation," Mr. Binney has defined general laws to be such as "operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things requiring legislation peculiar to themselves in the matters covered by the laws." A law is to be regarded as general when it is framed in general terms, is restricted to no locality, and operates equally upon all of a group of objects whose condition or needs render such legislation appropriate. The act of April 20, 1905 (P. L. 221), provides for the consolidation of any two contiguous cities situate in the same county in the state. It must be admitted that any "two contiguous cities" is a general expression. It matters not at how many or how few places in the state there may be two cities which are contiguous. Wherever and whenever there are such, the act would apply. As Mr. Binney says, if the classification be valid, the number of members in a class is wholly immaterial; so that it makes no difference whether there be 1 or 100 places in the state which will at the present time fit the conditions of the act, so long as the way is open for other places to come in as occasion may arise.

But it is suggested that the further limitation of the operation of the act to cases where two contiguous cities are "situate in the same county" makes it local. But why so? In so far as the language of the act is concerned, no county in the state is excluded from its operation. There are sound reasons why no city should be allowed to extend beyond the boundaries of a single county, and the limitation in that respect, if general, is legitimate. Under the act of February 2, 1854 (P. L. 21), a local act applying to Philadelphia, it is provided that the boundaries of Philadelphia shall be extended so as to embrace the whole of the territory of the county of Philadelphia; and it is suggested that, because there cannot therefore be two contiguous cities in Philadelphia county, that county is excluded from the operation of this act, with the result that the legislation thereby becomes local. But this court decided squarely in Evans v. Philippi, 117 Pa. 226, 11 Atl. 630, 2 Am. St. Rep. 655, that a statute general in form is not to be treated as a local one simply because of the intervention of some local statute, unrepealed, which prevents it from taking general effect. Aside from that, it is difficult to see why the fact that one county in the state is already so filled with a city as to leave room for no other contiguous city within its boundaries should be any more of an obstacle to the efficiency of a general law than the fact that in many counties of the state no cities at all exist at the present time. The local act governing Philadelphia may be repealed, and that county may be enlarged, in which case this act would apply to every county in the state. And contiguous cities may grow up in any county, which, under the terms of this act, may in due time be annexed to each other and consolidated into one municipality.

I would uphold the constitutionality of the act of April 20, 1905, and dismiss this bill.

HARTFORD WHEEL CLUB v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Nov. 7, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT — SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS—THEORY OF CASE.

Where complainant, in summary proceedings to recover real property, alleged that defendant was complainant's lessee by virtue of a monthly hiring as alleged, such complaint was inconsistent with a right in complainant to enforce a forfeiture of a lease executed by its grantor to defendant.

2. SAME—LEASE FOR YEARS—TERMINATION.

Where a lease for a definite term provided that it should become void on nonpayment of rent, such provision did not create a limitation of the term, but a mere condition subsequent, for the breach of which the lessor at his option might terminate the lease.

3. SAME—BREACH OF CONDITION—WAIVER—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in a summary proceedings to recover possession of real property, the landlord, after electing to declare a forfeiture under the lease for nonpayment of rent, accepted and received from the tenant rent subsequently accruing, the tenant was entitled to an instruction that the forfeiture of the lease might be waived by the subsequent payment and acceptance of such rent.

4. SAME—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a lease provided that the tenant should surrender the premises at the expiration of the term or on the sooner termination of the lease, and waived all demand for rent, re-entry, notice to quit as required by law, and every other formality whatever, such waiver only authorized the lessor to commence an action to recover possession without demand and re-entry, and did not preclude the tenant from relying on a waiver of a forfeiture by the landlord, consisting of the acceptance of rent subsequently accruing.

Error to Court of Common Pleas, Hartford County; John Coats, Judge.

Summary process for the recovery of real property by the Traveler's Insurance Company against the Hartford Wheel Club. A justice's judgment in favor of plaintiff was affirmed by the court of common pleas, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

On September 10, 1904, one John P. Harbison leased to the Hartford Wheel Club a tenement in his building on the corner of Main and Grove streets in Hartford for the term of two years and nine months from August 1, 1904, at the annual rent of $900. The lessee covenanted to pay the rent in equal monthly payments on the 1st day of every month, beginning with September, 1904. Immediately following the lessee's covenant to quit and surrender said premises at the expiration of the term or sooner termination of the lease, the lessee agreed that "all demand for rent or re-entry, notice to quit possession as required by law, and every other formality whatever are hereby expressly waived." There was a subsequent provision, by which the lessee arranged for securing payment of rent by creating a lien on his goods, etc., in favor of the lessor; provided said rent shall remain unpaid 20 days after the same becomes due, then this lease shall become void at the option of the lessor, without notice. The Hartford Wheel Club entered under this lease, and has since remained in possession of the premises. On January 3, 1905, Harbison conveyed the land and building, which included the leased premises, to the Travelers' Insurance Company, with the usual covenants of warranty, excepting existing leases. On April 3, 1905, the Travelers' Insurance Company commenced a proceeding in summary process against the Hartford Wheel Club before John F. Forward, a justice of the peace, to recover possession of said leased premises. The case was tried to a jury. Upon the trial the question whether by force of a letter of December 15, 1904, written by Harbison and claimed to have been received by the defendant, there had been a termination of the written lease between Harbison and the defendant in consequence of a forfeiture for nonpayment of rent, was in issue as a controlling question. A bill of exceptions was settled and filed, disclosing in connection with the pleadings the claims of the parties, the state of evidence and conceded facts appearing at the close of the testimony, and stating that the defendant asked the justice to charge the jury that, if the jury found that there had been a forfeiture of said lease for the nonpayment of rent, the subsequent acceptance of rent by the plaintiff and its grantor operated as a waiver of said forfeiture, and that the justice refused this request. After verdict and judgment for the complainant, the defendant obtained this writ of error, assigning error in the refusal of the justice to charge as requested, and other errors in law claimed to be in-involved in the justice's judgment. Upon the return of the writ of error to the court of common pleas, the defendant in error pleaded "Nothing erroneous," and the court of common pleas found this issue for the defendant in error, and rendered judgment affirming the judgment of the justice court. This appeal from the judgment of the court of common pleas is in the nature of a motion in error, and presents the question whether the justice of the peace manifestly erred in not charging the jury as requested by the (defendant) plaintiff in error.

Andrew J. Broughel, Jr., for appellant.
Robert C. Dickenson and William Bro. Smith, for appellee.

HAMERSLEY, J. (after stating the facts). The complainant, in the proceeding of summary process, claimed that the defendant was its lessee by virtue of a monthly hiring as alleged in its complaint. The allegations of its complaint are inconsistent with any right in the complainant to enforce in this proceeding a forfeiture of the Harbison lease in pursuance of the terms thereof. Its complaint is based solely on the allegations that, when the premises were conveyed to it on January 3, 1905, the defendant was lawfully in possession under a lease from its grantor for the month of January; that on February 1st this lease expired from lapse of time; that on February 15th the complainant gave the defendant the statutory notice to quit possession, and, notwithstanding this notice, the defendant still holds over. The proceeding is not one by a lessor to obtain possession after the termination of his lease by reason of any express stipulation thereof, but is one to obtain possession after his lease has terminated by lapse of time. The Harbison lease and its termination, as alleged by the complainant, were essential evidential facts. Unless the termination were proved, the complainant could not establish the lease for one month and its expiration by lapse of time, on which its complaint is based. The complainant claimed that the defendant's failure to pay Harbison the rent for the month of October within 20 days after the same became due was a cause for forfeiture; that the letter of December 15th, received by the defendant before another failure to pay rent within the time limited, completed the forfeiture, and operated as an absolute and final termination of the lease. The defendant claimed that the letter did not complete the forfeiture and that, if it must be treated as completing the forfeiture, the acceptance of subsequently accruing rent by the lessor operated as a waiver of the forfeiture claimed to be thus proved.

The law of this state applicable to these claims upon the state of facts appearing in the record is settled. When a lease for years provides that the term shall only extend to the happening of a certain event, the term ends upon the happening of that event absolutely and irrespective of the wishes or the action of either party. But, when a lease for a definite number of years contains a provision that the lease shall become void upon the nonpayment of rent, that provision does not create a limitation of the term, but merely a condition subsequent, for the breach of which the lessor may at his option end and terminate the lease. By the breach the lessee forfeits his right to the continuance of the lease, and the lessor gains the right to terminate the lease in the manner prescribed by law; but, until so terminated, the lease remains in force, and the lessee is bound by its obligations. In order to take advantage of the forfeiture, the lessor must make demand of performance on the day the rent becomes due, if the forfeiture occurs upon a failure to pay on that day, or, if the forfeiture occurs upon failure to pay within a certain number of days after the rent becomes due, then upon the last day of the time so limited. The lessor, having made demand, must enter upon the leased premises for the purpose of asserting his right to possession thereof, by which act he declares his will to avoid the lease, and treats the lessee as no longer a tenant, but a mere trespasser, upon his land; or he must do some other act which is equivalent to such entry, and as unequivocally and certainly as a formal entry treats the lessee as a mere trespasser. Upon such demand and entry the lessor acquires the right, after legal notice, to bring ejectment or summary process for possession of the premises, and to enforce the termination of the lease as of the day of entry; and the lessee acquires the right to insist upon the termination of the lease and his consequent release from its obligations. Chalker v. Chalker, 1 Conn. 79, 91, 6 Am. Dec. 206; Bowman v. Foot, 29 Conn. 331, 341; Camp v. Scott, 47 Conn. 366; Read v. Tuttle, 35 Conn. 25, 95 Am. Dec. 215; Duppa v. Mayo, 1 Saunders, p. 287, note 16; Clark v. Jones, 1 Denio (N. Y.) 517, 518, 43 Am. Dec. 706; Mackubin v. Whetcroft, 4 Har. & McH. 135, 154.

By failing to make the requisite demand, the lessor loses his right to enforce the forfeiture. Having made demand, the lessor may waive his right to enforce the forfeiture at any time before entry by acceptance of after-accruing rent. And even an unqualified demand for such rent is a waiver of the forfeiture. By this act the lessor unequivocally treats the lessee as still his tenant, notwithstanding the forfeiture, and as lawfully in possession under the lease, and enforces the obligations imposed upon him as tenant by the terms of the lease. This power of waiver before entry belongs absolutely to the lessor, and may be exercised by him independently of any action by the tenant. After the lessor's election to enforce the forfeiture is declared by entry, and before the consequent termination of the lease is finally settled by the lessee's surrender of possession or his ejectment by the lessor, the power of waiver remains, but cannot, before entry, be exercised by the lessor alone, independently of the lessee. By the entry the lessee has acquired a right to regard this treatment of him as a mere trespasser as binding upon the lessor, and to insist upon the consequent termination of the lease and his release from its obligations. This right he may waive; and so the power of waiving a forfeiture after entry does not belong to the lessor alone, but depends also upon the action of the lessee. When the forfeiture has been determined by entry, and the lessee, still in possession, waives his rights accruing from that determination by the payment of after-accruing rent, and the lessor by the acceptance of that rent treats the lessee as still his tenant, and not as a continuing trespasser, there is a waiver of the forfeiture, binding alike upon the lessor and lessee. This law in respect to waiver rests upon plain principles of justice controlling the rights and duties of the parties in relation to the peculiar forfeiture arising upon the breach of a covenant in a lease for years to pay rent upon a day certain. Bowman v. Foot, 29 Conn. 331, 337; Camp v. Scott, 47 Conn. 366, 370, et seq.; Fifty Associates v. Howland, 11 Metc. 99, 102; Coon v. Brickett, 2 N. H. 163, 165; Jackson v. Sheldon, 5 Cow. 448; Goodright v. Cordwint, 6 Term. Rep. 219.

In the present case the only default from which a termination of the lease on December 15th is claimed occurred on November 21st, when the lessee failed to pay the rent for the month of October within 20 days after it became due. There appears to have been no demand on the lessee for performance on November 21st, or at any time, unless, indeed, the letter of December 15th should be treated as a demand. And there was no re-entry, unless the mailing and receipt of the letter of December 15th is the equivalent of re-entry and as certainly as a formal entry asserts the lessor's right to immediate possession and treats the lessee as a mere trespasser on the premises. But, waiving the matter of demand and the question of the legal sufficiency of the letter of December 15th to take the place of a formal entry, it appears in the bill of exceptions that the rent for the month of October was paid, and a receipt given therefor under date of December 31, 1904, and that the rent for the month of November, which accrued after the lessee's act of forfeiture on November 21st, namely, December 1st or within 20 days thereafter, was paid by the lessee to the authorized agent of the lessor, and said rent was accepted by said agent, who gave to the lessee a receipt therefor under date of January 3, 1905. Under these circumstances the defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed that the forfeiture of the lease, which the complainant claimed the lessor had elected to enforce on December 15th by his letter of that date, might be waived by the subsequent payment of after-accruing rent by the lessee and its acceptance by the lessor.

The right of the defendant to instruction as to the waiver of the forfeiture is not affected by the clause in the lease immediately following the promise of the lessee to make punctual payment of the rent, and to "quit and surrender the premises at the expiration of said term or sooner termination of this lease," in which clause the lessee agrees that "all demand for rent or re-entry, notice to quit possession, as required by law, and every other formality whatever are hereby expressly waived." The waiver, if regarded as unlimited, cannot change the provision of the lease from a condition subsequent into an absolute limitation of the term, so that upon the occurrence of the lessee's default the term shall absolutely cease, irrespective of the wishes of the parties. The utmost effect that can be given the unlimited waiver is to enable the lessor to commence his action for obtaining possession, whether it be ejectment or summary process, without demand and re-entry. In that case the commencement of the action operates as the equivalent of demand and re-entry, and the power of waiving the forfeiture before action commenced exists, whether or not an unnecessary entry or its equivalent may be in fact made. Under any permissible view of the provisions of the lease, the forfeiture arising upon the lessee's default might have been waived after the letter of December 15th and before action brought; and the fact of such waiver was material in determining the issue in the justice trial.

The defendant's request to charge must be read and understood in reference to the issues presented by the pleadings, to the claims and state of facts appearing in the bill of exceptions, and to the law applicable thereto. So read and understood, we think the trial justice plainly erred in the unqualified refusal of the request; and this error is apparent upon the record of the proceedings before the justice.

Additional requests to charge, made to the justice, were correctly refused. Other errors, assigned in the writ as involved in the judgment of the justice court, do not properly appear in the record.

There is error in the judgment of the court of common pleas. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to render judgment for the plaintiff in error.

ENGEL v. CONTI.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
Nov. 7, 1905.)

WITNESSES—REDIRECT EXAMINATION.

Where, in an action for alienating the affections of plaintiff's wife, he testified that he had not lived with her or had any connection with her during the preceding eight months, but on cross-examination admitted that within two weeks he had gone with her one evening to a neighboring city, where they had occupied the same room in a hotel, she sleeping in the bed and he on the floor, he was properly permitted to testify on redirect examination that while they were so alone together she proposed that he discontinue his suit against defendant in consideration of defendant's dismissing a suit against plaintiff, as she did not desire court proceedings, and that she did not come to him for the purpose of resuming marital relations.

Torrance, C. J., and Hall, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hartford County; Edwin B. Gager, Judge.

Action by Herman Engel against Angelo Conti. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph P. Tuttle, for appellant. Benedict M. Holden, for appellee.

BALDWIN, J. The complaint alleged that the affection of the plaintiff's wife for him had been wholly destroyed, and that he had wholly lost her society. In proof of this, he testified at the trial that he had not lived with her or had any connection with her during the preceding eight months. On cross-examination he stated that within two weeks he had gone with her one evening from Hartford (where each then resided) to the neighboring city of New Britain, where they spent the night at a hotel in the same bedroom; she sleeping in the bed, and he on the floor, and not with her. Having stated on redirect examination that they talked together while in the hotel, he was asked what was said by each. This question was objected to, but admitted; and in reply he testified that she said that she had come to him for the last time, that the defendant in the present action wanted to settle it, that she wanted him to drop it, that if he did the defendant would drop one which he had brought against the plaintiff, that she did not want to go to court, and that there was no use in proving things that happened a year ago, and also asked who his witnesses were, to all of which he replied that he had supposed she wanted to ask him to live with her again, and not to talk about this case, and that he should insist upon its trial. Upon recross-examination he testified, among other things, that he went to New Britain at her solicitation and expense, that she told him that she wanted to talk to him in the cars while going there, that she induced him to go to the room at the hotel by pretending to be ill, and that neither undressed during the night.

The question admitted on the redirect examination was a proper one. In cross-examination the plaintiff had admitted being in his wife's society at a time when in his complaint he had asserted that he was totally deprived of it. He had testified that, on this occasion, they had spent the night in a bedroom containing only one bed, and his accompanying assertion that she occupied it alone, if left without further support or explanation, would not have been likely to weigh much with the jury. This explanation his counsel sought to elicit by showing what on this occasion was said by him to his wife, and by her to him. The character of this conversation would naturally tend to make the truth of his testimony that he had slept upon the floor either more or less probable. An appropriate way to characterize it was to put before the jury the language used. His wife and he had been on the night in question, in an equivocal situation. Was their conversation the expression of mutual affection, or did it show her bent on opposing his interests and endeavoring to promote those of the defendant? The subject of the investigation in the cause on trial was the relations of this man and woman. Had they been such as commonly attended the marriage state? Were they of such a nature during the night spent in this hotel bedroom? This could only be determined from their acts on that occasion; and of these acts what each then said to the other formed a part. It was immaterial, in this aspect, whether any statement of fact made by either was true or false. The only important thing in regard to it would be that it was made there and then. It was admissible as one of the circumstances attending and characterizing a meeting of two persons, the purpose and consequences of which it was material for the jury to determine in order to answer the issue presented. Whether she had in fact come to her husband for the last time was not the important thing, but whether she said that she had. Whether the defendant was, in fact, ready to drop his suit if the plaintiff would drop his was immaterial, but if she said that he was, that would tend directly to show that she put herself in the attitude of an emissary of the adverse party in a litigation involving the existence of criminal relations between him and herself. Words accompanying conduct can always be put in evidence, where the nature and significance of such conduct is in controversy, and it is of an equivocal character which these words tend to explain. Avery v. Clemons, 18 Conn. 306, 309, 46 Am. Dec. 323; Wigmore on Evidence, § 1772. They then become strictly relevant to the issue, since the fact that they were uttered bears on the probability that the conduct under consideration was in fact of one description or of another. Plumb v. Curtis, 66 Conn. 154, 168, 33 Atl. 998. In a case like the present where it was important to show the feelings of those whose conversation was admitted in evidence, proof of this kind may be of special weight. Vivian's Appeal, 74 Conn. 257, 261, 50 Atl. 797.

It is undoubtedly true that a jury, unless properly cautioned, may be in danger of crediting the truth of words so spoken and drawing conclusions from them other than those for which alone they can legitimately serve as a foundation. If the defendant requested such a caution, it was no doubt given, as no exception is taken to the charge. It is im-material that the only witness offered to prove the nature of the conversation was one of the participants, and he the plaintiff in the action. The testimony, so far as its admissibility is concerned, stands on the same footing as if it came from a disinterested stranger, who had overheard all that was said, while occupying an adjoining room. The rule against the admission of hearsay evidence is peculiar to Anglo-American jurisprudence, and did not obtain an established foothold in it until the close of the seventeenth century. It is not one that can be safely strained beyond its established limits, and these are observed when no declarations are excluded which are offered to characterize conduct of an ambiguous nature, which they accompany and serve to explain, and for the purpose simply of showing that they were made, and not that what was declared was true. Wigmore, Ev. §§ 1364, 1768.

There is no error. In this opinion HAMERSLEY and PRENTICE, JJ., concurred. TORRANCE, C. J., and HALL, J., dissented.

GARBERG v. SAMUELS et al.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Oct. 30, 1905.)

EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries from slipping on a sloping pavement, it was proper to permit one who had been for many years engaged in laying pavements of such character to testify as to whether the pavement in question was laid at such a pitch as to be dangerous; a pavement of the material employed not being in common use.

Action by Mina Garberg against Joseph Samuels and others. Defendants' petition for a new trial denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, and JOHNSON, JJ.

Herbert A. Blake, for plaintiff. Vincent, Boss & Barnesfeld, for defendants.

DOUGLAS, C. J. 1. This case presents plain questions of fact for the jury. They have found, upon what seems to us competent evidence, that the defendant was guilty of negligence in maintaining a slippery pavement directly below and sloping downward from a doorstep 5½ inches in height, at such an angle as to be dangerous to persons who were invited to use it in patronizing the store. And they have also found by implication that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care when she met with the accident of which she complained. We see no reason to disturb their conclusions. The damage, in the circumstances shown, cannot be considered excessive.

2. Exception was taken to the allowance of the question put to one who had been for many years engaged in the business of laying floors of the character under consideration, whether a pavement of such construction and laid at such a pitch was dangerous. A sloping floor of the material here employed is not in common use, and ordinary persons may be presumed not to be familiar with its peculiarities. We think the jury were entitled to have the benefit of expert testimony upon this subject, and that the question was properly admitted. The exception must therefore be overruled.

The petition for a new trial is denied, and the case is remitted to the superior court for judgment upon the verdict.

MARSHALL v. McCORMICK.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Oct. 23, 1906.)

1. GARNISHMENT—DISCLOSURES BY GARNISHEE—FAILURE TO MAKE—LIABILITY—RELIEF.

The liability of a garnishee, failing through mistake to disclose to the court that he has no property of defendant in his hands to satisfy the judgment that plaintiff obtains, imposed by Gen. Laws 1896, c. 254, § 20, is a liability to an action only, and arises on the default, and he may make the affidavit and refund double the garnishee fee paid him in discharge of his liability, as expressly provided by chapter 256, § 21.

2. SAME.

The word "mistake" in Gen. Laws 1896, c. 256, § 21, giving relief to a garnishee failing through mistake to disclose to the court that he has no property of defendant in his hands, should receive a broad construction, and an affidavit by a garnishee that through accident and mistake he neglected to file his personal affidavit of no funds is within the provision.

Exceptions from District Court, Providence County.

Trespass on the case, under Gen. Laws 1896, c. 254, § 20, by Antonio Marshall against Joseph McCormick. Heard on exceptions to the rulings of the court that the action was barred. Exceptions overruled.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Charles H. McKenna, for plaintiff. Charles A. Walsh, for defendant.

BLODGETT, J. After the rendering of the opinion in Marshall v. Gray, 26 R. I. 517, 59 Atl. 744, the defendant in this action, who was garnishee of the above-mentioned defendant, Gray, filed an affidavit of no funds with the clerk of the Seventh district court, accompanied by an affidavit that through accident and mistake he had previously neglected to file his personal affidavit thereof, and at the same time paid to such clerk double the fee paid him as garnishee of Gray; all these steps being taken before execution issued against Gray. The plaintiff refused to accept the double garnishee fee, and, although the district court refused to charge McCormick as the garnishee of Gray, took out execution from that court against Gray, and after demand upon Gray and upon McCormick, and a return of the execution unsatisfied by either of them, has brought this action against McCormick, in which he seeks to hold him liable as the garnishee of Gray, because of his failure to file his account as provided by section 20, c. 254, Gen. Laws 1896, and the case is now before us upon plaintiff's exceptions to the ruling of the Seventh district court that this action was barred by the provisions of section 21, c. 256, Gen. Laws 1896. Where there is an appearance by a garnishee and a disclosure of funds by him, his liability is fixed and determined by the court, and he is charged by the court in such amount as the court finds is then justly due and payable, and from this action of the court relief may be had by way of appeal or by exception to another tribunal, as from any other judgment. But where through accident or mistake the garnishee, who in fact has no funds or property of the defendant in his hands, has failed to so disclose that fact to the court, he is held liable, in the words of the statute (section 20, c. 254), "to satisfy the judgment or decree that the plaintiff shall obtain against the defendant in such writ, to be recovered by action on the case, excepting as is hereafter provided, in chapter two hundred fifty-six, in case of accident or mistake." This defendant, though not charged by the court as a judicial act, is, within the meaning of the clause in section 21, c. 256, "charged as trustee by reason of his default," as interpreted by the court in Eddy v. Prov. Machine Co., 15 R. I. 11, 22 Atl. 1116, having made default and hence being liable to the action provided in section 20 of chapter 254. But this is a liability to an action only, and arises upon the default, ipso facto, and is not created by any judgment of the court; and hence such a defendant garnishee may make the affidavit and refund double the garnishee fee paid him, as provided in section 21 of chapter 256, Gen. Laws 1896, in discharge of his liability, and without appeal or exception.

2. The plaintiff argues, further, that the affidavit of the garnishee does not disclose a case of mistake within the intent of the statute; his error being one of law, and not of fact. We feel constrained, however, to give to the word "mistake," as here used, a broad construction. The process of garnishment by which a person is held to pay his debt to the judgment creditor of his creditor imposes upon him an inconvenience for the benefit of other parties with whom he has no privity, and should be limited so as not to do him actual injustice. The proviso in question is for the protection of the garnishee, and ought to be liberally interpreted. Our opinion is, therefore, that the district court did not err in sustaining the defense offered.

The plaintiff's exceptions are overruled, and the cause will be remanded to the district court for judgment for the defendant.

GREENOUGH, Atty. Gen., ex rel. KELLEY v. WHITELEY et al., Board of Canvassers and Registration.

(Supreme Court of Rhode Island. Oct. 9, 1905.)

ELECTIONS—CAUCUS—MISCONDUCT—SUPPLEMENTARY CAUCUS.

Pub. Laws 1902, p. 85, c. 1078, imposes certain duties on the board of canvassers of the city of Providence, and section 14 (page 41) contemplates the holding of a second or supplementary caucus for certain reasons, but does not apply to a case where the caucus is declared void by reason of fraud in the conduct or proceedings of the caucus, and by sections 18, 19 (pages 44, 45), penalties are imposed upon officials or other persons guilty of violations of the law in the conduct of a caucus. Held that, where the board of canvassers found that no persons were elected or nominated at a caucus because of misconduct in the conduct of the caucus, the statute did not authorize the holding of any second or supplementary caucus.

Petition by William B. Greenough, as Attorney General, on the relation of Charles M. Kelley, against Samuel Whiteley and others, as the board of canvassers and registration of the city of Providence, for a mandamus to compel such board to designate a place for holding a caucus. Writ denied.

Argued before DOUGLAS, C. J., and DUBOIS, BLODGETT, JOHNSON, and PARKHURST, JJ.

Comstock & Canning, P. Henry Quinn, and James H. Thurston, for petitioner. Francis Colwell, Albert A. Baker, and James M. Thurston, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the board of canvassers and registration in the city of Providence to designate a place for the holding of a caucus of the Democratic Party in the First Ward of the city of Providence, and to do the various other things which are provided by Pub. Laws, p. 35, c. 1078, passed December 12, 1902, to be done for the purpose of holding caucuses in the city of Providence. It appears from the papers in the case that a caucus of the Democratic Party was held in said First Ward according to law on the 27th day of September, 1905, and that the board of canvassers had performed the duties required by said chapter 1078 preliminary to the holding of that caucus. Subsequent to the holding of said caucus, upon the petition of James H. Thurston et al. to the said board of canvassers, said board of canvassers found "that no persons were lawfully elected or nominated at said caucus, and that said caucus was illegal and void." The legal effect of this finding of the board is to invalidate the result of the caucus, which was in its calling and inception entirely lawful, but failed by misconduct in performance of its function to exercise the privilege given to the party by law.

The broad question presented to the court is whether, under chapter 1078, the board of canvassers can now be required by writ of mandamus to provide for the holding of another caucus of the Democratic Party in said First Ward; said board having been requested to do so by the Democratic city committee through its chairman. Upon a careful examination of the statute above quoted, we are of the opinion that the duties imposed on the board of canvassers of the city of Providence by said chapter have been fully complied with by the said board of canvassers in the acts done by them preliminary to the holding of said caucus on the 27th day of September, 1905; that the statute does not contemplate the holding of any second or supplementary caucus for any reason other than as set forth in the act in section 14; and that section does not apply to a case where the caucus is declared to be void by reason of fraud in the conduct or proceedings of such caucus. In our opinion, if the court should grant the relief prayed, it would be substantially adding to the statute provisions which the Legislature did not make; and upon reading the whole statute it appears to the court it was not the intention of the Legislature to provide for the holding of any second or supplementary caucus, in such case as is presented to us. The only provisions which we find in the statute relating to the perpetration of fraud in the conduct of a caucus are those in sections 18 and 19, which impose penalties upon officials or other persons who are guilty of violations of the law.

The court is therefore constrained to deny the application for the writ.

HUNT v. FRANKLIN COUNTY COM'RS.
(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 15, 1905.)

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION—CLAIM AGAINST COUNTY.

When county commissioners have allowed a smaller gross sum in full for an itemized bill against their county, and that sum is then drawn by the claimant from the county treasury, his claim for the remainder of his bill is thereby barred; at least so long as he retains the sum drawn.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Counties, § 327.]

(Official.)

Petition by John J. Hunt for writ of certiorari against the county commissioners of Franklin county. Petition dismissed.

Heard by the presiding justice without intervention of a jury, with the right of exception by each party to rulings of law. Under this stipulation the plaintiff petitioner excepted to certain rulings made by the presiding justice. Overruled.

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, and SPEAR, JJ.

George C. Webber, for plaintiff. H. S. Wing, for defendants.

EMERY, J. The petitioner was an official agent for the prevention of cruelty to animals. In May, 1902, he presented to the county commissioners of Franklin county, for allowance and payment from the county treasury, an itemized bill of $152.48 for services and expenses for investigating cases in that county. The commissioners considered the bill, and in the presence of the petitioner allowed a lump sum of $100 in full for the whole bill. The petitioner thereupon drew that amount from the county treasury upon that order for payment.

In April, 1904, the petitioner, without returning the $100 so drawn by him, again presented the bill to the then county commissioners of Franklin county. The commissioners refused to allow any part of it, or to make any adjudication upon any separate items, and thereupon this petition was filed for a writ of certiorari to bring up the commissioners' doing in the matter.

The petitioner urges that the allowance of a lump sum for his itemized bill less than the full amount was illegal; that the commissioners should have allowed or disallowed each item, and should be compelled to do so now, in order that he might bring the disallowed item before the court. On the other hand, the respondents claim that certiorari is not the proper remedy for the petitioner.

We have no occasion to consider either of the above contentions, since a complete answer to the petition is made by the fact that, with knowledge that $100 was allowed him in full for his whole bill, he drew that amount from the treasury upon such allowance, and has not returned it. He cannot now reopen the matter. Perry v. Cheboygan, 55 Mich. 250, 21 N. W. 333; Brick v. Plymouth County (Iowa) 19 N. W. 304; Murphy v. United States, 104 U. S. 464, 26 L. Ed. 338. As well might a plaintiff who had recovered and collected judgment in a common-law action for less than his claim, stated afterwards, maintain an action on the same claim.

Exceptions overruled.

Petition dismissed.

PISCATAQUIS SAV. BANK v. HERRICK et al.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 20, 1905.)

1. REFERENCE—POWER OF REFEREE—REPORT—WHEN OBJECTIONS TO SHOULD BE MADE.

A referee has full power to decide all questions arising, both of law and of fact. And, in the absence of fraud, prejudice, or mistake on his part, objections for which should be made when the report is offered for acceptance, his decision is final.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 42, Cent. Dig. Reference, §§ 150-155, 159.]

2. APPEAL—DECREE—REPORT OF REFEREE.

Where a bill in equity was referred by a rule of court without conditions or limitations, and the referee, having heard the parties, reported the facts found by him and his conclusions thereon to the court, and his report was accepted, an appeal from a final decree, made in accordance with the terms of the report, cannot be sustained.

(Official.)

Appeal from Supreme Judicial Court, Piscataquis County, in Equity.

Bill by the Piscataquis Savings Bank against E. L. Herrick and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Dismissed.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

Frank E. Guernsey, for appellants. Joseph B. Peaks, for appellee.

SAVAGE, J. The plaintiff claimed to be the equitable owner of certain notes and a mortgage securing them, which it took as collateral security for loans made by it to the owner of the notes and mortgage, and brought this bill in equity to obtain an equitable foreclosure of the right to redeem the same. The bill and answer disclose that the parties were at issue upon questions of fact and also upon questions of law. After the pleadings were completed the cause was referred, by agreement of parties, by a rule of court, which contained the stipulation that judgment on the report of the referee should be final. The rule contained no other stipulation material to the present consideration of the case. The referee heard the parties and reported the facts found by him and his conclusions thereon to the court. His report was accepted. Subsequently a justice of the court made a final decree in accordance with the terms of the report, and from that decree one of the defendants seasonably appealed. The cause is now before us upon that appeal.

Of the many questions argued, we need to consider but one. The cause was referred without any conditions or limitations as to the powers of the referee. And in such case it is well settled that the referee has full power to decide all questions arising, both of law and of fact; and, in the absence of fraud, prejudice, or mistake on the part of the referee, objections for which should be made when the report is offered for acceptance, his decision is final. Sweetsir v. Kenney, 32 Me. 464; Hall v. Decker, 51 Me. 81; Long v. Rhodes, 36 Me. 108; Hatch v. Hatch, 57 Me. 283. By agreement the parties submitted the cause to a tribunal of their own choosing. To that tribunal was transferred all the powers of the court. Having chosen to go to that tribunal, the parties cannot now be heard upon the merits by the court. As was said in Sweetsir v. Kenney, supra: "Whatever we might think of the law, * * * it is not in our power to control the decision of that tribunal, to which the parties submitted both the law and the facts."

The result is that the appeal from a decree made in accordance with the report of the referee is not sustainable.

Appeal dismissed. Decree below affirmed, with additional costs.

CHAPMAN v. HAMBLET.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. DEEDS — CONSTRUCTION — DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

The description of land conveyed is to be interpreted by reference to all the calls in the deed of conveyance, and every call is to be answered if it can consistently be done.

2. SAME.

In cases of ambiguity the interpretation is to be sought from the attendant circumstances and the intent of the parties, and the deed must receive a construction most favorable to the grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 231, 235, 239.]

3. BOUNDARIES—MONUMENTS.

A boundary line is a monument, and would by the general rule of construction govern the course in a deed, unless the intention of the parties would be defeated by its adoption.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 8, Cent. Dig. Boundaries, § 23.]

4. SAME—"PROLONGATION."

Where uncertainty is introduced in the language of a deed by the word "prolongation," it is held to mean a continued or extended line, though consisting of several angles, where such meaning would be consistent with the other words of description, rather than a direct line, which would render the next course in the deed inconsistent with the direction and monuments by which it is described.

(Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Cumberland County.

Action by Moses M. Chapman against Melvin Hamblet. Case reported. Judgment for defendant.

Trespass quare clausum fregit, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages of the defendant for cutting and removing certain wood and timber from a portion of the plaintiff's premises in Scarborough. The defendant admitted the taking, but justified under claim that the premises upon which the alleged trespass was committed was a part of a tract of land on which the trees and wood growth had been conveyed to him by the plaintiff. Plea, the general issue. After the evidence had been closed, it was agreed to report the case to the law court, and that, upon so much of the evidence "as is competent and legally admissible, the law court is to render such judgment as the legal rights of the parties may require."

The deed mentioned in the opinion and given by the plaintiff to the defendant, is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Moses M. Chapman, of Westbrook, in the county of Cumberland and state of Maine, in consideration of one dollar and other good and valuable considerations paid by Melville

Hamblet, of Portland, in said county, the receipt whereof I do hereby acknowledge, do hereby remise, release, bargain, sell, and convey, and forever quitclaim unto the said Melville Hamblet, his heirs and assigns, forever, the trees and wood growth on the following described parcel of land, situated in Scarborough, in said county of Cumberland, bounded and described as follows:

"Commencing at a point on the county road running from Portland to Buxton, at the corner of Allen T. Reed's land and land of said Chapman; thence following the division line between said Allen T. Reed's and said Chapman's and the prolongation of said Chapman's line until it intersects with the wire fence between said Chapman's land and the land now or formerly of Champaign and Larochele; thence in an easterly direction by said wire fence between said Champaign land and the land of said Chapman, and by the prolongation of said Chapman's said line, to land now or formerly of McKenney; thence by land of said McKenney and Knight to a logging road; thence by the logging road to a wire fence on said Chapman's land; thence by the wire fence to said Buxton road; reserving and excepting therefrom a small lot of birches near the Buxton road. Provided the said trees and wood growth shall be removed within three years from the date thereof.

"Said grantee has the right to pile said wood and timber in the pasture of said Chapman, together with all reasonable rights of way in and to the same, and to said above-described premises, for the purpose of removing said trees and wood, as herein provided.

"To have and to hold the same, together with all the privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging to the said Melville Hamblet, his heirs and assigns, forever.

"And I do covenant with the said grantee, his heirs and assigns, that I will warrant and forever defend the premises to him, the said grantee, his heirs and assigns, forever, against the lawful claims and demands of all persons claiming by, through, or under me.

"In witness whereof, I, the said Moses M. Chapman, have hereunto set my hand and seal this 11th day of November in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three.

"Moses M. Chapman. [Seal.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of Isaac W. Dyer.

"State of Maine—ss.:

"Portland, November 11th, 1905.

"Personally appeared the above-named Moses M. Chapman and acknowledged the above instrument to be his free act and deed.

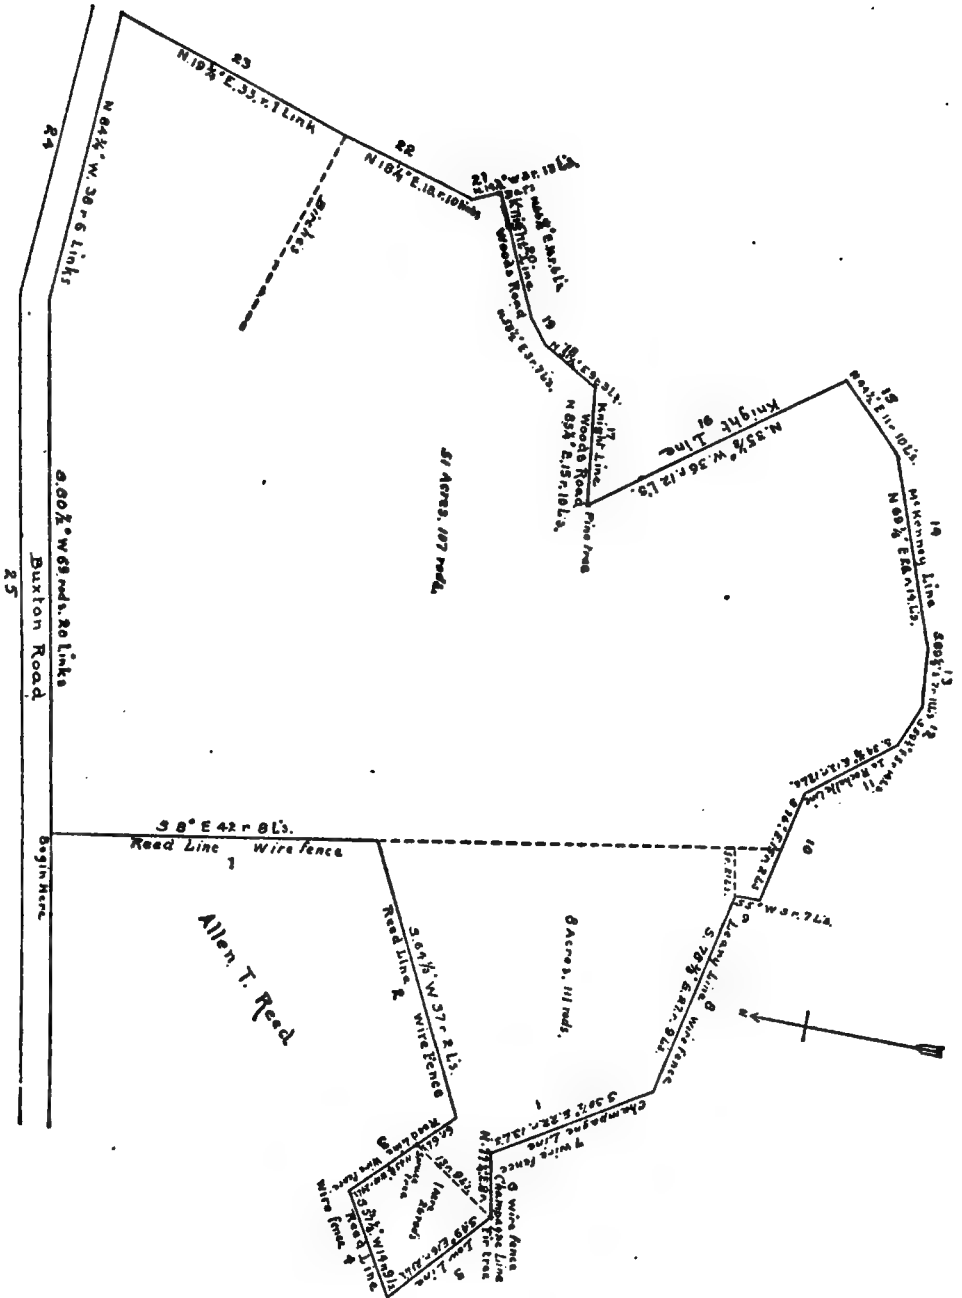

"Before me,

"Isaac W. Dyer, Justice of the Peace."

Argued before EMERY, STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, PEABODY, and SPEAR, JJ.

A. F. Moulton and William Lyons, for plaintiff. M. P. Frank, for defendant.

SKILLIN PLAN.

PEABODY, J. This was an action of trespass quare clausum. The case comes before the law court on report. The act complained of was the cutting of certain wood and timber from a portion of the plaintiff's farm.

The defendant claims that under the deed of the plaintiff dated November 11, A. D. 1903, he had license to cut all the wood and timber upon the farm, except a small lot of birches on another part of the premises not affected by the acts complained of.

The dispute is upon the construction of this deed, and especially of the following words in the description of the boundary of the disputed territory: "Commencing at a point on the County Road running from Portland to Buxton, at the corner of Allen T. Reed's land, and land of said Chapman; thence following the division line between said Allen T. Reed's and said Chapman's and the prolongation of said Chapman line, until it intersects with the wire fence between said Chapman's land and the land now or formerly of Champaign and Larochelle."

The survey and plan made by Augustus E. Skillin, subsequent to the date of the deed show that the language describing the lines in dispute is ambiguous. The uncertainty which exists is introduced by the word prolongation in connection with the first course of the Reed boundary line. In common language this word may mean a line produced, as claimed by the plaintiff; but it is not infrequently used of a continued or extended line, as claimed by the defendant.

The plaintiff's contention is that by the language, "prolongation of said Chapman's line," is meant a line produced in the first course of the Chapman-Reed boundary, and that of the defendant is that the word "prolongation" is used in the sense of extension or continuation, and is a term merely descriptive of the boundary line beyond the land of Reed and to the Champaign-Larochelle wire fence. Therefore it is necessary to choose between a line departing from the Chapman-Reed boundary line and one following it, but in a new course.

The description of the land is to be interpreted by reference to all the calls in the deed, and every call is to be answered if it can be done. Herrick v. Hopkins, 23 Me. 217. The interpretation is to be further sought from the attendant circumstances and the intent of the parties, and the deed must receive a construction most favorable to the grantee. Erskine v. Moulton, 66 Me. 276; Field v. Huston, 21 Me. 69; Pike v. Munroe, 36 Me. 309, 58 Am. Dec. 751; Ames v. Hilton, 70 Me. 36; Knowles v. Bean, 87 Me. 331, 32 Atl. 1017; Stoops v. Smith, 100 Mass. 63, 1 Am. Rep. 85, 97 Am. Dec. 76; Hastings v. Hastings, 110 Mass. 280.

The Chapman-Reed boundary consists of a broken line of four courses, and the Chapman line is continued on still another course. As this boundary line is a monument, it would by the general rule of construction govern the course, unless the intention of the parties would be defeated by its adoption. Haynes v. Young, 36 Me. 557; Sanborn v. Rice, 129 Mass. 387; Woodward v. Nims, 130 Mass. 70; Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 210; Percival v. Chase, 182 Mass. 371, 85 N. E. 800. By following this boundary line until the end of the Reed land is reached without reference to the several angles in the line, and then following the Chapman line understanding it to be still used as a monument until the Champaign wire fence is reached, there is no confusion in the language of the deed. It will be seen by reference to the Skillin plan that the line which the plaintiff insists answers the second call in the deed introduces into the description two material inaccuracies: It does not intersect "with the wire fence between Chapman's land and the land now or formerly of Champaign and Larochelle," and the next course is inconsistent with the direction and monuments by which it is described.

The force of the argument that the word prolongation in the description implies a direct line is lessened by the use of the word a second time in the deed, namely, "thence in an easterly direction by said wire fence between said Champaign land, and land of said Chapman, and by the prolongation of said Chapman's said line to land now or formerly of McKenney," where it could not in the nature of the case be a direct line; and the course and the names of the adjacent owners in this call of the deed best accord with the boundaries of the land claimed by the defendant.

The defendant's testimony shows that he had in view the purchase of the wood and timber upon the whole of the plaintiff's farm, except a small lot of birches which the plaintiff desired to reserve for fencing, that the price which he offered was for this, and that no reduction was ever made in the price. This is in conflict with the plaintiff's statement that the intended reservation was the wood and timber on the lot in dispute, made definite by a line, which he pointed out to the defendant, extending south across his land, being that designated in the second call in the deed. It appears that the plaintiff during the negotiation requested Lewis P. Knight, who was familiar with the value of wood and timber, to estimate the amount of growth on the premises, and that he, in making his estimate, examined the whole tract understanding that the plaintiff was to sell all the wood and timber, except some small growth of birches. The greater weight of evidence proves that the plaintiff did not, as he testifies, point out this line to the defendant, but an assumed division line between his land and that of John O. Knight, which he marked upon the face of the earth by spotting trees between a spruce tree near the Reed line and a fir tree near the corner of the adjoining lands of Champaign and Lowe.

Under these circumstances and rules governing the construction of deeds, it must be held that the deed between the parties included the disputed premises.

Judgment for defendant.

WENTWORTH v. TOWN OF PITTSFIELD.
(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Merrimack. Oct. 3, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — TOLLS — INJURY FROM DEFECTIVE HIGHWAYS.

The word "railings," in Laws 1893, p. 47, c. 59, authorizing actions against towns for injuries by defects in "a bridge, culvert, or sluiceway, or dangerous embankments and defective railings," means railings necessary to guard travelers from going over dangerous embankments, and not railings merely useful as hand rails; and a pedestrian injured while using steps leading from a sidewalk to a cross-walk over a street, by reason of slipping on the ice on steps, cannot recover because of the absence of a hand rail.

Transferred from Superior Court.

Case for injuries from a defective highway by Mabel M. Wentworth against the town of Pittsfield. There was a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's evidence, subject to exception, and the cause transferred from the superior court. Exception overruled.

The evidence tended to prove the following facts: There are two highways in the village of Pittsfield, one known as "Main Street," running nearly in an easterly and westerly direction, and the other, known as "Chestnut Street," running from Main street in a northerly direction, forming a right angle with it at the starting point. A portion of these highways, adjoining the lot in the easterly corner, is a sidewalk for the use of pedestrians. The surface of the sidewalk at the corner of the streets is 23 inches higher than the surface of the walk across Chestnut street. There are two stone steps leading from the surface of the sidewalk to that of the cross-walk; the upper one being 5 feet 11 inches long and 25 inches wide, and the lower one 6 feet 8 inches long and 14½ inches wide. There is an iron rail running from a point in the southerly line of the sidewalk on Main street, about six feet easterly of the steps, to a post set in the southerly end of the lower step. There is no rail at the other end of the steps. In the evening of January 3, 1903, the steps were covered with snow, and there was a hard, trodden path of snow and ice near their center line. The surface of the path on each step sloped upward from its front edge to the step above, and was slippery. About a quarter past 7 o'clock that evening, when it was quite dark, the plaintiff walked on the sidewalk in Chestnut street in a southerly direction to the corner of Main street, and turned westerly into the path down the steps. As she stepped on the lower step, she slipped upon its hard, slanting, and slippery surface, fell, slid down the steps to the crosswalk, and was injured. She did not go off the northerly end of the steps. She did not take hold of the rail at the south end. There were persons standing against it, near the top of the steps.

Martin & Howe, for plaintiff. Edward A. Lane and Streeter & Hollis, for defendant.

CHASE, J. The question before the court is whether the steps where the plaintiff was injured were a "dangerous embankment and defective railing," within the meaning of section 1, c. 59, p. 47, Laws 1893, as interpreted in Wilder v. Concord, 72 N. H. 259, 56 Atl. 193, and subsequent cases; that is to say, a dangerous embankment defectively railed. The defect which the plaintiff relies upon is the absence of a rail at the northerly end of the steps. It is not necessary to consider whether the absence of a rail would render the town liable, if a traveler went off or fell off the end of the steps because of such absence, for the plaintiff's injury was not caused in that way. Her position is that the statute referred to required the town to maintain a rail to serve as a support for travelers and prevent them from falling while using the steps, if a rail was reasonably necessary for such purpose to render the highway suitable for the travel over it. She complains of the absence of a hand rail—not of the absence of a barrier to guard a traveler from the danger of falling from an embankment located contiguous to or near the traveled path in the highway. The office of the rail, required by the law as it stood prior to the passage of the act of 1893, seems to have been to guard the traveler from going or falling over an embankment or precipice, or into a hole, or from going against an obstruction located upon the side of the traveled path or very near to it. A town then might be, and still may be, fined for neglect to cause a dangerous embankment or causeway in a highway to be securely railed. Pub. St. 1901, c. 75, § 1. Under the former statute rendering towns liable to travelers for injuries caused by defects in highways, it was held that the absence of a railing would be a defect, if the railing was reasonably necessary to prevent travelers from going into a hole (Willey v. Portsmouth, 35 N. H. 303), or a cellar (Stack v. Portsmouth, 52 N. H. 221), or a stairway leading to a cellar (Sweeney v. Newport, 65 N. H. 86, 18 Atl. 86), or against rocks, etc. (Davis v. Hill, 41 N. H. 329), located dangerously near the traveled path. See, also, Knowlton v. Pittsfield, 62 N. H. 535, and authorities cited.

No case was cited by counsel, and none has been found in this state or elsewhere, in which it was held that the absence of a mere hand rail was a defect for which the town would be liable to a traveler injured in consequence of it. A hand rail, from the nature of things, can be serviceable only to travelers on foot; and it is useful to them, not simply because the way is upon an embankment or leads over a hill or an uneven surface. In the cold seasons, when there is ice upon the ground, sidewalks upon level ground, as well as upon hilly ground, can be made safer to travelers by providing hand rails for them to lay hold of and guard themselves against slipping and falling. A law that would require hand rails upon sidewalks, when reasonably necessary to prevent travelers from falling, would place a severe burden upon towns—one that legislators would naturally hesitate to impose. It is doubtful whether, under the former law of the state, the defendants would be liable to the plaintiff because of the absence of the rail, though they might be liable because of the slippery condition of the steps. Under the present law (Laws 1893, p. 47, c. 59), they are not liable for the latter cause; and it is equally clear that they are not liable because of the absence of the hand rail. It was intended by this law to materially abridge the liability of towns to civil actions for injuries resulting from defects in highways. Wilder v. Concord, 72 N. H. 259, 260, 56 Atl. 193. Unless notice is given, as provided in section 2 of the act, such actions can be maintained only in case the defect exists in certain specified parts of a highway, namely, "a bridge, culvert, or sluiceway, or dangerous embankments and defective railings." "Embankments" and "railings" are here associated together as they are in section 1, c. 75, Pub. St. 1901. The natural inference is that the railings referred to are such as are necessary to guard the traveler from going over the dangerous embankment—such as will be barriers against such disaster. If the idea of support or aid to the traveler in his act of traveling had been in mind, it is highly improbable that the association of railings with dangerous embankments would have been made, for, as has already been said, railings for that purpose are needed in many places where there is no dangerous embankment. If the sidewalk in Chestnut street, over which the plaintiff passed before reaching the steps, had been icy—especially if the surface of the ice had been sloping or uneven—she might have needed a hand rail there to avoid a fall, as much as she did while descending the steps.

The defect of which she complains was not a "defect, insufficiency, or want of repair" of a "dangerous embankment and defective railing," within the meaning of the statute, and consequently she has no right of action against the defendants, even if it wholly or partly caused her injury. If it was a defect in the highway, it, like that caused by the slippery condition of the steps, was excluded from those for which towns are liable by the passage of the act of 1893 and the repeal of the prior statutes on the subject. The nonsuit was rightly ordered.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

ATTORNEY GENERAL ex rel. PUTNAM v. FOGARTY.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Oct. 3, 1905.)

APPEAL—AGREED CASE—MOOT QUESTIONS.

Moot questions, in an agreed case which contains no provision for judgment, will not be considered, in the absence of some special reason therefor.

Information, in the nature of quo warranto, filed by the Attorney General, on the relation of Everett S. Putnam against John W. Fogarty, and prosecuted by the relator. Facts agreed. Case discharged.

Hamblett & Spring and Charles W. Hoitt, for plaintiff. Doyle & Lucier, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. The agreed case contains no provision for judgment and presents merely a moot question. Such questions are not considered, in the absence of special reason therefor. Conn. Valley Lumber Co. v. Monroe, 71 N. H. 473, 52 Atl. 940. No reason for an exception to the general rule is perceived in this case.

Case discharged.

BROOKHOUSE v. UNION PUB. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. Oct. 3, 1905.)

1. TRUSTS—ENFORCEMENT—EVIDENCE.

Plaintiff's guardian was treasurer of defendant company, which had a deposit in the M. bank. The guardian withdrew from other sources funds belonging to plaintiff, receiving certificates of deposit and a draft, all payable to him as guardian, which he gave to defendant's assistant treasurer, who gave him credit therefor on the company's books and deposited the papers in the M. bank. The guardian, as treasurer, afterwards drew checks on said bank to the amount of said deposits, and used the checks for his own benefit. Held, in an action by plaintiff to have defendant company declared a trustee of said deposit, evidence that the treasurer habitually availed himself of the bank account of the company for his own use by depositing and checking out his own funds was admissible on the question of his intent in withdrawing plaintiff's funds from the places where they were originally deposited.

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST.

Defendant never having had any use of the fund, save the possible use incident to its brief deposit in its name, was not liable on the ground that it had received the fund with notice of the trust and applied it to any debt owing to it by its treasurer.

3. SAME.

Defendant having no direct information of fraudulent intention, and the certificates of deposit and the draft being negotiable instruments, it was not chargeable with notice of the trust.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR—FINDINGS BY COURT.

Where there is some evidence tending to support a finding by the court, an exception thereto will be overruled.

5. TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST.

Where the treasurer of defendant company was accustomed to use the bank account of the company for his own purposes by depositing therewith and checking out his own moneys for his own use, the duty of the defendant was like that of a bank in regard to the deposits, and it was not bound to see that checks, etc., payable to the treasurer as plaintiff's guardian, and deposited with defendant's account, were not misapplied, but it would be presumed that checks drawn by the guardian were drawn in good faith.

6. CORPORATIONS—NOTICE TO OFFICER—EFFECT.

The rule that notice to the treasurer was notice to the corporation did not apply as to the misapplication by the treasurer of such guardianship funds, as the facts to be imputed related to an independent fraudulent act of the treasurer.

Transferred from Superior Court; Pike, Judge.

Bill by Nina D. Brookhouse against the Union Publishing Company to recover sums of money with which it is alleged the defendants are chargeable as trustees for the plaintiff. The facts were partly agreed to and partly found by the court. Transferred on plaintiff's exceptions from the May term, 1904, of the superior court. Exceptions overruled.

From a date prior to May, 1895, to October, 1895, Joseph C. Moore was the defendant's treasurer and manager, and had the practical control of their affairs. From February, 1894, to October, 1895, they also had an assistant treasurer, whose powers and duties were the same as those of the treasurer in case of the latter's absence or disability, excepting authority to sign certificates of stock. The defendants had a deposit account with the Manchester National Bank. Moore used this account as a conduit for his private enterprises, keeping a record thereof upon the defendants' books. Moore was also guardian of the plaintiff, then a minor, and had deposited in a savings bank, in his name as guardian, sums of money belonging to the plaintiff. May 23, 1895, he withdrew from this bank $2,250, receiving a certificate of deposit and a draft upon a Boston bank, both payable to himself as guardian, or order. He indorsed these papers as guardian and passed them to the defendants' assistant treasurer, to be deposited in the Manchester National Bank to the defendants' credit. The assistant treasurer indorsed the defendants' name upon the papers and deposited them the same day, in accordance with Moore's instructions. An entry was made by Moore's direction upon the defendants' cash book, by which cash was charged with $2,250, as if received from him. May 24th Moore drew two checks, in the defendants' name, in favor of the Halifax Mills, upon the Manchester National Bank, amounting to $2,250, neither of which was for the defendants' benefit. The checks were paid by the bank and charged to the defendants on May 20th. Upon each of the days intervening between May 24th and May 29th, sums of money amounting to $3,000 or $4,000 were deposited in the national bank in the defendants' name, and sums amounting substantially to the same totals were withdrawn, leaving the balance at the close of business each day less than $30. Nearly all the sums deposited were Moore's, and the sums withdrawn were used in part to pay his bills and in part to pay the defendants' bills. August 21, 1895, a further sum of $1,250 was withdrawn from the plaintiff's savings bank account in the form of a certificate of deposit, put in the defendants' account at the national bank, and entered upon the defendants' cash book, the same in all respects as the first sum. When the deposit in the national bank was made, the defendants' balance there was only $20. Other sums belonging to Moore were deposited with the $1,250, making the total deposit $8,065. The defendants' cash account of August 21st shows the receipt of these sums of Moore and the payment of sums on his account amounting to $6,579. The account of the next day's transactions shows the receipt of $6,300 from Moore and the payment of $6,788 on his account. August 21st he drew a check for $820 to pay the defendants' help, and also drew other checks. The defendants' check book showed that there would be a balance of $2,313.26 in the bank to the defendants' credit, after satisfying these checks. When Moore withdrew the money from the savings bank, it was his intention to deposit it in the defendants' account with the national bank for the purpose of checking it out for the benefit of others than the defendants, and he carried the intention into effect. The finding as to intention is made from the manner in which the transactions themselves took place and from Moore's habit for years of using the defendants' account with the national bank for his private business. The plaintiff excepted to this finding. From May to October, 1895, Moore was indebted to the defendants in a sum exceeding $3,500. The question whether the plaintiff, now 21 years old, is entitled to recover the sums withdrawn from the savings bank, or either of them, was reserved.

Taggart, Tuttle, Burroughs & Wyman, for plaintiff. Burnham, Brown, Jones & Warren, for defendants.

CHASE, J. The fact that Moore made use of the money in question for his own purposes very soon after he withdrew it from the savings bank, and that in using it he pursued the course of his habit in the use of private funds—depositing the money in the national bank in the defendants' name and immediately checking it out for his private purposes—was competent evidence upon the question of his intention at the time of the withdrawals. As this evidence has a tendency to support the court's finding, the plaintiff's exception to the finding must be overruled; and the finding must be accepted as true in considering the questions of law raised by the case. The plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought (1) if the defendants now have possession of the money in question; or (2) if they received it from Moore with notice of the trust and applied it to the payment of Moore's individual indebtedness to them; or (3) if they so received it and aided Moore in wrongfully diverting it from the plaintiff. Hill v. McIntyre, 39 N. H. 410, 75 Am. Dec. 229; Sherburne v. Goodwin, 44 N. H. 271; French v. Currier, 47 N. H. 88; Hardy v. Bank, 61 N. H. 34.

1. The first ground of relief certainly does not exist. The fund has been traced, not merely into the defendants' possession, but through their possession into the possession of other parties. Bank Commissioners v. Trust Co., 70 N. H. 536, 544 et seq., 49 Atl. 113, 85 Am. St. Rep. 646.

2. Nor is the second ground of relief established. The money was not paid and received on account of Moore's indebtedness to the defendants, but in the use by Moore of the defendants' deposit account with the Manchester National Bank as a "conduit" for, or means of, transmitting money in his private enterprises. If the defendants had any use whatever of the money, which is doubtful, it was only as an incident of the deposit during the brief time while the money was passing through their deposit account with the national bank, and with no intention on the part of Moore, nor on their part so far as appears, to permanently convert the money to their uses. There was no such conversion of the money as will justify a court of equity in holding the defendants responsible for it as trustees for the plaintiff.

3. The question remains whether the defendants received the money with notice of the trust and aided Moore in wrongfully diverting it from the plaintiff. In considering this question, the matter of notice is of vital importance. The defendants took no part whatever in withdrawing the money from the savings bank. That was solely Moore's act, and, being accompanied with the intention of using the money for his own purposes, constituted a complete conversion of it. He had already converted the money to his own uses when he handed the certificates of deposit and the Boston draft, duly indorsed by him as guardian, to the defendants' assistant treasurer, with directions to deposit the same in the defendants' bank account. To consummate his fraudulent scheme, he deemed it convenient or advisable to use that account as a conduit through which to pass the money from himself to the parties to whom he would pay it. The only persons who took part in operating, so to speak, the conduit were Moore himself and the defendants' assistant treasurer. No other officer or servant of the defendants did anything whatever in respect to the deposit or withdrawal of the money. The entries upon the defendants' books relating to the money were in Moore's name. An officer or agent of the defendants, however attentive to his duties, would not learn from an examination of the books that the plaintiff's money was passing through their bank account, or would discover facts that would put him upon inquiry in that direction. The defendants' assistant treasurer received no direct information as to Moore's fraudulent intention. His only knowledge relating to the transactions was that the certificates of deposit and draft were payable to Moore as guardian or order, were indorsed by him in that capacity, and were deposited with the defendants as if they were his private funds. In considering these facts it must be borne in mind that the certificates and draft, unlike certificates of stock in corporations or promissory notes, were mere temporary representatives of value or credits. They did not bear interest. They were negotiable paper according to the commercial law. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1052, 1703, 1705. In the ordinary course of business such paper is used like currency to pass money presently from one person to another in business transactions, not to represent money more or less permanently invested with a view of producing income. Decisions relating to the transfer by trustees of stock certificates, promissory notes, and similar papers afford little aid in a case of this kind. Circumstances that would conclusively show that a transfer of certificates of stock, etc., was in violation of the trust might be entirely consistent with a lawful transfer of certificates of deposit and drafts. To a person not informed of the circumstances by which Moore obtained these papers and of his intention in respect to their use, it would appear that he had a right to negotiate them as he did in this case. Indeed, if they did not lawfully belong to him individually in consequence of his past transactions in executing the trust, it would be his duty to make use of them in paying outstanding claims against the trust estate, if any, or in making investments, or in some other way for the benefit of his ward. To hold them an unreasonable length of time would be a breach of trust, and would subject him to liability for any loss arising therefrom. By reason of his position as guardian and the form of the papers he had absolute control of the manner in which they should be used. No license from the probate court or other source was necessary. He could transfer them directly to the persons to whom he intended ultimately to pay the money represented by them, or he could convert them into currency and use that, or he could deposit them in a bank in his own name as guardian, or in his own name without further description, and draw checks against the deposit. If he transferred them directly to a person in payment of his private indebtedness, or for some other consideration known to be for his private benefit, the form of the paper alone would be sufficient to put the person upon inquiry as to his right to so use the paper, and to charge him with knowledge of the facts he would thus learn. Such use is generally wholly inconsistent with the guardian's rights, and is not made in the ordinary course of business. But the indorsee of such papers who receives them in the course of changing them into currency, or in the course of distributing the credits they represent by means of a temporary deposit and checks or orders drawn against the deposit, is not put upon inquiry by the mere form of the paper; for such use is consistent with the guardian's rights and duty. To charge such indorsee with responsibility for a misapplication of the funds, it must appear that he had knowledge of the contemplated misapplication, or of facts that would put him upon inquiry. Even a mingling of guardianship funds with private funds in a deposit account with a bank kept in the guardian's individual name is not, in itself, unlawful, though it be unwise. In such case the form of the paper will not impose upon the bank the duty of seeing to it that the guardianship portion of the account is properly used. The ordinary presumption applies—that the guardian is acting in good faith, and will make a proper use of the money in drawing checks against the deposit. See Sherburne v. Goodwin, 44 N. H. 271, 279.

The only obligation of the bank is to honor the checks that are duly drawn against the account in the form it is kept. To charge banks with the duty of supervising the administration of trusts, when in the due course of business they receive checks and drafts payable to and properly indorsed by trustees in their trust capacity, would place an unreasonable burden upon the banks and seriously interfere with commercial transactions. The law imposes no such duty upon banks. Bank Commissioners v. Trust Co., 70 N. H. 536, 550, 551, 49 Atl. 113, 85 Am. St. Rep. 646; Goodwin v. Bank, 48 Conn. 550; Board of Freeholders v. Bank, 48 N. J. Eq. 51, 21 Atl. 185; State Nat. Bank v. Reilly, 124 Ill. 464, 14 N. E. 657; Coleman v. Bank, 94 Tex. 606, 63 S. W. 867, 86 Am. St. Rep. 871; Interstate Nat. Bank v. Claxton, 97 Tex. 569, 80 S. W. 604, 65 L. R. A. 820, 104 Am. St. Rep. 885; Central Nat. Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 63, 26 L. Ed. 693; Gray v. Johnson, L. R. 3 Eng. & Ir. App. Cas. 1; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1612. It is true that the defendants are not bankers, but their obligation to Moore in respect to funds which he placed in their bank account or in their possession, to be there deposited, was like that of a bank to its depositor. It is not questioned that he had the defendants' license to use the account. If the authority was not expressly given, it must have arisen from the practice which had existed for years, presumably with the defendants' knowledge and acquiescence. This authority, together with Moore's official relation to the defendants, enabled him to make use of the account for his private purposes as fully and conveniently as he could have done if the account in the bank had been in his own name. He could make deposits and check them out at will by his own act. He could use the account for a lawful transmission of guardianship funds, the same as he could if the deposit had been made in the bank in his own name. When the defendants' assistant treasurer received, indorsed, and deposited the certificates and draft, he might properly presume that Moore would withdraw the funds so deposited for lawful purposes. It does not appear that the assistant treasurer had knowledge of any facts that had a tendency to overcome this presumption. If he was acting within his authority as assistant treasurer, which—Moore being present and acting—is doubtful, the defendants are not chargeable through him with knowledge of Moore's contemplated misappropriation of the funds, or of facts that would put them upon inquiry in regard to the matter.

The plaintiff further says that the defendants had notice of the fraud through Moore himself, their treasurer and general manager. It is true that a principal is ordinarily chargeable with the knowledge acquired by his agent in executing the agency, and is subject to the liabilities which such knowledge imposes. But there is a well-established exception to this rule, by which the principal is not charged with the knowledge of his agent when the latter is engaged in "committing an independent, fraudulent act on his own account, and the facts to be imputed relate to this fraudulent act." Allen v. Railroad, 150 Mass. 200, 22 N. E. 917, 5 L. R. A. 716, 15 Am. St. Rep. 185; Indian Head Nat. Bank v. Clark, 166 Mass. 27, 43 N. E. 912; Produce, etc., Co. v. Bleberbach, 176 Mass. 577, 588, 58 N. E. 162; Camden, etc., Co. v. Lord, 67 N. J. Eq. 489, 58 Atl. 607; Gunster v. Company, 181 Pa. 827, 37 Atl. 550, 59 Am. St. Rep. 650; Frenkel v. Hudson, 82 Ala. 158, 2 South. 758, 60 Am. Rep. 736; American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 170 U. S. 183, 18 Sup. Ct. 552, 42 L. Ed. 977; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 675, and authorities cited in notes; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1145, and authorities cited in notes. This exception was recognized in this state in Clark v. Marshall, 62 N. H. 498, 500. Mr. Pomeroy suggests a doubt whether it applies to the managing officers of a corporation "through whom alone the corporation can act." Section 675, note 1. He gives no reason for the doubt, and the cases which seem to have raised it (Holden v. Bank, 72 N. Y. 286, and First Nat. Bank v. Milford, 36 Conn. 98) were decided upon an application of the general rule to the facts, without any allusion to the exception, and, of course, without any allusion to a distinction in the application of the exception when the principal is a corporation instead of a natural person. In both cases the principals were seeking to hold an advantage acquired through the fraudulent acts of their agents, and were chargeable with the fraud by virtue of the familiar principle that a person cannot ratify acts and disaffirm the fraud that is a constituent part of them. In the case at bar, the defendants do not set up any claim to the funds in dispute. The funds have passed beyond their reach without being of any advantage to them. In many of the cases cited the principals were corporations which acted solely through the officers who committed the fraud. Whatever be the true reason for the exception—whether it be the presumption that the agent would not communicate knowledge of the fraud to his principal, or the consideration that the fraudulent acts are not within the scope of the agent's employment and are wholly for his benefit—it is not perceived how the fact that the principal is a corporation instead of a natural person affects the application and force of the reason. The knowledge of a corporation, whether actual or imputed, must necessarily be that of its officers; but this circumstance does not transform the officers into principals. The stockholders of a corporation like that of the defendants furnish the capital and presumably carry on the business. The principalship of the corporation is embodied in them. The officers and agents of the corporation exercise only delegated authority—delegated by virtue of a by-law or rule of the corporation, or by virtue of its habitual manner of doing business. If, as the plaintiff argues, the assistant treasurer represented the defendants in the receipt of the deposits, Moore was not the only officer of the corporation through whom the corporation could act relating to the matter. The facts would not admit of the application of the rule to which Mr. Pomeroy's doubt relates.

The application of the rule embodied in the exception to the peculiar circumstances of this case produces a just result, one that commands the approval of a court of equity. The defendants were not really the principals of Moore in respect to the deposits and withdrawals of the plaintiff's money in and from their bank account; they were his agents. The transactions were solely on his account and for his benefit. The defendants received no substantial benefit from them. The only authority conferred upon Moore by them which he used was the authority to use their bank account for his private purposes. In drawing checks, he fulfilled their obligation to himself. He was really acting for himself. If he had drawn the checks in the course of a legal use of the funds, the plaintiff would have had no cause for complaint. As has been seen, the defendants did not owe the plaintiff the duty of looking after the appropriation of the money, even if they knew it was temporarily in their possession. The presumption was that he would lawfully appropriate it. There is no evidence outside of that relating to Moore's acts and intention in these particular transactions which tends to show that they had reason to anticipate he would attempt to use the authority they conferred upon him in misappropriating trust funds. They were, at most, only unwitting agents of Moore in the transactions. The mere fact that he acted for the defendants in fulfilling their obligation to him does not in justice and equity afford a sufficient reason for charging them with knowledge and making them responsible equally with himself for a fraud that he was committing outside the scope of the authority he exercised in their behalf.

Still another position taken by the plaintiff is that she might maintain an action against the Manchester National Bank, on the ground that the form of the certificates of deposit and draft was notice to the bank that the papers represented guardianship funds, to which the defendants could not give a valid title; that, if the plaintiff pursued that course, the bank would have a right of action against the defendants upon their indorsements of the paper; and that equity will enable the plaintiff to proceed directly against the defendants in the interest of the bank as well as herself, thereby avoiding the necessity of two actions. It follows from what has already been said that this position is not tenable, even if equity would have jurisdiction of the subject-matter in case the bank acquired no valid title to the paper—a point that has not been considered.

The plaintiff is not entitled to the relief sought, and the bill should be dismissed.

Exceptions overruled. Case discharged. All concurred.

SCOTT FERTILIZER CO. v. MALONEY.
(Superior Court of Delaware. Kent. Nov. 8, 1905.)

PLEADINGS—JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS—AFFIDAVIT OF DEFENSE—SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit of defense, in an action of book account, which avers that the account has been paid, plaintiff accepting a note of a third person for the sum claimed to be due, and that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in no sum whatever, his demand having been paid, is sufficient to deprive plaintiff of the right to judgment on motion.

Action by the Scott Fertilizer Company against Lydia C. Maloney. On motion for judgment notwithstanding the affidavit of defense. Denied.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Henry Ridgely, Jr., for plaintiff. Richard R. Kenney and Arlie B. Magee, for defendant.

The defendant filed the following affidavit of defense, viz.: "State of Delaware, Kent County—ss.: Be it remembered that on this twenty-sixth day of October, A. D. 1905, before me, Edwin F. Wood, a notary public for the state of Delaware, personally came Lydia C. Maloney, the defendant in the above-stated suit, who, having been by me duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say that she is the defendant in the above-stated suit; that she verily believes that there is a legal defense to the whole of the cause of action in the above-stated suit, the nature and character whereof is as follows, namely: That the book entries charged in the plaintiff's affidavit of demand against her, the said defendant, have been fully settled and paid for, the said plaintiffs in the said suit on December 15, 1903, taking and accepting the note of Frank E. Maloney due at six months from date for the said sum claimed by these plaintiffs against this defendant, namely, two hundred and thirty-one dollars and twenty-two cents ($231.22), and that she, the said defendant, is therefore indebted to the said plaintiffs in no sum whatever; the demand of the said plaintiffs having been fully satisfied and paid." The above affidavit was duly signed and sworn to before the said justice of the peace.

Mr. Ridgely, for plaintiff, asked for judgment notwithstanding the affidavit of defense, on the ground that there was no allegation in the affidavit that the note referred to therein was accepted as payment of the claim of the plaintiff, which averment was necessary under the uniform decisions of the court.

Mr. Kenney, for defendant: The word "payment" has been held by this court to be sufficient in an affidavit of defense.

GRUBB, J. It has always been the policy of this court not to grant snap judgments, if there is a sufficient indication that there is a bona fide defense.

LORE, C. J. We think, under our rulings, that the affidavit of defense is sufficient as it stands. We refuse judgment.

Judgment refused.

STATE v. COLLINS.

(Court of Oyer and Terminer of Delaware.
Sussex. March 25, 1903.)

1. HOMICIDE—FIRST-DEGREE MURDER—DEFINITION.

Murder in the first degree is the taking of human life with express malice aforethought, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate a crime punishable with death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 36-38.]

2. SAME—SECOND-DEGREE MURDER—DEFINITION.

Murder in the second degree is the killing of a human being without a deliberately formed design to take life, or to perpetrate or attempt to perpetrate a crime punishable with death, but without justification, excuse, or sufficient provocation to reduce the homicide to manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 39, 40.]

3. SAME—MANSLAUGHTER—DEFINITION.

Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice aforethought.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 52.]

4. SAME—MALICE.

In murder in the first degree express malice must be shown, while in murder in the second degree malice may be shown by such acts and conduct as indicate a reckless disregard of human life, though unaccompanied with a deliberate design to take life.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 36-40.]

5. SAME—PRESUMPTION.

Where the life of a person is proved to have been taken by another, it is presumed in law to have been taken with malice aforethought, unless the contrary appears.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 268.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

Circumstantial evidence, to warrant a conviction, must be of such significance, consistency, and force as to produce conviction in the minds of the jury of the guilt of accused beyond a reasonable doubt, and the facts must be such as to be inconsistent with any other reasonable conclusion than that the prisoner was the guilty party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1261.]

7. SAME—REASONABLE DOUBT.

A reasonable doubt, entitling an accused to an acquittal, must not only be reasonable under the facts disclosed in the case, but must grow out of the evidence and be of such a character as to prevent the minds of the jury from reaching an honest conclusion of accused's guilt, after a most careful and conscientious consideration of the facts and circumstances surrounding the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1267, 1268, 1906-1922.]

8. SAME—EXPERT TESTIMONY—WEIGHT.

In considering the testimony of an expert in a criminal case, the jury should consider his means of knowledge, the reasons he assigns for his opinions, and give credence to his testimony as they may find his qualifications sufficient and his reasons satisfactory.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1081.]

9. SAME—CHARACTER.

Proof of good or bad character, whether it relates to witnesses or to the accused, should be considered as other evidence tending to show credibility, innocence, or guilt, and is entitled to such weight as the jury may deem just in connection with all the other evidence in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 846.]

Elmer Collins was indicted for murder. Verdict, not guilty.

At a court of oyer and terminer, in and for Sussex county, beginning March 16, 1903, the defendant, Elmer Collins, was placed upon trial upon the charge of murder in the first degree, for the felonious killing of his wife, Alda Collins, on the 12th day of April, 1902.

At the trial the state proved the following facts: That on the 12th day of April, 1902, Alda Collins, the deceased, was found dead in the stable connected with the carriage house of the property where she had lived with her husband, near the town of Laurel in Sussex county; that she was seen by none of her neighbors moving around the premises that morning; that about 8 o'clock in the morning of the day of the killing the defendant Elmer Collins came over from his house to the house of one George Henry, who lived a short distance away and in plain sight of Collins' house, and there informed the members of the Henry family of the fact that Mrs. Collins had been killed, and that the members of the Henry family went over immediately to the Collins house, and from time to time other persons gathered; that they went into said carriage house and found Mrs. Collins lying in the stable part of the same, partly upon her stomach, dead; that her face was in the horse manure and corn stalks with which the earth floor of the stable was covered; that when found she had upon her head three wounds, and on her forehead a severe contusion, and her throat cut with a deep gash running nearly back to the vertebrae in her neck; that the wounds upon the head, involving a fracture of the skull, probably would have caused death and that the wound in the neck unquestionably would have caused death, which indicated that she had been killed for a considerable period, for hours at least; that upon her face, as she lay in the manure, were blood stains, and that those blood stains were dry; that the blood in the wound in the neck had coagulated and had practically dried there—all of which indicated that the deceased had been killed for a considerable time before her body was found. It was further proved by the state that the carriage house or stable in which the body was found had four compartments or rooms in it; that a door just large enough for a carriage to be taken in opened into the carriage house, which was just about large enough to hold a carriage, with a space sufficient to walk along by the carriage back into some stalls; that on the right-hand side of the wide door opening into the carriage house was a smaller door for the purpose of going in and out; that on entering the carriage house, on the right-hand side, you first came to a corner, about six or eight feet square, which was used for the storing of corn; that next you came to a door opening into what was called the stable, which was practically a stall about twice the size of the ordinary stall in a stable; that a door opened from the carriage house into this stall, and by passing right through you could go through a door into a pound into which the horses were sometimes turned; the stall of the stable, being the second apartment on the right-hand side of the building, was where Alda Collins, the deceased, was found; that right behind that was a stall or two of about the same size, and back of that was another room or space used for cows; and that in the back part of the carriage house there was a ladder which led to the loft.

The theory of the state, from the circumstantial evidence offered, was that the deceased was not killed in the stable, but that she was killed in the corner, being the compartment in the carriage house next to the stall in which the body was found; that during the day on which she was found and also the preceding day the corner was fastened, and that only upon the third day did any person get into the corner to see what was in there, and that when they got in they found that on the partition between the corner and the stable where the woman's body was found, at a short distance above the floor, was a wide, thick blood stain, and that directly underneath the blood stain on the floor of the corner was another blood stain wider and longer, and that scattered over the floor on the corn and other places near and upon the adjacent boards were other splatters of blood; that, upon a scientific examination and testing by an expert of said blood spots found in the corner, the same were pronounced beyond all reasonable scientific doubt to be human blood; and that the person who killed Alda Collins killed her in a place where he could have concealed it by closing the door only, as it was closed for two days, and that her slayer took her from a place of concealment, after delivering the fatal wounds, out into an open stable where she could be easily discovered.

The state further proved that the defendant made various statements in regard to the occurrences at his house that morning, that these statements varied in material particulars, and that said statements also varied from the facts in the case, so as to indicate that they were false. The state further proved that upon the top part or apron of the overalls worn by the defendant when he called George Henry's family over to his place that morning there were blood stains; that these blood stains were put upon the garment when the blood was fresh; that the defendant accounted for the blood stains by saying that he lifted up his wife out of the manure of the stable and pressed her to his breast and kissed her, further stating that when he laid her down he put her face back in the manure; also that he took his two small children in his dearborn, with some farming implements that morning, and went to a back field to do some cultivating, leaving his wife to do some chores at home, when she was to join him and the children in the field, and that he returned to the house from the field in something like an hour, when he found his wife dead in the stable. The state proved that, if such had been true, the blood which had oozed from the wound would have been in such condition that it would not have produced the stain which was produced upon the flap or apron of the said overalls of the defendant, said stain having been proved by the state to be infiltrated blood passing through the meshes of the garment, which could only be the case with fresh warm blood, and not with coagulated blood; that upon the right leg of the overalls which the defendant wore that morning, according to his own statement, was a splatter of blood, which the state proved could only have been made there as the blood spurted from a human body, said splatter of blood having the formation and the gloss, not of a smear, but of a spurt, of blood.

The state also produced and offered in evidence the instrument with which it claimed the killing was done, being a large iron bar found in the carriage house after the murder was committed, which instrument the state claimed was amply sufficient to have produced the fatal wounds. The state further contended that, from the facts proved, it was evident that the defendant came upon his wife as she was stooping down in the corner crib and struck her from behind with the iron bar referred to, that then she was pushed or forced or leaned against the door sill in the corner crib, producing the stain found thereon, and falling down upon the floor produced the stain there found, and that after she had bled sufficiently for all of said blood stains to be made the defendant concluded it was better to draw her out of a place of concealment into a place of openness, and that he took her out of a closed room into an open room, viz., to an open compartment or stable; that after delivering the fatal blow the defendant dragged his wife from the door of the corner crib, with his arms under her arms and her head resting upon the apron or flap of his overalls, to the stable, where her dead body was subsequently found, and threw her upon the manure; and that it was while so dragging her that the warm blood from the wounds in her head infiltrated through the meshes of his overalls producing the identical stain afterwards found upon said garment.

As regards a motive for the slaying of the deceased, the state proved that prior to the time of the killing the defendant had an intimacy with a young woman, that he was a short time prior thereto trying to induce her to go away with him, that he had told her that he would clear the way for their plans; and the theory of the state upon that matter was that the other love of the defendant, and the fact that his wife stood in the way of the consummation of his plans, caused a dispute to arise over this person, in which the wife may have exhibited some jealousy, and which may have been followed by quarrels which led finally to the killing of the woman by her husband, the defendant.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Herbert H. Ward, Atty. Gen., and Robert H. Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State. Robert C. White and Charles F. Richards, for defendant.

LORE, C. J. (charging the jury). It is not disputed that on the 12th day of April, 1902, the dead body of Alda Collins was found in the stable part of a building on the farm near Laurel, in this county, on which she with her husband, Elmer Collins, the prisoner, and their two small children had theretofore been living. The body was covered with blood, the face was bruised, the nose was broken, the back and side of the skull were crushed in, and the throat was cut. The indictment charges that she was killed by Elmer Collins, her husband, and that she is guilty of murder of the first degree.

Inasmuch as under this indictment you may find the prisoner guilty of murder of the first degree, or of the second degree, or of manslaughter, if in your judgment the evidence shall so warrant, it is necessary for the court to define these three grades of felonious homicide. (1) Murder of the first degree consists in taking a human life with express malice aforethought, or in perpetrating or in attempting to perpetrate a crime punishable with death; that is to say, when such life is so taken with a sedate, deliberate mind and formed design to take the life of, or to do some great bodily injury to, the person whose life is so taken. (2) Murder of the second degree is where there is no such deliberately formed design to take life, or to perpetrate or attempt to perpetrate a crime punishable with death, but where, nevertheless, the killing is without justification or excuse, without any, or without sufficient, provocation to reduce the homicide to manslaughter. (3) Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice aforethought.

Malice is the essence of murder. In murder of the first degree such malice must be express, and may be indicated by all such facts and circumstances as show a deliberately formed design to take life. In murder of the second degree malice may be shown by such cruel acts and conduct as indicate a reckless disregard of human life, although unaccompanied with a deliberate design to take life. In manslaughter there is no malice.

Bearing in mind these distinctions, it is your duty to inquire into the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. Whenever the life of one person is proved to have been taken by another, it is presumed in law to have been taken with malice aforethought, unless the contrary appears.

Crime may be proved either by direct or by circumstantial evidence, or by both. Direct evidence is such as the confessions of the accused or the testimony of persons who saw the crime committed. Circumstantial evidence consists of the suspicious facts and circumstances which surround a case, but which lack the direct or positive character.

The universal experience of those engaged in the administration of justice shows the absolute necessity of admitting and relying upon circumstantial evidence, in forming our conclusions in regard to the guilt or innocence of accused persons, and, when clearly convincing and conclusive, is of equal weight with direct evidence. Indeed it is often the only means of uncovering and proving crimes which are committed in secret and which are concealed by the cunning artifices of the perpetrator. But, while this is so, we say to you most emphatically that circumstantial evidence, to warrant a conviction, must be entirely satisfactory, and of such significance, consistency, and force as to produce conviction in the minds of the jury of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt. The great rule on this subject is this: That when the evidence is circumstantial the jury must be fully satisfied, not only that the circumstances are consistent with the guilt of the prisoner, but they must also be satisfied that the facts are such as to be inconsistent with any other reasonable conclusion than that the prisoner was the guilty party. They must be such as to exclude any other hypothesis or conclusion. This is the rule relating to circumstantial evidence, as distinguished from direct evidence. The state claims to have produced in this case both direct and circumstantial evidence.

But whether the evidence be direct, or circumstantial, or both, it must in every case be of such a character as to satisfy the minds of the jury of the guilt of the prisoner beyond a reasonable doubt. Such a doubt, gentlemen, must not only be reasonable under the facts disclosed in the case, but must grow out of the evidence as you have heard it here, and must be of such a character as to prevent your minds from reaching an honest conclusion of the guilt of the accused, after a most careful and conscientious consideration of all the facts, circumstances, and conditions surrounding the case. If, after such consideration, there remains in your mind such a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner, you should acquit him.

The burden of proof is upon the state. All the presumptions of law, independent of evidence, are in favor of innocence, and every person accused of crime is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty.

Expert testimony is the evidence of persons who are skilled in some art, science, profession, or business, which skill or knowledge is not common to their fellow men and which has come to such experts by reason of special study and experience in such art, science, profession, or business. The value of such testimony depends upon the learning and skill of the expert, and varies with the circumstances of each case. The jury should take into consideration the expert's means of knowledge, and the reasons he assigns for the opinions he has given, and give credence to his testimony as they may find his qualifications sufficient and his reasons satisfactory. The jury may accept or reject the conclusions of experts, as in their judgment they may or not be found consistent with reason and experience or otherwise satisfactory. The testimony of experts is to be considered like any other testimony, and is to be tried by the same tests, and receive just so much weight and credit as the jury may deem it entitled to, viewed in connection with all the evidence in the case. The testimony of detectives, of police officers, and of relatives of accused persons is to be taken and considered in like manner.

Proof of good or bad character, whether it relates to witnesses, or to the accused, is to be considered by you as any other evidence tending to show credibility or innocence or guilt, as the case may be, and is entitled to just so much weight as the jury may deem just, in connection with all the other evidence in the case. Like consideration is to be given to proof of marital relations subsisting between the prisoner and his deceased wife at and before the time of her death.

From the nature of the evidence, and the mystery attending this homicide, the testimony in this case has necessarily occupied many days. Both your patience and endurance have been largely taxed. That testimony is now all before you. It has been presented and argued with great care by counsel, both on the part of the state and of the prisoner. From that evidence, and from that alone, you are to reach your verdict, after the most thoughtful and conscientious consideration of it, under the solemn obligation of the oath you took when you entered that jury box.

If, after such consideration, you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner did kill his wife in the manner laid in the indictment, your verdict should be not guilty. Should you believe, however, that he did kill her in such manner, unlawfully, but without malice, your verdict should be guilty of manslaughter. Again, if you believe that he killed her in such manner, cruelly and wantonly, but without express malice aforethought, you should find him guilty of murder in the second degree. But if you believe that he killed her in such manner, with sedate, deliberate mind and formed design to take life, then your verdict should be guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted.

Verdict, not guilty.

STATE v. WILSON.

(Court of General Sessions of Delaware. Kent. April 30, 1904.)

1. MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE.

Where a witness, having lived with accused as his wife without being married to him, introduced him as her husband to her family, and, in order to deceive them, signed a bail bond in defendant's name as though she was his wife, such facts were insufficient to prove a marriage, so as to render her incompetent to testify.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Marriage, § 16.]

2. INDICTMENT—CONVICTION OF LESSER DEGREE OF OFFENSE CHARGED—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL

Under an indictment for assault with intent to murder, defendant may be convicted of that offense or of simple assault.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Indictment and Information, § 586.]

3. HOMICIDE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

In a prosecution of assault with intent to murder, the state is bound, not only to prove the assault, but to show beyond a reasonable doubt that it was made with intent to murder the prosecutor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 112, 478, 544.]

4. ASSAULT AND BATTERY—DEFINITION OF ASSAULT.

An assault is an unlawful attempt, by violence, to do injury to the person of another; the person making the attempt having the present ability to commit the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 4, Cent. Dig. Assault and Battery, §§ 68-74.]

5. HOMICIDE—MURDER—DEFINITION.

Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought, either express or implied, committed by a person of sound memory and discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 12.]

6. SAME—FIRST-DEGREE MURDER—EXPRESS MALICE.

Express malice, constituting murder in the first degree, is proved by attending circumstances satisfactorily evidencing a sedate, deliberate purpose and formed design to kill another, such as the deliberate selection and use of a deadly weapon, or lying in wait, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 17.]

7. SAME—SECOND-DEGREE MURDER.

Murder in the second degree is proved where it is satisfactorily shown that the killing was done with a sedate, deliberate purpose and formed design to take life, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate any crime punishable with death, but is usually shown to have been done suddenly, without justification or excuse, and without provocation sufficient to reduce the homicide to manslaughter or in the committing or attempting to commit a noncapital felony or an act of violence from which malice is presumed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 39, 40.]

8. SAME—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where defendant shot prosecutor, not for his own protection, but to gratify a feeling of revenge or malice, he was not entitled to avail himself of the plea of self-defense.

9. SAME—REPELLING ASSAULT.

Where a person is assaulted, he is not obliged to wait until he is struck by an impending blow before returning the assault, in order to entitle him to the defense of self-defense; but he is not justified in using more force than is reasonably necessary under the circumstances to repel the assault or avert the peril.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, §§ 124-127.]

10. SAME.

Where accused was suddenly assaulted, and the assault was so fierce and urgent as not to allow him to retreat or avail himself of other means of escape, he was then entitled to use a deadly weapon in his defense.

11. CRIMINAL LAW—REASONABLE DOUBT.

A reasonable doubt is not a mere imaginary, whimsical, or possible doubt of the guilt of accused, but is such a real and substantial doubt as intelligent and impartial men would reasonably entertain on a careful consideration of the relevant facts proven in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 1906-1922.]

Samuel E. Wilson, was indicted for assault with intent to murder. The jury disagreed.

The defendant, Samuel E. Wilson, was indicted at this term for assault upon one Edward Damph with intent to murder the said Damph. The state proved the following facts: That both Damph and the defendant, Wilson, lived in Philadelphia; that while living in Philadelphia the defendant had formed the acquaintance of one Mina Jarrell, after which the two lived together there as man and wife, though not married; that the defendant's business took him away from Philadelphia frequently, and that while so away from the city, some months before the assault occurred, Mina Jarrell and Damph met by chance at a boarding house in Philadelphia, where they became acquainted after which, at another place, they lived together as man and wife, though not married; that Damph, although he had lived with Mina Jarrell for some time, had never met Wilson until the day of the assault, though she had mentioned Wilson to him and had shown him Wilson's picture; that a short time before the day of the assault Mina Jarrell was called to Felton, Del., where her parents lived, on account of the mortal sickness of her father; that while there she corresponded with Damph, and upon the death of her father invited Damph to come to Felton to attend the funeral, and to assist her in regard to settling up her father's affairs; that Damph came down from Philadelphia and Wilson also came down on the same train, but, the one not knowing the other, they were not attracted to each other and did not meet; that Wilson formed a part of the funeral party that day and drove with Mina Jarrell in a carriage to the place of interment, a cemetery near Harrington; that Damph, after arriving at Felton, hired a horse and carriage and drove alone to the cemetery, passing Wilson and Mina Jarrell on the way; that both Wilson and Damph attended the funeral; that after the funeral Wilson started back toward Felton with Mina Jarrell in the carriage with him; that Damph preceded them to Harrington; that Wilson and Mina Jarrell passed through Harrington, and Damph followed after them in his carriage, and, when they had gotten nearly to Felton, Damph drove by them a short distance, then turned around and drove back, turning his horse's head diagonally across the road, so that Wilson could not pass, and got out of his carriage and suggested to Mina Jarrell to get in the carriage with him, announcing to Wilson then that Mina Jarrell had called herself his wife; that thereupon Miss Jarrell arose upon her seat in Wilson's carriage and Damph lifted her out of Wilson's carriage and carried her a few paces and set her down upon the side path; that Wilson remained in his carriage; that meanwhile, when Damph had gotten out of his carriage, his horse had gone on down the road, and after he placed Miss Jarrell on the side path and they had walked a little distance he said they could hardly get to Felton that way, and he would go on and catch his horse; that he went on about 100 yards or so, caught his horse, and turned back, leaving his horse walking in the road; that meanwhile Miss Jarrell walked on the side path in the same direction that Damph had taken, and Wilson drove along beside her with his horse in a walk; that after a short space of time Damph, having caught his horse and turned it back, met the two as they were coming down the road; that, when he met them, he turned his horse around, or started to turn it around, in the road and that brought him upon the same side of the road and on the same side of his horse as Miss Jarrell was on; that about that time Wilson had gotten out of his carriage—having his revolver free in his overcoat and with his hand upon his pistol—and as Damph was starting to help Miss Jarrell into his carriage, Wilson, without warning, pulled his pistol and shot at Damph, and after the first shot immediately fired again; that the first shot did not take effect, but that the second shot did, the wound that Damph then received being upon the left side of his head, and the course that the bullet took when it entered the head, according to the testimony, indicated that it was fired from the rear, when Wilson was not exactly behind Damph, but at a little angle to the rear of him; that the shot fired was from a 44-caliber revolver, and struck Damph over the ear and fractured the skull a portion of the bullet lodging in the skull and driving splinters thereof into the brain (some splinters of the skull opening the brain and letting out small portions of brain matter), and then giving a ragged wound as it left the head a little distance further over towards the forehead; that that wound staggered Damph and he fell to the ground, when he reached towards his rear pocket for the purpose of drawing his revolver, having been shot twice; that as soon as Damph reached for his revolver, and was trying to get it out of its leather case, Wilson stooped over him and fired the third time, before Damph could get his revolver out of its case, the bullet hitting Damph on the side of his nose; that it could not be determined in what portion of his head the bullet finally lodged, as it was never recovered; that a portion of the bullet that had lodged in the skull was taken from his skull by the operating surgeon at the Delaware Hospital in Wilmington, where Damph was subsequently carried; that Damph was for a short space of time unconscious, but, reviving, he got into his carriage and in a confused sort of way asked some one who happened along in what direction Felton was, and, being told, he drove a few paces in the opposite direction, and then turned his horse towards Felton, and drove off. It was further proved that the nature of the wounds received by Damph was exceedingly dangerous, and the chances of his recovery were very slight; but, owing to his good constitution, native strength of body, and as a result of skillful treatment in the hospital, he finally recovered.

The evidence on the part of the defense was to the effect: That when Damph first came up to Wilson's carriage he said, "Is that Mr. Wilson?" That Wilson replied, "That is my name." That he then said, "Who is that you have in there with you?" That Wilson replied, "This is Miss Jarrell." That Damph then said, "Miss Jarrell calls herself my wife, and she must get out of there and get in with me." That as he said these words he had his hand upon his hip pocket, and Miss Jarrell said to Wilson, "Oh, Sam! he is going to shoot you; let me get out." That Miss Jarrell thereupon jumped out of the carriage, assisted by Damph, and walked with the latter along the side path of the road, until Damph went ahead to recover his horse. That, when Damph returned to Miss Jarrell after catching his horse, he had some words with Wilson, who was walking beside Miss Jarrell, and immediately drew his revolver as if to shoot Wilson, and that Wilson drew his revolver and shot back in self-defense.

Herbert H. Ward, Atty. Gen., and Robert Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State. Richard R. Kenney and Arley B. Magee, for defendant.

Mina Jarrell, being produced as a witness on behalf of the defendants, the Attorney General asked that she be first sworn on her voir dire, which was accordingly done, and the witness was questioned by the Deputy Attorney General as follows: "Q. Will you look at the paper which I now hand you, and state whose signature it bears? A. That is my signature. Q. What is the name signed there by you? A. Mrs. Mina Wilson. Q. Where did you sign that? A. In Felton, at our home. Q. Whose signature is the other one appearing thereon? A. My mother's. Q. Did you see that signature placed there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did this defendant, Samuel E. Wilson, attend the funeral of your father as your husband? A. As Mr. and Mrs. Wilson we attended the funeral; yes, sir. Q. You mean yourself and the defendant? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you present the defendant to your family as your husband? A. My people supposed he was my husband; yes, sir. Q. Did you ever present him to your people as your husband? A. I had to make them believe he was my husband. Q. Did you hold yourself out to your people and to the public in the community of Felton as his wife? A. Yes, sir."

The Deputy Attorney General here offered the above-mentioned paper in evidence, being a bail bond of said witness, signed and sealed in due form, for her appearance as a witness at the present term of court in the case of State v. Samuel E. Wilson. Pending the admission of said paper, the witness was cross-examined as follows:

By Mr. Kenney. "X. Q. You say that you represented yourself to be the wife of Mr. Wilson to your family? A. Yes, sir. X. Q. When you signed this bail bond at the time of this occurrence at Felton, on the 15th day of March last, you signed it Mrs. Mina Wilson? A. Yes, sir. X. Q. Why? A. Because my mother was there, and I must. X. Q. Did you hold yourself out to any other persons than your family as the wife of Mr. Wilson? A. No, sir. X. Q. Then it was to them alone that you represented yourself to be his wife? A. Yes, sir. X. Q. Were you, in fact, ever married to Mr. Wilson? (Objected to by the Deputy Attorney General, and question withdrawn.)"

Mr. Richards: We object to this witness testifying upon the ground that she has signed and sealed a bail bond, an instrument of a solemn nature, for her appearance in this court as a witness, and signed it Mrs. Mina Wilson, and has testified upon her oath that in so signing it she signed her name as the wife of this defendant, and, in addition to the signature to this solemn instrument under seal, she held herself out to the people of Felton and to her own family as this man's wife. She has not denied that she is his wife, and she cannot, I think, deny that she is his wife, upon this showing. Upon her own acts and her own testimony she has admitted that she is his wife, and cannot now deny it. State v. Vincent R. Miller, 3 Pennwll, 518, 52 Atl. 262.

GRUBB, J. We are prepared to decide this question without hearing the other side. The Deputy Attorney General has cited the case of State v. Vincent R. Miller. If you will examine that case as we have just done, you will find that there were a great many more facts furnished in that case than in this. We hold that there is not sufficient proof of a marriage before us to exclude the testimony of this witness at this stage, and therefore we refuse to exclude her testimony at this stage of the case. We consider that she is a competent witness in this case. Let her be sworn.

The witness was thereupon sworn as a witness on behalf of the defendant, and testified in effect that what Wilson did was in self-defense.

GRUBB, J. (charging the jury). This indictment charges Samuel E. Wilson with an assault with intent to murder Edward Dampf, the prosecuting witness. Under this indictment you may find the accused guilty either of the assault with intent to murder, or of the simple assault merely, or not guilty of either, according as the law and the evidence may warrant your verdict.

In order to warrant you in finding that he is guilty in manner and form as he is indicted—that is, not only of the assault, but of the assault with intent to murder, as charged in his indictment—it is incumbent upon the state to satisfy you from all the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, not only that the alleged assault was committed by the accused, but also that it was made by him with the intent to murder the prosecuting witness, Edward Dampf. Such intent to murder is absolutely material and essential to be proven as a fact in this case before you can find him guilty of the said assault with intent to murder.

An assault is an unlawful attempt, by violence, to do injury to the person of another; the person making the attempt having the present ability to commit such injury. As, in addition to the assault, the intent to murder is also charged in this indictment, it is necessary for us to define to you what murder within the meaning of the law is; for you must be satisfied from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the prisoner's alleged act (if Edward Dampf's death had actually been caused thereby) would be murder of the first or second degree, before you can render a verdict of guilty of the intent to murder. To constitute the statutory offense of assault with intent to commit murder, the circumstances must be such as to show that it would have been murder if the assailant had accomplished such intent.

Murder is where a person of sound memory and discretion unlawfully kills any human being with malice aforethought, either express or implied. The chief characteristic of this crime, distinguishing it from every other kind of homicide, and therefore indispensably necessary to be proved, is malice prepense or aforethought. Under the statute law of this state there are two degrees of murder, viz., murder of the first and murder of the second degree. The first is where the crime of murder is committed with express malice aforethought, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate any crime punishable with death; and the second degree is where the crime of murder is committed otherwise, and with malice aforethought implied by law.

The express malice, which constitutes murder of the first degree, is proved by circumstances attending the act satisfactorily evidencing a sedate, deliberate purpose and formed design to kill another, such as the deliberate selection and use of a deadly weapon, lying in wait, and the like. Implied or constructive malice is an inference or conclusion of law from the facts found by the jury. Therefore murder of the second degree may be proved where it is not satisfactorily shown by the evidence submitted to the jury that the killing was done with a sedate, deliberate purpose and formed design to take life, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate any crime punishable with death, but is so shown that it was done suddenly, without justification or excuse, and without any provocation, or without provocation sufficient to reduce the homicide to the grade of manslaughter, or in committing or attempting to commit a felony not capital-ly punishable, or some act of violence from which the law presumes malice. Malice is implied by law from every deliberate, cruel act committed by one person against another, no matter how sudden such act may be; for the law considers that he who does a cruel act voluntarily does it maliciously. And whenever the act from which death ensues is proven by the prosecution, unaccompanied by circumstances of justification, excuse, or mitigation, the law presumes that the homicide was committed with malice; and it is thereupon incumbent upon the prisoner to show by evidence that the killing was not malicious, and therefore does not amount to murder.

Having explained to you what an assault is, and having also stated to you that, in addition to the proof of the assault (if it has been proven to you), the prosecution must show the intent to murder the person named in the indictment—that is, to kill him, with either express or implied malice aforethought—it becomes necessary for us further to state to you how such intent to murder may be shown to your satisfaction. The intent to commit murder may be shown by direct evidence of the intent; that is, by the express confession or declaration of the accused that he committed the alleged assault with intent to murder, or, if there be no such direct evidence, the intent to murder may be proved by the acts or the conduct of the accused and other circumstances from which the jury may naturally and reasonably infer the intent charged. For instance, it is a principle of law that every man must be presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his own voluntary or willful act. So that from the use of a deadly weapon against another the jury may infer the intent to commit murder, unless the circumstances in the case satisfy you to the contrary.

As to the question of the intent to murder, as charged in this indictment, it is for you to say from the testimony before you whether there is such evidence, taken in connection with all the facts in the case, as will warrant you in inferring that the accused assaulted Edward Damph with intent to murder him. Such intent, as we have said, being provable by and inferable from the voluntary, unlawful use, in a manner, or under circumstances perilous to human life, or directly tending to great bodily harm, of a loaded pistol or other weapon which the law considers a deadly weapon, or of any other instrument or missile reasonably likely to take human life when so used.

Samuel E. Wilson, the accused, admits that he shot Edward Damph, the prosecuting witness, but claims that he did it in necessary self-defense. If the jury are satisfied upon consideration of all the evidence in this case that no unlawful violence against the person of Wilson was committed or attempted by Damph, but that the shooting by Wilson was done not for his own protection, but to gratify a feeling of revenge or malice against Damph, then his plea of self-defense cannot avail for his acquittal, as it otherwise might do. The law accords to every one the right to protect his person from assault and injury by opposing force to force, and he is not obliged to wait until he is struck by an impending blow; for, if a weapon be raised in order to shoot or strike, or the danger of other personal violence be imminent, the party in such imminent danger may protect himself by striking the first blow for the purpose of repelling and preventing the attempted injury. But the opposing force or measure of defense must not be unreasonably disproportionate to the requirements of the occasion. Although so much force as is reasonably necessary may be used, yet, if the violence used is greater than was necessary under the circumstances to repel the assault or avert the peril, the party using it is himself guilty; for the law recognizes the right of self-defense for the purpose of preventing, but not of revenging, an injury to the person of the accused.

Where one is assaulted upon a sudden affray, and, in the judgment of the jury, honestly believed on reasonable and sufficient grounds that he was in imminent danger of being killed or of receiving great bodily harm, he would have in self-defense the right to use a deadly weapon against his assailant. But in exercising such right in self-defense, in a manner likely to cause death or great bodily harm to his assailant, he must be closely pressed by him, and must have retreated as far as he conveniently and safely could, in good faith, with the honest intent to avoid the violence and peril of the assault. If these be so sudden, fierce, or urgent as not to allow him to retreat, or to have other probable means of escape, then he may rightfully use a deadly weapon in his defense.

In conclusion, gentlemen of the jury, we remind you that the state must prove to your satisfaction, beyond a reasonable doubt, either the assault with intent to murder, or the simple assault, as charged in this indictment, before you can find a verdict of guilty of either offense. A reasonable doubt is not a mere imaginary, whimsical, or even possible doubt of the guilt of the accused, but is such a real and substantial doubt as intelligent and impartial men may reasonably entertain upon a careful consideration of all the relevant facts proven in the case.

The jury disagreed.

PEPPER v. PEPPER.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Sussex. Oct. 11, 1905.)

1. ARBITRATION — AWARD — EXCEPTIONS BY PERSONS NOT PARTIES.

Persons by excepting as "devisees and legatees" of deceased to the award of arbitrators in an action against an administrator on a claim against the estate are given a standing in court without petitioning for leave to intervene.

2. SAME — JURISDICTION OF EXCEPTIONS — FRAUD.

The superior court has jurisdiction of exceptions of devisees and legatees of deceased, to the award of arbitrators in an action against the administrator on a claim against the estate, though the ground of exception is fraud and collusion between the plaintiff and defendant.

3. SAME—SUBMISSION OF ISSUE TO JURY.

On exceptions of devisees and legatees to the award of arbitrators in an action against the administrator on a claim against the estate, the exceptions being based on fraud and collusion of the plaintiff and defendant, the issue of fraud will be submitted to the jury.

Action by Horace B. Pepper against Rebecca P. Pepper, administratrix c. t. a. of Harriet H. Cannon, deceased. Exceptions to award of arbitrators were filed by Amanda M. Hearne and others. Motion to dismiss overruled, and issue ordered submitted to a jury.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Woodburn Martin and Charles M. Curtis, for exceptants. Robert C. White, C. W. Cullen, Charles F. Richards, and Edward D. Hearne, for respondent.

Harriet H. Cannon died December 7, 1901. Under the provisions of her will, a certain tract of land was to be sold by her executor and the proceeds divided between her stepchildren, Edward F. Cannon and Amanda M. Hearne. John H. Elliott, the executor appointed by the will, renounced, and Rebecca P. Pepper, sister of Harriet H. Cannon, was then appointed administratrix c. t. a. Nearly three years after the death of Harriet H. Cannon an amicable action was instituted by Horace B. Pepper, nephew of the deceased and son of the administratrix, upon the following account:

"Harriet H. Cannon, to Horace B. Pepper, Dr.

"State of Delaware, Sussex County—ss.:

"Personally appeared before me, Henry S. Marshall, a justice of the peace in and for said county, Horace B. Pepper, and maketh solemn oath that nothing has been paid or delivered towards satisfaction of said debt, except what is mentioned, and that the sum of $1,256.50 is justly and truly due from the estate of Harriet H. Cannon, deceased, with interest.

Horace B. Pepper.

"Sworn and subscribed before me this 6th day of July, A. D. 1904.

"[Probate.] Henry S. Marshall, J. P."

The arbitrators rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff in said amicable action for $1,256.50, with interest from the 6th day of July, 1904, that being the full amount of plaintiff's claim.

On October 3, 1904, the following exceptions to the confirmation of the said award were filed by Amanda M. Hearne and Edward F. Cannon, devisees and legatees of Harriet H. Cannon, deceased, to wit: "First. That the said award was obtained through fraudulent collusion between the plaintiff and the said Rebecca P. Pepper at the time said rule of reference was agreed upon and at the time said award was made. Second. That the said amicable action and rule of reference in the above cause was entered into fraudulently and by collusion between the plaintiff and Rebecca P. Pepper, then the administratrix c. t. a. of the said Harriet H. Cannon, deceased, for the purpose of perpetrating a fraud upon the said estate by promoting the said award to the plaintiff, when in fact the deceased was not indebted to the said plaintiff in any sum of money, but, on the contrary, the plaintiff was indebted to the deceased at the time of her death. Third. That the award is based upon a probated claim invalid and fraudulent upon its face, as will appear from an inspection of copy of the said claim herewith annexed, and all of the items in the said claim, except perhaps a small part of the first item therein, were long barred by the statute of limitations, the testatrix having died on or about December 7, 1901, for it appears (1) that the first item runs back about 15 years from the death of the said testatrix, and (2) that all of the other items were for board alleged to have been furnished more than 10 years before her death, part of these items being for board furnished 15 years and some 14 years before the death of the said testatrix. Fourth. That the said award is not only fraudulent and unjust on its face, but was obtained by fraudulent connivance of the said Rebecca P. Pepper and by collusion with her, and without the production before the referees of evidence within the knowledge of the said Rebecca P. Pepper, and of evidence of record which would have proved that the said claim was unjust and unfounded in fact, and which would have demonstrated that the said Horace B. Pepper, the plaintiff, was indebted to the said estate of the said deceased. Fifth. That as appears by the copy of the probated claim of the plaintiff, it is on its face fraudulent and long barred by the statute of limitations, the testatrix, Harriet H. Cannon, having died on or about December 7, 1901, yet the said Rebecca P. Pepper, administratrix as aforesaid, not only did not plead or rely upon the statute of limitations, but entered into an amicable action, and agreed to rule of reference without the advice or knowledge of her attorneys, Charles W. Cullen and Edward D. Hearne, Esqs., and at the hearing was not represented by counsel, although the plaintiff was so represented; that notwithstanding the fact that all but one of the items in the plaintiff's claim purported to be for board furnished at times more than 10 years prior to the death of the said testatrix, and notwithstanding that the other items ran back for 15 years prior to the death of the testatrix, and notwithstanding the fact that on September 10, 1900, said Horace B. Pepper made his bond or judgment note to the said Harriet H. Cannon for the payment of the sum of $100, upon which judgment was entered by the said Harriet H. Cannon in her lifetime a short time before her death, and which judgment remains unpaid and unsatisfied of record. Sixth. That as appears of record in the superior court of Sussex county, on April 23, 1901, judgment was entered in said court by the said Edward D. Hearne, Esq., as attorney for the said Harriet H. Cannon, for the sum of $100, by virtue of a warrant of attorney on a bond or note dated September 10, 1890, made by the said Horace B. Pepper to the said Harriet H. Cannon, said judgment being No. 45 to the April term, 1901, of said court, and that a levy had been made on goods and chattels of the said Horace B. Pepper by virtue of a f. fa. issued on said judgment to the April term, 1902, of said court, said goods remaining unsold by said sheriff; that said judgment was not put in evidence by the said Rebecca P. Pepper, nor brought before the referees or used by her to defeat the said claim of said Horace B. Pepper, or part thereof at least; and that, had said judgment been so used by said Rebecca P. Pepper, the said Horace B. Pepper would not have been entitled to obtain any claim for board or services rendered prior to the giving of said bond on September 10, 1890."

At the October term, 1904, the hearing of the above exceptions was continued until the April term, 1905, at which latter term it was further continued to the October term, 1905.

At the said October term, 1905, the exceptions coming on to be heard, counsel for respondents moved to dismiss the same, for the following reasons: "First. That the exceptions were not tenable, in that they did not aver fraud or misconduct on the part of the arbitrators. Second. That the superior court had not jurisdiction over a question of fraud, that being a subject of equity jurisdiction. Third. That the exceptants were not parties to the record, and had no standing in court. Fourth. That to give the exceptants any standing in the superior court it would be at least necessary for them to file a petition asking leave to intervene and secure an order of the court to that effect."

Mr. Martin, for exceptants, replied: Every legal transaction is vitiated by fraud, when proven. Arbitrators are instruments of the court, being appointed under the provisions of the statute to expedite its business, and their awards are of no effect until they receive the approbation of the court, but, when so confirmed, are "as available in law as the verdict of a jury; and the party to whom any sum of money shall be awarded, if he be plaintiff, shall have judgment," etc. Rev. Code 1893, c. 116, § 6. All of the doings of the arbitrators are subject to the investigation of the court; for, when approved, they are the acts of the court itself. Therefore the court has the right to hear and determine any allegation of fraud and collusion practiced upon its arbitrators, by which they were influenced in making an award. It has authority to investigate the manner in which an award was made or verdict rendered, and to inquire into any matter of fraud by which the same may have been tainted. Allen v. Smith's Adm'r, 4 Har. 234. The court of chancery has no jurisdiction over this case; the subject-matter is primarily of legal jurisdiction. The exceptions are to the misconduct of the parties plaintiff and defendant in this court, the hearing being had under a rule of court. Over all of these proceedings this court has exclusive jurisdiction, and there is no appeal from its judgment to, nor can its finding be revised by a court of equity. The exceptions are filed by "devisees and legatees of Harriet H. Cannon, deceased," and their interests under the provisions of the will would be greatly impaired, if not entirely abrogated, were this award confirmed. The respondents are informed by the exceptions filed of the capacity in which the exceptants sue, and of their interest in the subject-matter, and it would be surplusage for them to file a petition asking leave to intervene.

The motion to dismiss was overruled. Counsel for respondents thereupon moved to have an issue framed to be submitted to a jury, which was objected to by counsel for exceptants, who contended that the court had the same jurisdiction of an award of referees as they had over the verdict of a jury.

THE COURT ordered the following issue to be framed to be submitted to a jury of the superior court, viz.: "And now, to wit, this 11th day of October, 1905, it is ordered by the court that the following issue be tried by a jury of Sussex county at the bar of this court: 'Was there or was there not fraud and collusion between Horace B. Pepper and Rebecca P. Pepper, administratrix c. t. a. of Harriet H. Cannon, deceased, the parties to this suit, in procuring the award therein?'"

The case was then continued to the April term, 1906.

UNITED RAILWAYS & ELECTRIC CO.
OF BALTIMORE v. WATKINS.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. STREET RAILROADS—RIGHT OF COMPANY AND INDIVIDUALS TO USE STREETS.

The rights of a street railway company and of an individual to the use of the streets are equal, and each owes to the other the same duty to avoid injury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, § 193.]

2. SAME—INJURY TO TRAVELER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

While a street railway company and an individual have an equal right to the use of a highway, an individual who, in disregard of his own safety, undertakes to cross the company's track when no prudent person would do so, cannot recover for the injuries sustained in a collision with a car.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, § 207.]

3. SAME.

It is not negligence as a matter of law for a traveler driving a four-horse wagon to attempt to cross a street car track when a car approaching is a block distant, but the question is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, §§ 214, 257.]

4. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF COMPANY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a street railway company was guilty of actionable negligence, and liable for injuries received in a collision by a traveler when attempting to cross the tracks, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

5. NEGLIGENCE—SUBMISSION OF ISSUE TO JURY—NECESSITY.

Where the nature of an act relied on to show negligence contributing to a personal injury can only be determined by considering all the circumstances, it is the province of the jury to pass on and characterize it.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas; George M. Sharp, Judge.

Action by Stephen Watkins against the United Railways & Electric Company of Baltimore. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, JONES, and BURKE, JJ.

Fielder C. Shingluff, for appellant. Robert F. Leach, Jr., for appellee.

McSHERRY, C. J. This is another personal injury case, and the only questions which we are required to consider arise on the prayers for instructions to the jury. The facts are few, and there is no conflict in the testimony. It appears that the appellee, who is a farmer residing in Howard county, was driving a four-horse wagon, loaded with furniture, along Carey street, in Baltimore City. Carey street intersects Baltimore street at right angles. Calhoun street, which also crosses Baltimore street in the same way, is west of, and one block distant from, Carey street. The double tracks of the United Railways & Electric Company of Baltimore are located on Baltimore street. The north track is used by street cars going west on Baltimore street, and the south track is used by the cars going east on that street. The appellee was driving in a southerly direction; that is, towards Baltimore street. His course took him across the double tracks on Baltimore street at the intersection of that street with Carey street, as he intended to continue on down the last-named street towards his destination after crossing Baltimore street. When he emerged from Carey street into Baltimore street, he saw a car of the appellant company a square distant, up at Calhoun street. The car was on the south track, going east, and therefore going towards the appellee. He concluded that he would have ample time to cross the tracks before the car could traverse the distance separating it, and his team and he therefore drove onward without waiting for the car to pass. Midway between, and parallel to, Calhoun and Carey streets there is an alley opening into Baltimore street. When the car reached the alley, several of the witnesses have testified that it materially increased its speed. At that juncture the lead horses were just up to or perhaps just upon the north track, not the track on which the car was approaching, and the appellee pressed forward, and the car struck between the lead horses and the wheel horses, pushing the wagon around at right angles to the direction it was proceeding, and knocking down and injuring three of the horses and seriously wounding the appellee. The distances from Calhoun street to Carey street, and from Calhoun street to the alley, are not given in the record. There was testimony adduced tending to show that the motorman upon reaching the alley turned on the electric current, instead of applying the brakes, though descending a slight downgrade, whereby a collision became, not only imminent, but inevitable, and that the car then commenced to run and continued onward at a unusually high rate of speed until it struck the team. On this state of facts the appellant asked the court to withdraw the case from the consideration of the jury, on the ground, first, that there was no evidence in the case legally sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover; and, secondly, because, according to the uncontradicted evidence in the case, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence directly contributing to the accident complained of.

As we have often said, and now repeat, negligence, both primary and contributory, is essentially, relative, and comparative, and not absolute. Whether it exists or does not exist in either form in a given case must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of that case. In every instance it must in the last analysis be some breach of the duty owed by one person to another, and, as the duty, whose breach is relied on as actionable negligence, varies under different conditions, the conditions must be known before negligence can be predicated of any act producing an injury. There is no analogy between a case like this and a case which grows out of an injury inflicted at a crossing over a railroad in the open country, because the rights and the reciprocal duties of both the injured and the injuring parties are radically different in the one instance from their rights and their reciprocal duties in the other instance. A street railway company has no exclusive right to the use of a public highway in a city for the movement of its cars, and possesses no greater or superior right to use the street than is enjoyed by any individual, apart from the mere franchise to lay its rails thereon. That franchise in no way exempts such a company from an imperative obligation to exercise due and proper care in propelling its cars to avoid injuring persons who have an equal right to use the same street as a thoroughfare. Inasmuch as the right of the individual to use the street is coextensive with the like right of the railway, each, as a consequence, owes to the other precisely the same duty to avoid an injury, and the railway company has no more right carelessly to run its cars along its tracks than the individual has carelessly to cross or traverse them. Looking to and bearing in mind these mutual and reciprocal rights and duties, the case comes to the question whether there was a breach of duty on the part of the company in carelessly disregarding the right of the appellee to cross the tracks at the intersection of Baltimore and Carey streets, or whether the appellee was careless—that is, negligent—in attempting to make that crossing when he knew, or ought to have known by the simple process of using his eyes, that it would not be possible for him to get over the tracks before the car would collide with the wagon.

When the facts show, as in some of the cases they have shown, that the injury had resulted from a deliberate, but unsuccessful, effort to cross the track in the face of evident danger, or when the disaster had been due to a miscalculation as to the chances of the individual being able to clear the track before the car would reach the point where the collision coincidentally occurred, a recovery has been denied upon the obvious ground that such a reckless attempt was gross negligence on the part of the person injured. Whilst each party, the driver of the team and the railway company, had an equal right to use the highway lawfully, neither was justified in using it in such a way as to imperil the safety of the other, and the individual who disregarded his own safety by rashly undertaking to cross the track when no prudent man would venture to do so was in no position to hold the company answerable for the consequences of his own heedlessness or folly. In the very nature of things, no hard and fast rule can be laid down by which every case of this character can be measured, and therefore the ultimate conclusion reached in one controversy cannot necessarily control the final decision of some other similar, though not precisely identical, contest. This fact renders it unnecessary to analyze or to refer to the numerous cases cited in the argument. They, and many others, have grown out of their own peculiar circumstances, and the differences in those circumstances, sometimes very slight, it is true, distinguish and differentiate the cases from each other and from this one.

If it be true, and it was for the jury to say whether it was, that, when the appellee started to cross Baltimore street the car was at Calhoun street, an entire block distant, then it cannot be said as a matter of law that there was negligence on the part of the appellee in attempting to cross over the tracks before the car had passed Carey street, unless it be assumed as a fixed and unvarying postulate that no one who may be driving a four-horse wagon in the city can prudently cross the tracks at intersecting streets whilst a street car coming towards him is as near as the distance of a block from the point of crossing. No such postulate has ever been announced or could be accepted, if asserted. The mere fact, then, of attempting to cross over the street car tracks in a city when an approaching car is no nearer than just indicated cannot be considered an act of negligence, and it was clearly for the jury to say whether, if the speed of the car had not been materially and perceptibly increased after the midway alley had been passed by it, there would have been abundant time for the team and wagon to clear the tracks before the car reached the point where the collision occurred. It is not disputed that the speed of the car was greatly accelerated as it approached the team, or that the nearer it got the faster it ran. If the speed had not been thus increased, it is probable no accident would have happened; and, if this be so, it was obviously not for the court to rule as a matter of law that the appellee was guilty of negligence in not anticipating the possible contingency of a collision resulting from an unusually rapid motion of the car. It does not appear from the record that there was the slightest danger of an accident when the appellee started to cross Baltimore street; and, if the situation changed thereafter, it was for the jury to determine what caused the change and who was responsible for it, since there is no such distinct, prominent, and decisive fact proved, about which ordinary minds would not differ, as to justify the court in pronouncing the appellee's conduct in driving forward such contributing negligence in law as would preclude him from recovering. When the nature and attributes of the act relied on to show negligence contributing to the injury can only be correctly determined by considering all the attending and surrounding circumstances of the transaction, it falls within the province of the jury to pass upon and characterize it, and it is not for the court to determine its quality as a matter of law. Cooke v. Balto. Traction Co., 80 Md. 558, 81 Atl. 327.

It follows from what we have said, first, that there was, in our opinion, some evidence of negligence on the part of the appellant company, indicated by the unusual speed of the car and by the turning on of the power and the failure to apply the brakes, which evidence the court could not properly withdraw from the consideration of the jury; secondly, that upon the question of contributory negligence the jury was the proper tribunal to pass, in view of the circumstances proved in the case. No special reference need be made to the instructions granted at the instance of the appellee, because similar ones have been so often upheld by this court in other cases that they must be regarded as accurately stating the law.

Finding no error in the rulings excepted to, the judgment, which was in favor of the appellee must be affirmed.

KOHLHOSS v. MOBLEY.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—CRIMINAL CONVERSATION — CONNIVANCE — QUESTION FOR COURT.

Where, in an action for criminal conversation, it appeared that the husband's conduct was such that reasonable minds could draw no other conclusion than that he had consented, actively or passively, to his wife's misconduct, the question of such connivance was one of law for the court.

2. SAME—DEFENSES—CONNIVANCE.

Connivance by a husband, sufficient to bar an action for criminal conversation, must be such conduct as when, subjected to the test of reasonable human transactions, shows an intention to connive, evidenced by his active or passive assent to transactions tending to convince an ordinarily prudent person of his wife's offense.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In an action for criminal conversation, evidence held to establish the husband's connivance or implied consent to the wife's misconduct as matter of law.

4. EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS.

In an action for criminal conversation, a confession made by the wife, who was not a party to the action, purporting to be a recital of past events, made in the absence of both plaintiff and defendant, was not binding on either.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Frederick County; John C. Motter and James B. Henderson, Judges.

Action by Harvey T. Kohlhooss against Walter W. Mobley. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, and SCHMUCKER, JJ.

George A. Pearre and Maurice H. Talbott, for appellant. Hammond Urner and Edward C. Peter, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. The appellant, Kohlhooss, sued the appellee, Mobley, in the circuit court for Montgomery county for criminal conversation with the former's wife. Mobley pleaded non cul., and after joinder of issue the case was moved on Kohlhooss' affidavit to the circuit court for Frederick county, where it was tried. On the trial of the case the defendant, at the close of the testimony for the plaintiff, offered a prayer asking the court to instruct the jury that there was no legally sufficient evidence from which they could find for the plaintiff, and that therefore their verdict must be for the defendant. The court granted the prayer, and a verdict was rendered for the defendant and a judgment entered thereon from which the plaintiff appealed.

There was evidence on behalf of the plaintiff legally sufficient to support a verdict in his favor, if it had not also appeared in the opinion of the circuit court, from the uncontradicted evidence, that the plaintiff had debarred himself from asserting a right of recovery by his own connivance at the intercourse complained of between his wife and the defendant. The counsel for the appellant did not in the argument controvert the proposition that connivance on the part of a husband, when properly established, bars an action for crim. con., as it does a suit for a divorce, but they insisted that connivance is always a question of fact, to be determined exclusively by the jury, and that the court below erred in refusing to permit the jury to pass upon the evidence as to its existence in the present case. The question whether the plaintiff in an action like this connived at the misconduct of his wife is primarily one of fact for the jury. It may even be said that, as the essence of connivance is consent which, like malice or good faith, constitutes an unseen motive of human conduct, it is especially a question for the jury. But the connivance is not proven as an independent fact. It is usually established as a conclusion from a line of conduct pursued by the husband in relation to his wife's intercourse with and relations to the alleged paramour. If, therefore, the conduct of the husband as established by undisputed evidence or admitted in his own testimony is such that a rational mind could draw no other conclusion therefrom than that he had consented actively or passively to the conduct on the part of his wife and the defendant of which he complains, the question would become one of law for the court, which in that event would not only be justified in taking the case from the jury, but it would become its duty to do so.

The authorities are in substantial accord as to the character and degree of connivance requisite to bar an action of crim. con. The conduct of the husband must be such, when subjected to the test of reasonable human transactions, as to show an intention to connive; and here, as elsewhere, the presumption of the law is in favor of honesty and correctness of purpose, but the husband, like other persons, is chargeable with an intention to produce the necessary and legitimate consequences of his own deliberate action. A passive connivance has been held to be as effectual as an active one to bar the action. Lord Stowell, in Morson v. Morson, 3 Hagg. 87, said: "The first general and simple rule is if a man sees what a reasonable man could not see without alarm, if he sees what a reasonable man could not permit, he must be supposed to see and mean the consequences."

* * * The presumption of the law is against connivance, and, if the facts can be accounted for without supposition of an intention [to connive], the courts will incline to that construction. * * * However, though to bar the husband there must be intention on his part, I have no difficulty in saying that mere passive connivance is as much a bar as active conspiracy." In Dennis v. Dennis, 68 Conn. 194, 38 Atl. 36, 34 L. R. A. 449, 57 Am. St. Rep. 95, it is said: "Connivance may be the passive permitting of the adultery or other misconduct, as well as the active procuring of the commission. If the mind consents, there is connivance." Both of the foregoing cases were cited and relied on by us in Barclay v. Barclay, 98 Md. 371, 56 Atl. 806, where we said: "Connivance is said to be the consent or indifference of the complainant to the misconduct complained of as a cause of divorce. The defense is in the nature of an estoppel, and is generally set up as a defense to adultery only, although the principle may be applicable to other causes for divorce." It has been held that a husband who has not directly or indirectly put opportunities of committing adultery in the way of his wife will not be guilty of connivance for merely allowing her to utilize an opportunity for committing adultery which she has arranged without his knowledge or participation. And he may do this for the purpose of obtaining evidence against her, but he must not make opportunities for her or smooth her path to the adulterous bed. Wilson v. Wilson, 154 Mass. 194, 28 N. E. 167, 12 L. R. A. 524, 26 Am. St. Rep. 237; Morrison v. Morrison, 142 Mass. 361, 8 N. E. 59, 56 Am. Rep. 688; Robbins v. Robbins, 140 Mass. 528, 5 N. E. 837, 54 Am. Rep. 488.

Let us now examine the facts of the present case in the light of the principles which we have stated. The following facts appear from the uncontradicted evidence on behalf of plaintiff contained in the record: In January, 1895, he was married; his wife being then about 20 years of age. About 1899, suspecting her of infidelity with a man other than the defendant, he followed her to Washington, and, finding her at the same theater with the man, upbraided her, and told her she could go home or where she pleased. She returned to her father's house, and remained there for several months, when her husband, having concluded that her relations to the man had not been criminal, received her back to his house and their marital relations were fully restored. In February, 1900, Kohlloss, with his wife, took up his residence at the village of Derwood, in Montgomery county, and opened a small grocery store in the building in which he resided. He also conducted a huckstering business, and was frequently absent from the store driving his huckster's wagon. His wife assisted him in conducting the store, generally occupying a position at the desk, standing near the rear end of the storeroom. Mobley, the appellee, who resided at the distance of only one-eighth of a mile from the store, began to deal with it when it was first opened, and soon became one of its best customers. His visits to the store increased in frequency to such an extent that for a year or more prior to September, 1903, he spent according to Kohlloss' own testimony "three-fourths of his time" there. Kohlloss, when asked how Mobley occupied his time when at the store, replied: "He generally sat near the desk. My wife was at the desk. He paid attention to my wife." About the 1st of September, 1903, Kohlloss observed certain conduct of his wife and Mobley which he says for the first time aroused the suspicion in his mind that illicit relations existed between them, and caused him to watch their movements more closely. On two separate evenings thereafter he saw his wife leave the store about nightfall and go in the direction of a neighboring graveyard and remain for about an hour. Mobley followed her each time after an interval of three or four minutes and did not return to the store. On another day, when he heard his wife and Mobley whispering to each other in the store for four or five minutes, he managed to get near enough to them to overhear part of their conversation, which he describes as follows: "He [Mobley] was after her why she did not come out that night. She gave him some excuse that she went out and fell into the hands of some girls and she could not meet him." Early one morning about the middle of September, while Kohlloss and his wife were still in bed, they heard a rattling at the store door below them. He got up to see who it was, and saw that it was Mobley, and so informed his wife, and then started to dress in order to go down and open the door; but his wife urged him to return to bed and volunteered to go down for him, saying that it was not Mobley at the store door. Kohlloss returned to bed for a few minutes, until his wife had had time to get downstairs, and then got up and followed her down, where he found that she and Mobley were in the rear part of the store with the doors closed, and from scuffling which he heard in there he suspected that they were having carnal intercourse with each other. He neither interrupted them nor made any outcry, but went upstairs and fruitlessly endeavored to induce his brother, who was a visitor at his house, to go down and enter the store with him, as he said he was afraid of Mobley. That interview between Mrs. Kohlhooss and Mobley in the store was permitted to continue 15 or 20 minutes without interruption, until Mobley voluntarily went away, having in the meantime made a purchase from the store. Kohlhooss neither during nor after these occurrences made any protest or objection to his wife in reference to her conduct with Mobley or her supposed relations to him, but he went to Washington and employed Bradley's Detective Agency to send two men up to Derwood to find some evidence of his wife's infidelity. After remaining a day, the men told him it was impossible to accomplish anything by detectives around Derwood, whereupon he sent them back to Washington, and told them not to go any further until they heard from him.

During the early part of September Kohlhooss had several times, while in the store, seen notes secretly passed to his wife from Mobley, and had seen her after reading them tear them up and throw them away. Kohlhooss afterwards collected the fragments of the notes and put them together and found their contents to be ambiguous, but not necessarily incriminating. On the 23d of September, however, Kohlhooss recovered the fragments of a note which he had seen Mobley secretly pass to Mrs. Kohlhooss in the store, which, when put together, read as follows: "I am thinking of going to the city on the milk train in the morning. Will it suit you to go? If so, go on the electric cars and I will see you at the same time and place as the other time. Of course, if it will not suit, say yes, so I will know what to do." On the same day, after Kohlhooss had gotten possession of this note, his wife proposed to him that, as he was not feeling very well, she would go to Washington in his stead on the next day to make purchases for the store. He, instead of forbidding her to go or warning her of the dangers of the course she was pursuing, consented that she should go. Having thus not only consented to, but assisted in perfecting, the assignation between his wife and Mobley, he at once notified Bradley, the Washington detective, of the finding of the note and of his wife's intended visit to Washington on the next day, and asked him to put his men on the lookout for her. On the next morning Kohlhooss took his wife to the train as she started for Washington to keep her assignation, purchased a ticket for her, and kissed her good-by, and then he went promptly by another road to Washington to await developments. Without pursuing the details of the evidence on this subject, it is sufficient to say that Mobley went to Washington on the same train as Mrs. Kohlhooss, and they were followed by the detective to a house known as the "Cosmopolitan Hotel," where they remained together for some time in a private room. The plaintiff further offered in evidence a paper purporting to contain a written confession by his wife of having committed adultery with Mobley during their interview at the hotel and on previous occasions, not specified, at Derwood, and he offered to also prove by competent testimony that she had signed the alleged confession at the office of her husband's attorney two or three hours after the interview with Mobley at the hotel, but the court sustained the objection of the defendant to the admission of the alleged confession and the offered testimony.

The facts which we have mentioned, all proven by uncontradicted evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, and almost all of them by his own testimony, cannot fail to prove to any reasonable mind such a course on the part of the plaintiff, both before and after the time at which he states that his suspicions as to his wife's chastity were aroused, of indifference to and acquiescence in the habitual conduct and attitude of his wife and Mobley toward each other, as not only deprived her of his marital protection, but afforded to their incipient amour full opportunity to develop and mature into her complete dishonor. This line of conduct on the part of the plaintiff, who was not a stranger to his wife's weakness for other men, in reference to her liaison with Mobley, which was largely conducted under his own eyes, amounted in our opinion to such connivance as to effectually debar his right of recovery in this case. We therefore hold that the circuit court committed no error in withdrawing the case from the jury.

The view which we have taken of the effect of the plaintiff's own conduct upon his right to recover in this case makes it unnecessary for us to notice the ruling of the circuit court upon the admissibility in evidence of the alleged confession of the wife further than to say that we find no error in that ruling. The alleged confession purports to be a recital of past events made by one not a party to the case, out of the presence of both plaintiff and defendant, and having no authority to bind either of them. The judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

PRIMROSE et al. v. WRIGHT.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. MORTGAGES — SALE — ERROR IN ORDER OF RATIFICATION OF SALE — EFFECT.

A proceeding for the sale of mortgaged premises was instituted in the circuit court of Q. county. The report of sale was entitled, "In the Circuit Court for Q. County," and was addressed, "To the Honorable Judges of Said Court." The order of ratification of sale ratified "the sale * * * within reported," but erroneously recited that it was passed by the circuit court of K. county. It was filed with the other papers in the case in the circuit court of Q. county. K. and Q. counties were in the same judicial circuit. Held, that the error in the order was a clerical one, and did not affect its validity.

2. SAME—EQUITY—ERRORS IN ORDER—AMENDMENT.

Equity rules 51, 52, codified in Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 16, §§ 178, 179, providing that clerical mistakes in decrees may be corrected on petition before the enrollment of the decrees, and declaring that no rehearing shall be granted after the enrollment of the decree, do not take away from courts of equity their inherent power to correct mistakes in their own proceedings at any time, and a clerical error in an order ratifying a sale under a mortgage may be corrected on petition of the purchaser, even after the enrollment of the order.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Queen Anne's County, in Equity; James A. Pearce, Wm. R. Martin, and Edwin H. Brown, Judges.

Petition by Lucie S. Primrose and others against Margaret P. Wright, in which defendant filed a petition. From an order directing the correction of an order ratifying a sale of mortgaged property and overruling exceptions to the ratification, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and FOWLER, BRISCOE, BOYD, SCHMUCKER and JONES, JJ.

Edwin H. Brown, Jr., and John D. Urie, for appellants. Phil. B. Hopper, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court for Queen Anne's county in equity, directing the correction of a clerical error in an order of ratification of a sale of mortgaged property, and overruling exceptions filed to such ratification. The mortgage in question was made on August 1, 1885, by Thomas Q. Primrose and wife to Elizabeth Curry upon a farm in Queen Anne's county. It contained a power of sale in the usual form authorizing Thomas Hill, as the mortgagee's attorney, to sell the farm at public sale in case of default in any of the conditions of the mortgage. Default having occurred under the mortgage, Hill, the attorney therein named, instituted the present proceeding on March 20, 1896, by filing his bond in the circuit court for Queen Anne's county, as required by law, and also a certified copy of the mortgage, and proceeded to sell the farm. He first sold it, after an appropriate advertisement, at public sale for $1,470 to one James A. O. Tucker, who failed to comply with the terms of sale, whereupon he resold it at private sale for $1,550 to Mrs. Margaret P. Wright, and reported the sale to the said circuit court. The usual order of ratification nisi of the sale was passed on April 17, 1896, and was published as required by law. No exceptions to the sale having been filed, it was finally ratified on July 23, 1896, by an order signed by Judge Jos. A. Wickes. This order is in the usual form and is written upon the sheet of paper containing the order nisi, which is attached to the report of sale, and it in terms refers to "the preceding order nisi" and the notice given thereunder and the absence of exceptions, and then finally ratifies "the sale of real estate within reported." Although this order was filed with the other papers in this case in the circuit court for Queen Anne's county, it erroneously states on its face that it was passed by the circuit court for Kent county. Both Kent and Queen Anne's counties are in the Second judicial circuit of the state, and Judge Jos. A. Wickes was at the time of signing the order an associate judge of that circuit. The purchaser paid for the farm, and the purchase money was distributed by an auditor's account which was finally ratified on January 30, 1897. On March 3, 1905, almost 10 years after the final ratification of the sale, the appellants, who are the children of the mortgagor, Thomas Q. Primrose, filed in the case exceptions to the ratification of the sale, relying among other things upon the contention that the error already mentioned by us appearing on the face of the order finally ratifying the sale rendered that order void and of no effect, and that there had therefore never been any ratification of the sale. On March 11, 1905, Margaret P. Wright, the purchaser of the farm at the mortgage sale, filed a petition in the case, alleging that she had only a few days prior thereto discovered the misnomer of the court in the order of final ratification of the sale to her, and asserting that it was a mere clerical error, and praying for its correction. The circuit court, having heard together the appellants' exceptions and the petition for the correction of the error in the order of ratification, was of the opinion that the misnomer of the court in the order referred to was a mere clerical error and directed it to be corrected in their presence, and at the same time overruled and dismissed the exceptions as having been filed too late. From that order the present appeal was taken.

The learned judges below, in our opinion, correctly disposed of the case. The misnomer of the court in the order of final ratification was obviously a mere clerical misprision which, under the circumstances in which it occurred, did not affect the integrity of the record or impair the validity of the order. All of the other papers in the proceeding showed distinctly that it had been conducted in the circuit court for Queen Anne's county. The report of sale was correctly entitled "In the Circuit Court for Queen Anne's County" and was addressed "To the Honorable Judges of said Court." After the filing of the report the properly entitled order of ratification nisi was indorsed thereon, and below it, upon the same sheet of paper, was written the final order in question which upon its face refers to both the order nisi and report of sale and professes to finally ratify the sale to which they refer. This court has already been called upon to consider the effect of a somewhat similar misnomer inadvertently occurring in the course of legal proceedings. In Davis v. State, 39 Md. 355, a party was indicted for murder in the circuit court for Carroll county, and moved his case to Washington county, where it was tried. The transcript of the record sent from the former to the latter county stated by mistake that the grand jurors who found the presentment were "good and lawful men of Baltimore county." All of the other proceedings in the case prior and subsequent were recorded as of Carroll county. After the traverser had been tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hung, his counsel filed a petition praying that the case might be removed as upon writ of error to this court, assigning as one of his grounds the defect in the record in setting forth that the grand jurors were of Baltimore, instead of Carroll, county. This court held that the error was a mere clerical misprision which did not affect the validity of the proceedings or the verity of the record. Furthermore, in the present case the circuit court had the inherent power as a court of equity to correct the mistake upon the petition of the appellee, even after the enrollment of the decree. The general rule undoubtedly is that, after the enrollment of a decree in chancery, in the absence of fraud, surprise, or irregularity in its procurement, a substantial error in it will not be corrected or a rehearing of the case granted upon a mere petition such as was filed by the appellants in this case; a bill of review or an original bill for fraud being the appropriate form of proceeding in such cases. Pfeltz v. Pfeltz, 1 Md. Ch. 455; Burch v. Scott, 1 Gill & J. 393; Tomlinson v. McKaig, 5 Gill, 279; Thruston v. Devecmon, 30 Md. 217; Krone v. Linville, 31 Md. 146; Pfeaff v. Jones, 50 Md. 269; Rice v. Donald, 97 Md. 396, 55 Atl. 620; equity rules 51 and 52, codified as sections 178 and 179 of article 16 of the Code of Public General Laws. It has, however, been several times held by this court, following the settled practice in that respect, that a court of equity has power, upon mere petition or motion, to correct a manifest clerical error in a decree, even after its enrollment. In Lovejoy v. Ireland, 19 Md. 56, which was affirmed in Williams v. Banks, 19 Md. 523, this court, having decided that an appeal which is reported in 17 Md. 525, should be dismissed, passed a decree for that purpose at the June term, 1860. At the June term, 1862, the appellee's solicitor, having just prior thereto discovered that the decree passed in 1860 on its face dismissed the bill, instead of dismissing the appeal, made a motion to have the error corrected. The court, after stating in its opinion the practice in such cases and the authority for it, granted the motion and directed the clerk to bring the original decree and the enrollment thereof and correct it in their presence.

It was contended in argument by the appellant that the fifty-first and fifty-second equity rules, which were adopted since the decision of Lovejoy v. Ireland, prohibit granting a rehearing of a case or correcting an error in a decree upon petition filed after the enrollment of the decree; but we have not construed those rules as intended to take away from courts of equity their inherent power to correct mistakes in their own proceedings at any time in the exercise of a sound discretion. In Straus v. Rost, 67 Md. 479, 10 Atl. 74, which was decided in 1887 long after the adoption of the rules in question, there was an application by petition to correct an error in an order of final ratification of an auditor's account which had been passed several years before the filing of the petition. This court affirmed an order granting the application, saying in its opinion, through the late Judge Miller: "The general rule of practice that a decree or decretal order after enrollment can be revised or annulled only by a bill of review or by an original bill for fraud is well settled. Thruston v. Devecmon, 30 Md. 210; Downes v. Friel, 57 Md. 531; United Lines Tel. Co. v. Stevens, 67 Md. 156, 8 Atl. 908. But there are certain well-defined exceptions to this general rule, which are equally well established, where the procedure may be by petition. These are in cases not heard on their merits and in which it is alleged that the decree was entered by mistake or surprise or under such circumstances as shall satisfy the court in the exercise of a sound discretion that the enrollment ought to be discharged and the decree set aside. Herbert v. Rowles, 30 Md. 278; Bank v. Eccleston, 48 Md. 155; Pfeaff v. Jones, 50 Md. 204; Gechter v. Gechter, 51 Md. 187; Patterson v. Preston, 51 Md. 190; Downes v. Friel, 57 Md. 533."

The circuit court had in our opinion authority to pass the order appealed from upon the petition of the appellee, and we will affirm it.

Order appealed from affirmed, with costs.

STODDARD v. CROCKER.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 16, 1906.)

1. WAREHOUSEMAN—LIEN FOR STORAGE—SALE TO ENFORCE SAME—STATUTES.

April 10, 1902, the plaintiff deposited with the defendant, a public warehouseman, a quantity of household goods. Storage being unpaid, the defendant on May 28, 1904, filed his petition in the municipal court of Portland for process of sale, under the provisions of chapter 91, §§ 48-56, Rev. St. 1883, which are the same provisions contained in chapter 93, §§ 67-75, Rev. St. 1903. The defendant obtained the order and sold the goods.

2. SAME.

Chapter 304 of the laws of 1897, re-enacted in Revision 1903, c. 33, § 10, added a new section to chapter 31, Rev. St. 1883, relating to warehousemen, by which a public warehouseman, having goods in store for one year after the expiration of the time for which the charges had been paid, was authorized to sell the goods subject to the conditions named therein.

3. SAME—VALIDITY.

Held, that this provision is the exclusive and only one under which the goods could have been legally sold, and that the proceedings under the statute (Rev. St. 1883, c. 91, §§ 48-56) were unauthorized and the sale illegal.

(Official.)

Report from Superior Court, Cumberland County, at Law.

Action by Mary Stoddard against Charles H. Crocker. Case reported, and judgment for plaintiff.

Trover for the conversion of a quantity of household goods deposited with the defendant for storage. The storage being unpaid, the defendant, by virtue of process issued by the municipal court of Portland, sold these goods for the purpose of enforcing his storage lien thereon as a warehouseman. After the evidence was closed the parties agreed that the case should be reported to the law court for determination, with the stipulation that, "If decision is for the plaintiff, damages to be assessed at $100."

Argued before EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, SAVAGE, POWERS, and PEABODY, JJ.

Dennis A. Meaher, for plaintiff. George H. Allan, for defendant.

STROUT, J. Defendant on April 10, 1902, was a public warehouseman, as defined by Rev. St. 1883, c. 31, § 8. On that day John P. Stoddard, husband of plaintiff, deposited with defendant a quantity of household goods for storage. They were deposited in the husband's name, with the consent of plaintiff; but defendant had no knowledge that plaintiff was the owner. Consequently defendant was justified in dealing with them as the property of John P. Stoddard. Plaintiff and her husband shortly thereafter left the state, and resided in Massachusetts awhile, and then went to St. Andrews, New Brunswick, and did not return to this state till the last week in September, 1904. No storage had been paid. Meantime the goods remained in defendant's warehouse until the 8th day of August, 1904, when they were sold under process issued from the municipal court of Portland, upon petition therefor by the defendant filed May 28, 1904. This proceeding for sale was taken under the provisions of chapter 91, sections 48 and 56, Rev. St. 1883, which are the same provisions as are contained in Rev. St. 1903, c. 93, §§ 67 and 75.

As warehouseman, defendant had a lien at common law upon the goods for storage; but, in the absence of a statute, he had no right to sell them, but only a right to hold them till the charges were paid. Jones on Liens, § 976; Mulliner v. Florence, 3 Q. B. Div. 489; Jones v. Pearle, 1 Strange, 556.

The statute as to warehousemen (chapter 31, Rev. St. 1883) made no provision for sale. But chapter 91 of the same Revision did provide for a sale in a variety of cases when the claimant had a lien, and that statute was broad enough to include a warehouseman's lien upon goods in storage.

Chapter 304 of the Laws of 1897, re-enacted in Revision 1903, c. 33, § 10, added a new section to chapter 31, Rev. St. 1883, by which a public warehouseman having goods in store for one year after the expiration of the time for which the charges had been paid was authorized to sell the goods, subject to the conditions named therein.

This provision applies only to the lien of a warehouseman. Other liens fall under the general statute. Chapter 91, Rev. St. 1883; chapter 93, Rev. St. 1903.

The question arises whether this special provision for this class of liens is a substitution for the general provision as to liens and is the exclusive remedy by way of sale, or whether it is merely cumulative, affording a double remedy at the option of the warehouseman.

Under the general statute the process may be commenced at any time, when anything is due for storage. Under this it cannot be commenced till after one year of unpaid charges.

Under the general statute, if the owner is a resident of the state, the petition may be filed and notice served 14 days before court, and, if owner is unknown, or not a resident of the state, the court may order "reasonable notice of at least fourteen days" by personal service, "or by publication in a newspaper or both as the court directs"; but it is not required that the newspaper shall be published in the city or town where the warehouse is, or even in the county. In the statute of 1897 the notice, where no address of the depositor has been given, must be given by publication, 30 days before the time of sale, in a newspaper published in the city or town where the warehouse is; if no such paper, then in one published in the county. The notice must contain a brief description of the property, with such marks thereon as may serve to identify it, if it had such marks, and give the name of the person depositing the articles and of the owner, if known, and specify the time after said 30 days and the place of sale, which must be in the city or town where the merchandise is. In that statute a demand by "registered letter directed to the person who shall have deposited such goods" was necessary, if the depositor's address had been left with the warehouseman, and the 30 days' notice was to be given after such demand; but, if the address had not been given, the demand was dispensed with. In this case Mr. Stoddard said he left his address with defendant's bookkeeper, but she emphatically denied it. No similar provision is contained in the general statute relating to liens.

It is said in United States v. Olafin, 97 U. S. 552, 24 L. Ed. 1082, 1085, that it is "necessary to the implication of a repeal [of a prior statute] that the objects of the two statutes are the same, in the absence of any repealing clause." Here the object of the statute of 1897 was to afford a right of sale of the warehoused goods for nonpayment of storage, but the rights of the depositor were much more carefully guarded than in the other general statute. Presumably knowing the existing statute, the Legislature deemed it wise to make this new provision applicable only to warehousemen, and must have intended that it should be the exclusive method of obtaining a sale of the goods. Otherwise there was no occasion for its passage. If the two remedies are to coexist, that provided for in the act of 1897 would probably never be used, as it requires more of the warehouseman than the general statute. It made the right of sale absolutely dependent upon the conditions named in the act, and so negated any right of sale in any other method. The two provisions are repugnant to each other.

The inference is irresistible that the Legislature intended to repeal the general and prior statute, so far as it applied to warehousemen, and substitute in its place the method prescribed in the act of 1897. Bassett v. Carleton, 32 Me. 553, 54 Am. Dec. 605; Sudbury Meadows v. Middlesex Canal, 23 Pick. 47; Starbird v. Brown, 84 Me. 240, 24 Atl. 824.

It follows that the proceedings in the municipal court to obtain an order of sale were unauthorized, and do not conclude the plaintiff. The sale by defendant of the goods was a conversion, even if no demand had been made by the plaintiff, as there was.

The plaintiff, as owner, may maintain the action, notwithstanding the deposit was made in her husband's name.

The parties have agreed that, if judgment is for plaintiff, the damages are to be assessed at $100.

Judgment for plaintiff for $100 and interest from the date of the writ.

PRATT et al. v. JOHNSON.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 14, 1905.)

SALES — ACTION FOR PRICE — DEFENSES — BREACH OF WARRANTY.

The defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiffs his two promissory notes for goods sold and delivered to him by the plaintiffs, and on the same date the plaintiffs gave the defendant a written warranty and guaranty in relation to the same goods. Held that, in an action on these notes by the plaintiffs, any breach of the warranty and guaranty by the plaintiffs to the detriment of the defendant can be shown in defense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Sales, § 1215.]

(Official.)

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Piscataquis County.

Action by Walter I. Pratt and others against William A. Johnson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant excepts. Exceptions sustained.

Assumpsit on two promissory notes, each of the amount of $22.13, each dated August 7, 1903, payable in two and four months from date, respectively, signed by defendant under name of Johnson & Co., and payable to plaintiffs.

The action was heard by the presiding justice, with the right of exception. Plea, the general issue.

On the 4th day of August, 1903, the plaintiffs, by their agent, F. T. Reed, entered into a contract of sale with the defendant, by which contract the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendant, under the name of Johnson & Co., agreed to buy certain toilet articles, amounting to $94.50, from which amount a freight allowance of $6 was made. This contract was signed in duplicate, and each party retained a copy.

The contract contained the terms of sale, certain exchange agreements, a memorandum of items of the goods sold, and the price.

There was also a written warranty on each package of the goods.

On the 7th day of August, 1903, the goods were shipped by the plaintiffs to the defendant, and these notes were given by the defendant, dated as August 7, 1903.

At the trial the defendant claimed that the agreement and warranty were a part of the consideration of the notes, and that the whole transaction constituted one contract, and that there had been a breach thereof by the plaintiffs, and that the defendant was not liable on the notes and should be allowed to set up this breach in defense of this action.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that there was no breach, and that said notes and agreement were independent and collateral, and that said agreement could not be construed with said notes as a part of one and the same transaction, as claimed by the defendant, and the breach of said agreement and warranty could not be set up in defense.

The presiding justice held that said agreement and warranty were independent and collateral to said notes, and could not be construed with said notes as a part of one and the same transaction, and upon that ground gave judgment for the plaintiffs. Thereupon the defendant excepted.

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, SAVAGE, and PEABODY, JJ.

George W. Howe, for plaintiffs. M. L. Durgin, Hudson & Hudson, and Wm. A. Johnson, for defendant.

STROUT, J. August 4, 1903, plaintiffs and defendant made a written contract by which plaintiffs were to sell and defendant to purchase certain toilet articles at specified prices. August 7, 1903, the goods were shipped by plaintiffs, and the notes in suit bearing the same date were given by defendant to plaintiffs for the purchase price. On the same date plaintiffs gave defendant a written guaranty and warranty in relation to the same goods. At the trial defendant claimed a breach of the guaranty and warranty, and proposed to show it in defense, but the court ruled that the guaranty and warranty were independent and collateral to the notes and could not be construed with the notes, and upon that ground gave judgment for the plaintiffs. Defendant excepted to this ruling.

The exceptions must be sustained. The warranty and guaranty related to the goods for which the notes were given, bore the same date as the notes, and must be regarded as in part consideration for the notes. Any breach thereof by the plaintiffs to the detriment of the defendant may be shown in defense to a suit upon the notes by the original payee. This is not a case of an independent warranty as to another and different transaction, but relates to the particular goods for which the notes were given. The defendant had the option to sue upon the warranty, or, to avoid circuity of action, to set up a breach thereof in defense to this suit. He elected the latter course, and should have been allowed to make the defense. Such is the settled rule in this state. Herbert v. Ford, 29 Me. 546; Morse v. Moore, 83 Me. 473, 22 Atl. 362, 13 L. R. A. 224, 23 Am. St. Rep. 783; American Gas & Ventilating Machine Co. v. Wood, 90 Me. 516, 38 Atl. 543, 43 L. R. A. 449; Hathorn v. Wheelwright, 99 Me. 351, 59 Atl. 517.

Exceptions sustained.

CUMBERLAND & W. ELECTRIC RY. CO.
v. THOMPSON.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 23, 1905.)
CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—STREET
RAILROADS — NEGLIGENCE — PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Plaintiff was injured by coming in contact with a pole located near the side of a street car on which he was riding. When the car started plaintiff was on the step of the rear platform facing the car, with his hands on the bars and his bucket on his left arm, with his hand through the bail, pushing against his brother, who was on the platform. The pole was located 136 feet from where the car stopped to permit plaintiff to board the same, and while the car was running this distance plaintiff was precluded from getting further up onto the platform by other passengers who preceded him. Held, that defendant's alleged failure to afford plaintiff a reasonable opportunity to get in a place of safety on the car before starting it was not the proximate cause of his injury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Allegany County; Robert R. Henderson, Judge.

Action by Harry Thompson, by Catherine Thompson, his next friend, against the Cumberland & Westernport Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and FOWLER, BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEAROE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

Benjamin A. Richmond, for appellant. Arch. A. Young, for appellee.

JONES, J. The appellant in this case is a corporation owning and operating an electric railroad between the towns of Lonaconing and Frostburg, in Allegany county, this state, and was sued by the appellee in the court below for damages for injuries sustained by the latter as the result of an accident which occurred while the appellee was a passenger on one of the cars of the appellant corporation. The narr in the case alleges that about the 1st day of December, 1904, the appellee, "together with several other persons, was waiting to board one of the cars of the" appellant "at a point near Ocean Mines, * * * and that, when said car arrived at said point, it was stopped by the motorman, an agent" of the appellant, "for the purpose of allowing" the appellee "and the other persons there to board said car; that the motorman on said car motioned" the appellee "to cross over the track and board said car on the opposite side from which he had been standing waiting; that a number of passengers were entering said car; and that" the appellee, "while using due care and caution, and without any negligence on his part, was getting on said car, and while he was in the act of going up the steps of said car, and before he had succeeded in entering said car, the agents and servants of the" appellant, "then and there running and operating said car, negligently and wrongfully started said car before" the appellee "had reached a safe position on said car, by reason of which said negligence, and improper starting of said car by said agents and servants the" appellee "was caught between the said car and a pole which was standing dangerously near to and alongside of the track of" the appellant, and the appellee "was violently and with great force squeezed between said car and pole and thrown to the ground, by reason of which" he sustained serious injuries which the narr describes. The issues to be tried in the case were presented by the plea of not guilty. At the trial the plaintiff (appellee here), upon the conclusion of the testimony, offered six prayers, the first and sixth of which were modified by the court and granted; the second was rejected; the third conceded; the fourth abandoned; and the fifth was granted as presented. The defendant (appellant here) offered eight prayers, the first, second, third, and fourth of which were rejected, and the others granted. The result of this action of the trial court upon the prayers was a verdict and judgment against the appellant. The questions arising upon this appeal are presented by the appellant's exception to such action.

The main contention here has been as to the propriety of the rejection of the appellant's first, second, third, and fourth prayers, the granting of any of which would have defeated a recovery by the appellee. The first of these affirmed that the plaintiff had "offered no evidence in this case legally sufficient to entitle him to recover." The others denied the right of the plaintiff to recover, because his own negligence had produced, or concurred with that of the defendant so as to directly contribute to producing, the accident which caused his injuries. A statement of the evidence, as brief as may be, upon which the parties based their respective prayers will be necessary. That, as disclosed by the record, shows that the appellee is a young man about 19 years of age and by occupation a miner. In going to and from his work he used the railroad of the appellant. On the day of the accident by which he was injured, he, in company with his brother and a boy by the name of McLuckie, both younger than himself, started for his home from his place of employment and went to the railroad to board a car. With his brother and McLuckie he waited for a car, and as one approached the conductor or motor-man motioned to them to cross to the opposite side from which they were standing. The three accordingly crossed the track in front of the approaching car, which, in the meantime, continuing to move on, they found themselves, when it stopped, near to the rear platform, and they boarded the car at that end. The car could be boarded from either end and from either side. At the same time that they started to board the car a man, a woman, and a girl, who had also been waiting for the car, were getting onto the same by way of the rear platform, but from the opposite side. In starting to board the car McLuckie, of the three boys, was ahead and got upon the platform. The appellee's brother followed next, and also reached the platform just in the doorway leading thereto. These two halted there and did not press on to get inside of the car, as they testified, in order to give the persons getting on from the opposite side opportunity to pass into the car ahead. The appellee, following after his brother, got upon the steps leading up to the platform—he could not make it clear whether it was the first or second step, nor whether there was another step before reaching the platform besides the one upon which he was standing—and while he was standing upon the steps the car was started. It proceeded 136 feet, when the appellee came into collision with a pole erected near the railway track and was injured. It appears from appellee's testimony that at the time he and his companions got to their respective positions upon the platform and steps of the car the woman and girl had passed into the car and the man with them was going in the door from the platform. An Italian was upon the platform at or near the doorway leading from the platform into the car. The appellee's witnesses also testified the car was stopped about a half a minute; and that when it "came to this pole it could not have been going full force."

We will not stop to discuss the question whether or not it appears that the appellee was afforded reasonable opportunity to get in safety upon the car before it was started, as has been mentioned, nor to refer further to evidence bearing upon it to determine whether or not there was evidence of negligence in that regard. The starting of the car without affording this reasonable opportunity is the only negligence that is alleged or attempted to be shown or is suggested as being the cause of the accident to the appellee. In Benedick v. Potts, 88 Md. 52-54, 40 Atl. 1067, 41 L. R. A. 478, this court, through the present chief justice said: "It is a perfectly well-settled principle that to entitle a plaintiff to recover in an action of this kind he must show not only that he has sustained an injury, but that the defendant has been guilty of some negligence which produced that particular injury. The negligence alleged and the injury sued for must bear the relation of cause and effect. The concurrence of both and nexus between them must exist to constitute a cause of action." With the principle here referred to in view, the present inquiry may be resolved into this, if the appellant's servants started the car upon the occasion here in question before the appellee had a reasonable opportunity to reach a safer place thereon than the one he occupied at the time of such starting, and in so doing were negligent, was that the negligence that produced the accident which caused the appellee's injuries? It is clear that the evidence adduced by the appellee affords no direct proof that the accident in question resulted from such negligence, and it would seem to be equally clear that by no rational inference therefrom can such accident be attributed thereto. The appellee's proof shows that, by measurement, the pole that he collided with was, when the car was passing it, between seven and eight inches away from the side of the car. The only description given of the manner of the accident appears in the testimony of the appellee; and what he said was this, after having testified as to the boarding of the car by his brother and McLuckie: "Then they got on, I just reached up and was taking hold and that car was started, and I could not get in for my brother and the others in front of me. McLuckie was in front. I was waiting on the crowd to push in. I had a bucket on my left arm. The bucket struck first, my head next, and I don't remember anything more." Then upon cross-examination he said: "The pole hit my body. I was squeezed between the car." He was asked on cross-examination if there was "not plenty of chance, standing there on that step, to stand in so that you would not hit anything," and answered, "I was in far enough, but my bucket struck and dragged me back to the pole. My bucket struck the pole." It was not so testified in terms, but it appears from the evidence of the appellee, that when he got upon the step of the car he was facing towards the car, with his back to the side of the track upon which the pole stood, and with his right side towards or in the direction of the pole, with his bucket on his left arm. The evidence showed that he was struck by the pole on the back of the head to the left. As the doctor, who attended him, described it: "Posterior aspect, left-hand side." As to his situation when the car started the appellee testified: "Q. You got upon the step? A. Yes, sir. Q. You had a bucket in your hand? A. On my arm. Q. You had your hand through? A. Yes. Q. You were on the step? A. With one foot. I was trying to get to the next step above." He further said on cross-examination that he had his "hands on the bars"; that he was pushing against his brother trying to get in the car. When examined in chief he said: "I tried to get up on the car fully. When I had the hold I tried to push in. The bucket being on my left arm it pulled me back." It appears, then, from the appellee's own testimony that when the car started he was on the step of the rear platform of the car, facing towards the car, with his hands on the bars, his bucket on his left arm with his hand through, pushing against his brother who was upon the platform. By no possibility in that situation could either his body or his bucket have come in contact, as the car proceeded, with a pole over seven inches away from the side of the car. To bring him into collision with the pole something must have occurred to disturb or change the situation between the time the car started and the contact with the pole. There is in this proof, as has been said, no direct evidence that the position of the appellee, as he described it, was changed or affected by the starting of the car; and the testimony alluded to, unqualified as it is, affords no rational inference that the starting of the car changed his position from one of safety upon the step to one which would bring him into the collision that injured him. The evidence also shows there was no other act on the part of the servants of the appellant, as the car traversed the 136 feet to the place of the pole, that could have such effect. We think the appellant's first prayer should have been granted. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss any others that were the subject of the appellant's exception. Allusion has been made to the fact that one of the appellee's prayers had been conceded. This conceded prayer related only to the burden of proof upon the plaintiff, is not inconsistent with, and does not embarrass, the ruling here upon the first prayer of the appellant.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment below must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with costs to the appellant, without awarding a new trial.

PHILADELPHIA, B. & W. R. CO. v. ALLEN.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—DEGREE OF CARE REQUIRED BY CARRIER.

The degree of care a carrier owes to its passengers is the exercise of the utmost care which human foresight can exercise, though it is not an insurer of the safety of the passengers. [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1087-1106.]

2. SAME—BREACH OF CARRIER'S DUTY—CAUSE OF ACTION.

The breach of duty by a carrier to its passengers constitutes the cause of action for an injury to a passenger resulting therefrom, and the facts evidencing the breach are not the breach, but merely the facts which prove that a breach has occurred.

3. PLEADING—ALLEGATION OF FACTS—SUFFICIENCY.

A declaration which sets forth the facts constituting the cause of action, without detailing the circumstances constituting the evidence of them, is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 31.]

4. CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—DECLARATION.

A declaration, in an action against a carrier for injuries to a passenger, which alleges that the carrier "negligently and unskillfully conducted itself in carrying plaintiff and in managing the said railroad and the car, and train in which plaintiff was a passenger," and that he was thereby injured, sufficiently specifies the particulars of the carrier's negligence, at common law and under Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 75, § 24, subsec. 36, giving a form for a declaration in an action for injuries received by a passenger, and declaring that the same may be changed to adapt it to other cases by "changing the allegation as to the cause of the accident."

Appeal from Circuit Court, Talbot County: James A. Pearce and Wm. R. Martin, Judges.

Action by Robert J. Allen against the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the declaration in the action:

"State of Maryland, Cecil County—to wit:

Robert J. Allen, by his attorney, Albert Constable, sues the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Company, for that the defendant is a corporation possessing and operating a railroad from between Bridgeville and Seaford, and was a carrier of passengers from said Bridgeville to said Seaford for reward to the defendant; and the plaintiff became and was received by the defendant as a passenger, to be by it safely and securely carried upon said railroad on a journey from said Bridgeville to said Seaford, for reward to the defendant. Yet the defendant did not safely and securely carry the plaintiff upon said railroad on said journey, and so negligently and unskillfully conducted itself in carrying the plaintiff upon said railroad on said journey, and in managing the said railroad and the car and train in which the plaintiff was a passenger upon the said railroad on the said journey as aforesaid, that the plaintiff, while in the exercise of due care upon his part, was thereby thrown down and wounded and injured, and incurred loss of time and expense in and about the care of his wounds and injuries. And the plaintiff claims twenty thousand dollars. Albert Constable, Plaintiff's Attorney."

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and FOWLER, BRISCOE, BOYD, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

L. Marshall Haines, for appellant. Albert Constable, Jr., for appellee.

McSHERRY, C. J. The only question which is before the court for decision on this record arises on the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's third plea. The plea is undoubtedly bad and the demurrer to it was properly sustained; but the contention of the defendant, the appellant here, is that as the demurrer mounted up to the first error in the pleadings, and as the declaration is insufficient, because indefinite and vague, the trial court should have looked back to the declaration and should have held it bad, instead of striking down the third plea. So the ultimate and single inquiry presented is this: Is the declaration sufficient in law?

The declaration is brief, and will be found set forth above. The suit is between a passenger and a carrier to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by the former in consequence of the alleged negligence of the latter whilst transporting the plaintiff over its railroad. The objection to the declaration is that it fails to specify the particulars wherein the negligence of the railroad company consisted, and was therefore too uncertain to apprise the defendant of the precise act of negligence upon which the plaintiff relied to sustain a recovery. This objection is more of an academic than a practical one in this case; because, had the declaration been so vague as not to inform the defendant of the facts constituting the cause of action, the defendant would have surely demurred directly to it, instead of interposing several pleas, and would not have gone into a trial lasting five days before a jury on the issues of fact joined on those pleas, and would not have delayed until reaching this court before questioning the sufficiency of the narr, on the ground of the insufficiency of its averments. It seems a little singular that the company, after contesting a case on its merits through all of its stages, and until the rendition of the verdict against it and the entry of the judgment thereon, should fail to discover until the trial had ended and the record was in this court what neglect of duty it was charged with. There is no pretense that by reason of the vagueness of the narr's allegations the company was deprived of an opportunity to present any defense it might have had; and it is not even suggested that, if a new trial were awarded and the narr were amended so as to set forth more specifically the cause of the injury, the railroad company would be any more definitely apprised of the facts relied on to sustain a recovery than it was when it filed its pleas, or that it would be, in consequence of such an amendment, better prepared to shape its defense. The question before us is, therefore, not a practical one; but, as it is raised, it must be disposed of.

As we have said, this is a case between a passenger and a carrier of passengers to recover damages for an injury sustained by the passenger in consequence of the negligence of the carrier during the period the above-named contractual relation existed between them. The degree of care required by such a carrier and the precise duty which it owes to such a passenger is clearly defined in the law. The carrier owes to the passenger the exercise of the utmost care and diligence which human foresight can use, though not an insurer of the safety of the passenger. Balto. City Pas. Ry. Co. v. Nugent, 86 Md. 349, 38 Atl. 779, 89 L. R. A. 161. A breach of that duty is negligence, and, if any injury results therefrom and is the consequence thereof, an action will lie at the suit of the person thus injured. It is the breach of the duty which is owed that constitutes the cause of action. The particular circumstances which evidence that breach are not the breach itself, but are merely the facts which prove that a breach of the duty that was owed had occurred. Now, in the structure of pleadings, even in their strictest forms, before the introduction of modern simplified systems, it was a most important principle of the law of pleading that although any particular fact might be the gist of a party's case, and though the statement of it was indispensable, still in alleging the fact it was unnecessary to state such circumstances as merely tended to prove the truth of the fact alleged. The dry allegation of the fact, without detailing a variety of minute circumstances which constituted the evidence of it, was sufficient. 1 Chitty's Pl. (8th Am. Ed.)

mar. page 225. And this doctrine obtains to-day when much of the verbiage and nearly all of the technical precision once required in pleadings have been dropped and abandoned. As only the facts constituting the cause of action need be stated, it is a cardinal rule that they must be averred or set forth with certainty, by which term is signified a clear and distinct statement of them, so that they may be understood by the party who is to answer them, by the jury who are to ascertain the truth of the allegations, and by the court who are to give judgment. 1 Chitty's Pl. (8th Am. Ed.) mar. page 233.

Let us now see whether the declaration we are dealing with complies with these requisites. It states that the plaintiff was a passenger between certain named points on the railroad of the defendant company; that the company undertook to carry the plaintiff safely and securely from one of those points to the other; that the company "so negligently and unskillfully conducted itself in carrying the plaintiff and in managing the said railroad and the car and train in which the plaintiff was a passenger * * * that the plaintiff * * * was thereby thrown down and wounded and injured," etc. Here, then, is a distinct statement of the duty owed by the carrier to the passenger, and a like averment of the breach of that duty in the negligent and unskillful management of the railroad, the car, and the train, whereby the plaintiff was thrown down and injured. The dry allegation of fact is that the company negligently managed its railroad and train and car; but the evidentiary facts proving or tending to prove that negligence are not set forth, and there was no occasion to aver them. The asserted negligence, and not the facts which proved the negligence, constituted the cause of action. Negligence may be made manifest by a variety of circumstances; but, whatever the evidentiary circumstances may be, the thing they prove, if they have probative value at all, is negligence, and negligence in respect of some designated act of commission or omission is the thing to be proved, and therefore the thing to be alleged in the pleading. In this instance it was alleged to be the negligence of the company in managing its railroad and the car and train in which the plaintiff was a passenger, and that this averment sufficiently apprised the defendant of the charge it was required to answer is apparent from the circumstances that it entered the plea of not guilty and proceeded to trial thereon, instead of challenging the declaration by a demurrer on the ground of vagueness and uncertainty. An averment that the cause of the injury was the negligence of the company in managing its railroad and the car and train in which the plaintiff was a passenger is a definite statement of the fact upon which the plaintiff relied to sustain a recovery, and did not need to be amplified by a recital of other facts, which, if established, merely proved that there had been negligence in the management of the railroad and train and car in which the plaintiff was a passenger.

But, apart from the foregoing considerations, there are precedents for the form of the declaration used in this case. In Bullen & Leake, Precedents of Pleading, 284, a very similar declaration will be found. The averments there made are that the carriers "so negligently and unskillfully conducted themselves in carrying the plaintiff upon said railway on the journey aforesaid, and in managing the said railway and the carriage and train in which the plaintiff was a passenger upon the said railway, * * * that the plaintiff was thereby wounded and injured," etc. That form is supported by, or at least a similar one was followed in, the case of Curtis v. Drinkwater, 2 B. & Ad. 169; and the case of Brien v. Bennett, 8 C. & P. 724. See, also, substantially the same form in 2 Chitty's Pl. (8th Am. Ed.) mar. page 650. In article 75, § 24, subsec. 36, Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, the form given for a case like this contains the averment that "by reason of the insufficiency of an axle of the car in which he was riding the plaintiff was hurt," and the same subsection declares: "This form may be varied so as to adapt it to many cases, by merely changing the allegation as to the cause of the accident." The declaration in the case at bar conforms to the requirements of the Code, since it distinctly alleges that "the cause of the accident" was the defendant's negligence "in managing its railroad, and the car and train in which the plaintiff was a passenger."

The court below committed no error in not declaring the declaration bad, and the judgment appealed against will be affirmed. It is accordingly so ordered.

GALLAGHER v. MARTIN.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. WILLS—LEGACIES—ADEMPTION.

Where testatrix, after bequeathing a legacy, during her lifetime paid the amount thereof to the legatee in full satisfaction of the legacy, the legacy was thereby adeemed.

2. EXECUTORS—ACCOUNTS—VACATION.

Where, notwithstanding the ademption of a legacy by payment to the legatee during the testatrix's lifetime, the register stated and passed an account ex parte for the executor in the orphans' court in such form as to show that the legacy was distributable to the legatee, it was the duty of such court, on the executor's application, to set aside the account after proof of such facts; and an order dismissing the petition, after answer in denial by the legatee, without hearing or submission on the pleadings, was error.

3. SAME—ORPHANS' COURT—JURISDICTION.

Under Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 93, § 234, providing that the probate court shall have full power to settle the accounts of executors and administrators, superintend the distribution of estates, and secure the rights of orphans and legatees, such court has power to hear and determine the question of the ademption of a legacy because of the alleged payment thereof by the testatrix in her lifetime.

Appeal from Orphans' Court, Allegany County; Millard F. Davis and Wm. A. Bra-shears, Judges.

Suit by Thomas E. Gallagher, as executor of the last will of Mary Navin, deceased, to set aside an account stated by him as executor and a distribution thereunder, in which Bridget Martin filed an answer. From an order dismissing the petition, the executor appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and FOWLER, BRISCOE, BOYD, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

Taylor & Morrison, for appellant. Wm. H. Cole and J. W. S. Cochrane, for appellee.

SCHMUCKER, J. This is an appeal from an order of the orphans' court of Allegany county passed in a proceeding founded on a petition filed by the appellant, Thomas E. Gallagher, as executor of the last will of Mary Navin, deceased. The substantial facts alleged in the petition are as follows: Mary Navin, after having made her will, by which she gave a legacy of $200 to the appellee, Bridget Martin, had, during her lifetime, on May 1, 1903, through the hands of the petitioner as her agent, paid to the said Bridget Martin $200 in cash in full satisfaction, extinguishment, and discharge of the legacy, and such payment was at that time understood by all parties to the transaction to have been made for that purpose. Shortly thereafter Mary Navin died, and her will was duly admitted to probate, and letters testamentary on her estate issued to the appellant. In July, 1904, the appellant went to the register of wills of Allegany county to have a testamentary account stated. He mentioned to the register the fact of the payment of the $200 to Bridget Martin during the lifetime of the testatrix, and the circumstances under which it was made. The register thereupon proceeded to state the account in such form as to show a distribution to be made by the appellant, as executor, to Bridget Martin, of the $200 legacy which had been paid to her in the lifetime of the testatrix in the manner already mentioned. The appellant, who is a clergyman and unfamiliar with the steps required by the law to be taken in such cases, supposed the account which had been thus stated for him by the register to be correct, and passed it ex parte in the orphans' court. After he had passed the account Bridget Martin sued him in the circuit court for Allegany county to recover the legacy of $200 as appearing to be due her from him as executor upon the face of the account. The prayer to the petition was that the account be set aside and a distribution of the personal estate of the testatrix in his hands be made, under the supervision of the orphans' court, on a day to be by it named after due notice to all parties interested, in conformity with the provisions of section 143 (now section 142) of article 93 of the Code of Public General Laws. On the filing of this petition, the orphans' court passed an order, as prayed for, setting aside the account theretofore passed, and appointing a day for the distribution of the estate under the court's direction. Bridget Martin then filed an answer to the appellant's petition, admitting the making of the legacy to her by the will of Mary Navin, but denying, somewhat evasively, the alleged payment to her of $200 in satisfaction thereof in the lifetime of the testatrix. The answer also admitted the institution of the suit in the circuit court against the appellant, as executor, for the recovery of the legacy. The orphans' court thereupon, without hearing any testimony upon the issue made by the petition and answer, and without the case having been submitted to it, so far as the record shows, by the parties upon the pleadings, passed another order, revoking its former order, by which the account had been set aside, and dismissing the executor's petition. From this last order the present appeal was taken.

It is clear that the order appealed from was improperly passed. If the allegations of the petition filed by the appellant as executor were true, they presented a plain case of the ademption of the legacy made to Bridget Martin, and it was error on the part of the orphans' court to permit the passing of the account by which the legacy was treated as distributable to her by the executor. Had those allegations been substantiated by competent testimony to the satisfaction of the orphans' court, it would have been its duty to set aside the account and direct the distribution of the estate, as it did by the previous order, passed on the executor's petition. The court, therefore, before passing any such order as the one appealed from, should have set the case for hearing, and afforded the appellant an opportunity to offer evidence in support of the allegations of his petition.

It was within the power of the orphans' court to entertain and determine the question of the ademption of this legacy in the manner set forth in the petition. In Pole v. Simmons, 45 Md. 249, we held that the orphans' court had power to determine, on a petition filed for that purpose, whether certain sums of money, paid by a testatrix during her lifetime to legatees who were directed by her will to be charged with interest on any advancements made by her to them, were intended to be advancements or absolute gifts; and that the court, having jurisdiction of the question, had the right to hear and receive evidence in relation to it. In that case we said, speaking of the power conferred on the orphans' court by section 230 (now section 234) of article 93 of the Code of Pub-the General Laws: "We think it clear the orphans' court had jurisdiction of the matter presented by the petition, for it would be impossible to superintend distribution of the estate without the authority to determine what was to be distributed, and this necessarily involves the questions as to what are assets, and where there is a will, and who are the legatees, and what is given them by the will." Similar views as to the extent of the powers of that court in reference to the accounts of executors and the distribution of estates of deceased persons have been expressed by us in Alexander v. Leakin, 72 Md. 202, 19 Atl. 532; Macgill v. Hyatt, 80 Md. 256, 30 Atl. 710; Hoffman v. Hoffman, 88 Md. 60, 40 Atl. 712.

The order appealed from must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Order reversed, with costs, and case remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

KENNEWEG v. ALLEGANY COUNTY COM'RS.

(Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LEGISLATIVE POWER—SCOPE.

The General Assembly, having all legislative power, except as limited by the federal and state Constitutions, has power to enact a primary election law, unless deprived thereof by the Constitution.

2. ELECTIONS—PRIMARY ELECTIONS—STATUTES—VALIDITY.

Const. art. 3, § 42, providing that the General Assembly shall pass laws for the preservation of the purity of elections, does not confer legislative power, but is a mandate to execute a power existing independently thereof, and does not deprive the Legislature of the power to pass a primary election law.

3. SAME.

Acts 1904, p. 870, c. 508, providing for the holding of primary elections in a certain county for the nomination of candidates for public office, is not, by reason of section 112 (page 875), requiring candidates for nomination to pay a fee to be used exclusively in defraying the expenses of holding the election, void because undertaking to add a property qualification for holding public office not contained in the Constitution; the imposition of the fee not being the imposition of a property qualification on the candidates.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—POWERS OF LEGISLATURE.

The law is not void, as contrary to public policy, because public policy, without having its foundation in the Constitution, cannot restrain the legislative authority of the General Assembly.

5. SAME—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS.

The law does not, by reason of section 105, which provides that the candidates nominated by the two political parties having the highest votes cast for the highest state office at the last general election shall be nominated by direct vote, and the party casting the highest number of votes shall hold its primary on the first Saturday of September, and the party casting the next highest number of votes shall hold its primary on the first day of registration prescribed by law, deny to one political party the equal protection of the law, in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, because a political party has no inherent right to insist that all parties shall hold their primaries on the same day, and both parties are treated alike.

6. ELECTIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

The law is not invalid by reason of section 111 (page 875), whereby the nomination of the candidates of the minority party may, by a dishonest administration of the law, be postponed until a day or two before election, and the candidates thereby excluded from the official ballot.

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS.

The General Assembly has the power to pass a law regulating the primaries of the numerically stronger parties only, and excluding from its provisions the smaller parties.

8. COUNTIES—EXPENSES—PRIMARY ELECTION—LEVY OF TAX BY COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

Acts 1904, p. 870, c. 508, § 105, requires the board of election supervisors to provide, for the primary elections provided for in the act, the voting booths, ballot boxes, stationery, etc., as used for general elections. Section 109, p. 872, declares that the ballot boxes used at the primaries shall be provided by the board of election supervisors and shall be delivered to the primary election board at the same time as the other paraphernalia provided for. Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 83, §§ 2, 5, provide that the necessary expenses incurred by the supervisors shall be paid by the county commissioners. Held, that the county commissioners must levy a tax to pay the indebtedness incurred by the supervisors in holding primaries.

9. EQUITY—JURISDICTION.

Under Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, art. 16, § 102, providing that courts of equity shall not give relief in any cause wherein the original debt does not amount to $20, a court of equity has no jurisdiction of a suit praying for an injunction to restrain the collection of a tax amounting to about 66 cents.

10. INJUNCTION—GROUNDS OF RELIEF—INJURY ALREADY SUSTAINED.

Equity will not grant an injunction to restrain the levy of a tax to defray the expenses incurred in holding a primary election, under Acts 1904, p. 870, c. 508, where, before the bill was filed, the levy had been made and probably most of the sum levied collected, and the primaries and the general election, at which the candidates selected at the primaries had been voted for, had been held.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Allegany County, in Equity; A. Hunter Boyd and Robert R. Henderson, Judges.

Suit by Christian F. Kenneweg against the county commissioners of Allegany county. From a decree dismissing the bill, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and BRISCOE, PAGE, PEARCE, SCHMUCKER, and JONES, JJ.

Irvine R. Dickey and W. C. Devecmon, for appellant. A. A. Doub and Benj. A. Richmond, for appellees.

McSHERRY, C. J. The bill of complaint which inaugurated this proceeding was filed by the appellant against the appellees on the equity side of the circuit court for Allegany county on the 28th day of April, 1905. It was demurred to. The demurrer was sustained. The bill was dismissed, and from that decretal order the pending appeal was taken. The appellant is a taxpayer in, and a resident of, Allegany county, and pays taxes on property owned by him and assessed to the value of $6,000. He complains that the appellees, the county commissioners, have levied upon the taxable property in said county the sum of $2,000, to be included in the general levy of said county for the year 1905-1906 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of holding primary elections during the month of September, 1905, for the nomination of state and county officers to be voted for at the general election to be held in November, following; that the levy of the above-named sum was made under a pretended authority supposed to be contained in chapter 508, p. 870, of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1904; that the act just indicated does not authorize the county commissioners to make the levy in question; and that the act is null, void, and unconstitutional. The bill prays that an injunction may be issued restraining the county commissioners "from levying or causing to be collected from the taxpayers of the county the said sum of $2,000, or any part thereof, for the illegal purpose aforesaid." The appellant does not sue in behalf of himself and other taxpayers who may be similarly situated, and who may come in and make themselves parties to the cause, but he sues alone, in his own name and his own behalf. Laying aside for the moment the question as to whether he has shown on the face of the bill such a pecuniary interest as is required to give a court of equity jurisdiction in the premises, we turn to the main and important inquiry involving the constitutionality of the statute. And in doing so we pass by, for the present, the subsidiary objection as to the lack of authority on the part of the commissioners to make the levy, because a few references later on to the provisions of the act and of the Code of Public General Laws will refute this objection completely.

Had the General Assembly the power to adopt the act of 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 870, c. 508)? In a word is the act in conflict with any provision of the state or the federal Constitutions? The act is an act amendatory of the Public Local Laws of Allegany county, and relates exclusively to the holding of primary elections in that county by the two leading political parties for the selection of candidates to be voted for at ensuing state and congressional elections. It places safeguards around, and gives legal sanction to, these primary contests. It prescribes how nominations are to be made by popular vote; how and upon what conditions candidates may enter those contests, and in what manner and at what times the votes cast thereat shall be counted, and how the results shall be ascertained and certified. Elaborate details—not always consistent or harmonious, perhaps—are prescribed with reference to the conduct of the primaries; and the duties imposed upon the county committees of the two political parties, as well as the duties assigned to the election supervisors, are set forth with much prolixity, though not always with great clearness. To state more at large the numerous provisions of the statute, would necessitate a transcription of all its terms. Enough has been said to indicate the character, the scope, and the object, but not the minute provisions of, this legislation; and we now repeat the question, had the General Assembly the power to adopt it? The General Assembly possesses all legislative power and authority, except in such instances and to such extent as the Constitutions of the state and of the United States have imposed limitations and restraints thereon. In this respect the Legislature differs from the Congress of the United States, which has, and can exercise, only such power as the federal Constitution expressly or by necessary implication confers upon it. In the General Assembly plenary power to legislate is vested, unless restrained by the Constitution. In the Congress the power to legislate is not vested, unless confided by the federal Constitution. In the state Constitution we look, not for the power of the General Assembly to adopt an enactment, but for a prohibition against its adoption. In the federal Constitution we look, not for the prohibition, but for the delegated power to enact a measure. The General Assembly being, then, the depository of all legislative power, except when restrained by the organic law, it follows that it is clothed with full power to enact a primary election law. If there is no provision in the Constitution depriving it of that authority. There is no such provision to be found in the Constitution of the state. It is true that section 42 of article 3 of the Constitution provides: "The General Assembly shall pass laws for the preservation of the purity of elections"—but the power to enact a primary election law lies back of and beyond this provision, and is not derived from it at all. The power to legislate in regard to elections—primary or general—if unrestrained by the Constitution itself, is inherent in the General Assembly, and the provision just cited, instead of conferring the power, is a mandate to execute a power implicitly assumed to exist independently of the mandate. "The General Assembly shall pass laws," is a direction to bring into activity an antecedent and independent authority.

The power, then, to enact a primary election law being inherent in the Legislature, it only remains to inquire whether in the execution of that power the General Assembly has, by the act in question, infringed upon or broken through some inhibitory provision of the organic law. No section or clause of the act has been pointed out as in conflict with any particular or designated prohibition; and a careful reading of the statute has not disclosed to us the existence of such antagonism. Whilst this is true, it has been contended that the act is void because it undertakes to add a property qualification for holding public office which is not contained in the Constitution; and this contention is based upon section 112 of the act. By the section just named it is provided that each person who desires to become a candidate for nomination shall pay to the chairman of the committee of the party to which he belongs a certain fee, the amount of which is regulated for the different offices by the section in question, which fees are to be used exclusively as a fund to defray the expenses of announcing candidates, printing ballots, furnishing blanks, and other necessary expenses for holding and conducting the primary election, and for paying such expenses of the return judges as may be determined by the convention of return judges. Now, the exaction of the fee is by no means the imposition of a property qualification on the candidates. Primary contests necessarily require the expenditure of money for the purposes just indicated, and the money must be procured from some source. The requirement that the individuals who, through the primaries, seek to secure nomination, shall pay the expenses which the governing body of their party are compelled to incur for their benefit and in their behalf, is neither unreasonable nor unjust, and most certainly is not the superaddition of a property qualification for holding the offices to which they aspire.

The appellant insists that the act is against public policy and contrary to the fundamental principles of justice; but if this contention were conceded—and it is not—the ground of assault would be shifted to an entirely different position from the one of its alleged unconstitutionality. What public policy is invaded by it? No exact definition of public policy has ever been given or can be found. In Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229, Mr. Justice Burroughs pointedly observed: "I, for one, protest against arguing too strongly upon public policy. It is a very unruly horse, and, when once you get astride it, you never know where it will carry you. It may lead you from the sound law. It is never argued at all but when all other points fail." We do not deem it necessary to go into a consideration of the several particulars in respect of which it is asserted public policy is violated by the act, because, first, we are at a loss to know what public policy is invaded, and, secondly, because, public policy, of itself and without having its foundation in some constitutional provision, can neither circumscribe nor restrain the legislative authority of the General Assembly. We cannot undertake to declare the statute unconstitutional merely because it is assumed to be at variance with some undefined and undetermined public policy, which at best is but a shifting and variable notion appealed to only when no other argument is available, and which, if relied on today, may be utterly repudiated tomorrow. The great case of Regents of the University of Maryland v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 365, 31 Am. Dec. 72, is relied on to support the contention that the act of 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 870, c. 508) is contrary to the fundamental principles of right and justice, and is therefore void; but the case is not applicable. The question there involved and discussed and actually decided was whether the act of 1825 (Acts 1825, p. 183, c. 190) was void because it impaired the obligation of the contract created by the prior act of 1812 (Acts 1812, p. 173, c. 159), which incorporated the Regents of the University of Maryland. The conclusion reached by this court is thus stated in the elaborate judgment delivered by the late Chief Judge Buchanan: "This brief view of the character and legal effect of the act incorporating the regents of the University results in the opinion that it is a contract protected by the Constitution of the United States, the obligation of which cannot be impaired by an act of the Legislature of the state without the assent of the corporation, and leads to the conclusion, consequent upon that opinion, that the act of 1825 (Acts 1825, p. 183, c. 190) is repugnant to that instrument and therefore void." After pointing out the particulars wherein the repugnancy consisted, the court proceeded to say: "But the objection to the validity of the act of 1825 does not rest alone for support upon the construction of the Constitution of the United States. Independent of that instrument and of any express restriction in the Constitution in the state, there is a fundamental principle of right and justice, inherent in the nature and spirit of the social compact (in this country at least), the character and genius of our government, the causes from which they spring, and the purposes for which they were established, that rises above and restrains and sets bounds to the power of legislation, which the Legislature cannot pass without exceeding its rightful authority. It is that principle which protects the life, liberty, and property of the citizen from violation in the unjust exercise of legislative power." Though this same doctrine has been alluded to in later cases (Baughner v. Nelson, 9 Gill, 307, 52 Am. Dec. 694; Harrison v. State, 22 Md. 494, 85 Am. Dec. 658; Mayor, etc., Hagerstown v. Sehner, 37 Md. 191; Cahen v. Jarrett, 42 Md. 575; Trustees, etc., v. Manning, 72 Md. 122, 19 Atl. 599), it is to be noted that it was not necessary to the decision of the Regents Case, which turned upon the "contract" clause of the federal Constitution; and that no statute, as far as we are aware, has ever been stricken down by this court solely and exclusively because it exceeded the bounds set to legislative power by that fundamental principle of right and justice to which Chief Justice Buchanan referred. It was held, in Mayor, etc., of Baltimore v. Board of Police, etc., 15 Md. 469, that this principle, with the limitation "that it was designed to protect the life, liberty, and property of the citizen from violation in the unjust exercise of legislative power, * * * asserts a very correct doctrine." There is no occasion to affirm or deny the principle, so far as this case is concerned, because nothing in the act of 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 870, c. 508) affects, in the most remote way, the life, liberty, or property of the citizen.

This brings us to the objection that the statute is void because in conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, in this: That it denies to one political party the equal protection of the law. The particulars in which it is alleged this denial of equal protection or this unlawful discrimination exists will now be considered. By section 105 of the act it is provided that "all candidates for election to office nominated by the two parties having the highest number of votes cast for the highest state office at the last general election * * * shall be nominated by the direct vote of the members of said party * * * and the party casting the highest number of votes for the highest state officer at the last general election shall hold its primary election on the first Saturday of September, and the party casting the next highest number of votes shall hold its primary election on the first day of registration prescribed by law." It is because the act fixes a different day for each of the two leading parties to hold its primaries, and because the act applies only to the two parties which cast at the previous election the highest number of votes, and does not include other political parties, that it is supposed to be in conflict with the fourteenth amendment. In neither of these respects is there intrinsically any denial of the equal protection of the law. State legislation is not obnoxious to this provision, if all persons subject to it are treated alike, under similar circumstances and conditions, in respect, both to the privileges conferred and the liabilities imposed. Mo. Pa. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 209, 8 Sup. Ct. 1161, 32 L. Ed. 107; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77. There is no such thing as an inherent right in any political party to insist that all political parties shall hold their primaries on one and the same day; and there can therefore be no denial of an equal protection of the law in the mere fact that different days have been prescribed by the statute for the respective primaries. But it is contended that the denial of equal protection consists in according to one particular party a longer campaign for its candidates than to the other by reason of the primaries of the former being fixed for an earlier day than the primaries of the latter. Both political parties are treated precisely alike under similar circumstances. The right to hold a primary first is not given to either party by name, but to the one which had cast the highest vote for the highest state officer at the preceding election; and no court has authority to assume that the same political party will at every election cast the highest vote for the highest state officer, and will therefore always be entitled to hold the first primary. The party which at the last election did cast the highest vote may at the next election cast fewer votes than the other party, in which event the latter party would at the ensuing primaries be entitled to the earlier date. It is argued, however, that by reason of other provisions in section 111 the nomination of the ticket of the minority party may be postponed until a day or two before the election, whereby it will be excluded from the official ballot altogether, and that in consequence there is a glaring discrimination against the candidates of that party. This argument proceeds upon the assumption that either fraudulent or crooked devices will be resorted to for the purpose of accomplishing that result, because it is not pretended that an honest administration of the law can produce such an effect. It is needless to say that an objection founded on an hypothesis like this cannot prevail as a constitutional infirmity of the statute. The circumstance that the act applies only to two of the political parties does not affect its validity. The General Assembly has the power to pass an act regulating the primaries of one party alone, if it sees fit; and if, for reasons satisfactory to the legislative branch of the government, it is desirable that only the numerically stronger parties should be brought under the provisions of a primary election law which has to do merely with the selection of candidates to be voted for, and is in no way concerned with the elective franchise, it is not the province of the courts to declare the measure invalid simply because other political parties polling a few scattering votes are not included within the enactment.

We now come to the question as to whether the act empowers the county commissioners to make the levy which is sought to be enjoined. The expenses which must be defrayed out of the funds contributed by the candidates in accordance with section 112 of the act have already been mentioned, but there are other items of cost incident to the holding of the primaries which must be incurred by the election supervisors of the county in providing, under section 105, "the voting booths, ballot boxes, stationary, and such other paraphernalia as is used for general elections," and in delivering and setting "up the same at said places of registration ready for use." Section 109 declares that "the ballot boxes used at said primary election shall be provided by the board of election supervisors of said county, and shall be delivered to said primary election board at the same time as other paraphernalia hereinbefore provided for." By sections 2, 5, art. 33, Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, the necessary expenses incurred by the supervisors in performing the duties imposed by law are required to be paid by the county commissioners. The act now assailed imposes upon the supervisors the duties just indicated, and the performance of those duties involves the expenditure of money. It therefore follows, from the provisions of the Code, that the county commissioners are not only authorized, but required, to make a levy to pay the indebtedness contracted by the supervisors in discharging the duties prescribed by the act of 1904.

Has the appellant shown on the face of his bill of complaint such a pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of this contestation as to give a court of equity jurisdiction? He alleges that he is assessed, as a taxpayer, with property valued at $6,000. The total sum levied under the act of 1904 is $2,000. The taxable basis of Allegheny county is slightly over $18,000,000. The rate needed to produce the sum levied is a fraction over 1 cent and 1 mill on each $100 of assessed property, or about 11 cents on each $1,000 thereof. On $6,000 the sum total demanded from the appellant would be slightly in excess of 66 cents. It is declared by section 102, art. 16, Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, that "the courts of equity in this state shall not hear, try, determine or give relief in any cause, matter or thing wherein the original debt or damages does not amount to twenty dollars." The relief sought in the pending case is an injunction to restrain the collection of about 66 cents, a sum of money considerably less than $20; and, under the express words of the Code, the court below had no jurisdiction to grant that relief. Kuenzel v. M. & C. C. Baltimore, 93 Md. 750, 49 Atl. 649; Pentz v. Citizens' Fire Ins. Co., 35 Md. 78; Reynolds v. Howard, 3 Md. Ch. 333.

There is another difficulty in the path of the appellant, and it is this: The levy was made before the bill was filed: probably most of the sum so levied has been collected; the primaries have been held, the tickets have been nominated; the general election, at which the candidates selected at the primary have been voted for, is over; and now it is too late to ask a court of equity to strike down everything which has been done under the apparent, if not the actual, sanction of law. Under somewhat similar circumstances the Supreme Court refused to interfere with the results of an election in South Carolina. Mills v. Green, 159 U. S. 661, 16 Sup. Ct. 132, 40 L. Ed. 293.

We have intimated that there are some matters of detail in the act of 1904 which are inharmonious, but they do not affect its validity, and apparently did not interfere with its practical enforcement. They are blemishes which can be readily removed by the General Assembly. They need not be particularly alluded to, inasmuch as they can have no bearing upon the question actually involved in this proceeding, and cannot influence in any way the solution of those questions.

As we agree with the circuit court in the order it made dismissing the bill of complaint, that order will be affirmed, without regard to the jurisdictional objection, which, though not suggested at the argument, has been considered in this judgment.

Order affirmed, with costs above and below.

MORGAN v. REEL et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 30, 1905.)

1. COURTS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Act April 18, 1905 (P. L. 208), authorizing judges of separate orphans' courts to hear and determine equity proceedings at the request of the judges of common pleas, is not repugnant to Const. art. 5, § 4, providing that until otherwise directed by law the courts of common pleas shall continue as at present established, nor to section 6 of the same article, providing that in Philadelphia and Allegheny counties each court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all proceedings of law and equity commenced therein, nor to section 26, prohibiting the creation of other courts to exercise the powers vested by the Constitution in the judges of the courts of common pleas and orphans' courts, nor to section 20, relative to chancery powers of the court of common pleas, nor to section 15, requiring all judges to be elected by the qualified electors in the respective districts over which they are to preside.

2. ADOPTION — INHERITANCE BY ADOPTED CHILDREN.

Where a man adopts a child of a deceased child and dies intestate, the adopted child inherits as a child only, and not as both child and grandchild.

Brown, Mestrezat, and Stewart, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Allegheny County.

Bill in equity by James W. Morgan against Mary Olive Morgan Reel and others. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bill in equity for partition. The case was heard by Over, J., a judge of the orphans' court of Allegheny county, specially presiding at the request of the judges of the common pleas under the provisions of the act of April 18, 1905. From the record it appeared that on March 24, 1870, Conrad Reel died seised in fee simple of certain real estate, and that on May 31, 1886, his widow died seised also of certain real estate in her own right. They left to survive them as heirs at law four children, Jacob G. Reel, Annie E. McGuire, John A. Reel, and William H. Reel. John A. Reel died on January 24, 1893, leaving to survive him, as his heirs at law, a widow and seven children, all named as defendants in the bill. William H. Reel died on May 26, 1901, intestate, seised of the undivided one-fourth of the real estate of his father and mother. He left to survive him as his heirs at law, a widow, Catherine T. Reel, and two daughters, Stella C. Reel and Catherine Pauline Matthews, and two grandchildren, James W. Morgan and Mary Olive Morgan. These two grandchildren were the children of William H. Reel's deceased daughter, Rosanna C. Morgan. On November 14, 1885, William H. Reel and his wife, Catherine T. Reel, by proper proceedings in the court of common pleas No. 1, at No. 578, December term, 1885 adopted his said granddaughter, Mary Olive Morgan, under the name of Mary Olive Reel, she being then a minor about four years old. James W. Morgan filed this bill for the partition of the lands of his grandfather, Conrad Reel, and his grandmother, Rosanna Reel. The court held that Mary Olive Reel, who was named as one of the defendants, was entitled only to a child's share of the estate of her adopted father, and was not entitled to share with her brother in the portion which their deceased mother would have taken if she had lived. The court also decided that Judge Over had a right to hear the case.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, STEWART, and ELKIN, JJ.

George H. Quail, for appellant. William H. McClung, Thomas D. Chantler, and William M. McGill, for appellee.

MITCHELL, C. J. 1. The important public question in this case is the constitutionality of the act of April 18, 1905 (P. L. 208), "to authorize the judges of separate orphans' courts to hear and determine proceedings in equity at the request of the judges of the common pleas." Section 1 provides that "in addition to the powers now possessed and exercised by the judges of the separate orphans' courts of this commonwealth, said judges shall, when called upon by the president or other law judge of any court of common pleas, as hereinafter provided, have power to hear and determine all issues and other matters in equity so fully and effectually, as to dispose thereof in the same manner as may be done by the courts of common pleas or the law judges thereof sitting in equity, in accordance with the laws, rules, regulations and practice governing the exercise of equity jurisdiction in this commonwealth. And whenever any service shall be rendered, in pursuance hereof, by a judge of such orphans' court, he shall be deemed to be specially presiding in, and to have the powers of, the court of common pleas of the proper county, sitting in equity." Other sections provide that the service shall not be compulsory on the judges of the orphans' court, and supply the necessary details for the working of the act.

A number of sections in the judiciary article of the Constitution are referred to as being contravened by this act. Such as refer to the orphans' court may be dismissed without detailed notice. Notwithstanding the phraseology of the title and the first section that "the judges of the orphans' court are authorized," etc., the act has no bearing on the court itself. No interference or change is made in any way in the organization, jurisdiction, powers, or practice of that court. There is merely a special grant of authority to the judges individually, not compulsory on them, but to be exercised voluntarily under certain circumstances. The cases in which they sit by invitation remain in the common pleas where they were brought, and the records of the orphans' court take no notice of them. We must disregard, therefore, all suggestions of infringement on the constitutional province of the orphans' court. Section 4 of article 5, the judiciary article of the Constitution, provides that "until otherwise directed by law the courts of common pleas shall continue as at present established." This act is not an infringement of that section, for so far as it makes any change it is one "directed by law." Section 6 directs that in Philadelphia and Allegheny counties each court "shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all proceedings at law and in equity commenced therein." There is no infringement of this provision, for as already said the common pleas retains the record and the jurisdiction of the cases, and whatever is done by the special judge is done in that court. The same consideration answers the citation of section 28 of the judiciary article, prohibiting the creation of other courts "to exercise the powers vested by this Constitution in the judges of the courts of common pleas and orphans' courts." No other or new court is created by the act.

Stress was laid in the argument on section 20 of the judiciary article that "the several courts of common pleas, besides the powers herein conferred, shall have and exercise, within their respective districts, subject to such changes as may be made by law, such chancery powers as are now vested by law in the several courts of common pleas of this commonwealth or as may hereafter be conferred upon them by law." But it is not apparent how the act contravenes this section. It takes away no jurisdiction from the common pleas, nor vests any in the orphans' court, and, if it did either or both, it would be within the proviso "subject to such changes as may be made by law." Indeed, the act may be wholly justified and sustained upon the equity feature of it. Subject to the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury, the jurisdiction, powers, practice, and procedure in equity are inherently matters of legislative control, and are expressly recognized as such in the section quoted of the judiciary article. It is conceded that the Legislature might confer a general jurisdiction in equity, concurrent with the common pleas, upon the orphans' courts. And if it might do so in general, as a whole, it is certain that it could do the same pro tanto as to cases it thought proper. As already shown no such change of jurisdiction in either court is in fact made by the act, though

It might have been. But a settled and unquestionable part of the procedure in equity from its earliest days is the authority of the chancellor to avail himself of the assistance of examiners, masters, and other quasi judicial officers in the disposition of cases pending before him. Until quite recently that was the general practice in Pennsylvania, and for the taking of evidence, investigation of facts, and report upon the law, cases were sent ordinarily and regularly to such officers. Except for the general equity rules now in force, the court of common pleas might have referred this case to the judge of the orphans' court, with his consent, as examiner and master, and what the court might have done by rule or order the Legislature might do by statute. In substance it has done nothing more by this act. The case remains in the common pleas, and the decree is the decree of the common pleas, sitting in banc after hearing upon exceptions to the report of the judge who conducted the trial. Had this been an action at law with a charge to a jury, a larger question would have arisen on the right of the judge to sit, which will be considered under the next head, but the act is confined to cases in equity, and, as to them, is clearly within the constitutional powers of the Legislature.

The last provision to be noticed, and the only one really needing discussion, is section 15 of the judiciary article, that "all judges required to be learned in the law * * * shall be elected by the qualified electors of the respective districts over which they are to preside." If this question were now presented for the first time, we should be bound to say that it was one of quite serious difficulty, for the requirement of election of the judges by the electors of the district would seem to be a requirement of election by them to the very court in which his right to sit is challenged. But the historical view of the constitutional provisions on the subject, and the uniform course of decisions under them, have clearly settled the principles we must now apply. Very interesting and instructive discussions of the legislative power of reorganization and control over the courts named and established by the constitution will be found in Com. v. Flanagan, 7 Watts & S. 68; Com. v. Zephon, 8 Watts & S. 382; Kilpatrick v. Com., 31 Pa. 198; Foust v. Com., 33 Pa. 338; Com. ex rel. v. Green, 58 Pa. 226; In re Application of President Judges, 64 Pa. 33; and Com. ex rel. v. Hipple, 69 Pa. 9. The Constitution of 1790 (article 5, § 4) provided that "until it shall be otherwise directed by law the several courts of common pleas shall be established in the following manner." The Constitutions of 1838 and 1873 contained the same provisions. The same article in the Constitutions of 1790 and 1838 provided (section 5) that the judges of the common pleas should be judges of the oyer and ter-miner for the trial of capital and other offenders, and "any two of said judges, the president being one, shall be a quorum," etc. Under these sections it was decided in the cases above referred to that the Legislature could create a court of criminal sessions, could afterwards abolish it and transfer its jurisdiction to the quarter sessions, that it could authorize two judges of the common pleas (and afterwards a single judge), the president not being one, to hold the oyer and terminer, that it could establish a special court of criminal jurisdiction within the territory of a judicial district of the common pleas, and other changes not necessary to be specified here.

In sustaining the power to change the constitutional requirement that the president judge should be one of the quorum of the oyer and terminer (Kilpatrick v. Com., 31 Pa. 198), Strong, J., said (page 214): "the act is not an attempt to establish a new court, which the Legislature are authorized to do by the first section of the fifth article. If it be valid at all, it is because it is a reorganization of the existing court of common pleas, under the clause of the Constitution which ordains that 'the courts of common pleas shall continue as at present established, until otherwise directed by law.' The plaintiff in error denies that the act is constitutional. We cannot regard this as an open question. Whatever doubts we might have were the question res nova (and speaking for myself I should have many) we are not now at liberty to entertain them. The validity of this act of assembly, as well as the intent of the constitutional provisions have heretofore been authoritatively defined"—citing the cases already referred to with others. The amendment of 1850 introduced the election of judges in substantially the same terms as the present section 15 of the judiciary article. Kilpatrick v. Com., 31 Pa. 198, was decided after the amendment, but this question was not involved, as both the associate judges who held the oyer and terminer there had been elected by the electors of the district. In Com. v. Green, 58 Pa. 226, however, the point was made, and Sharswood, J., after noting that the letter of the Constitution was not violated, said: "But it is said that the spirit of it is violated because, while the court for Schuylkill county is made an active and important tribunal, the provisions for the courts of Lebanon and Dauphin are contingent and illusory. The justices of Schuylkill county are commanded to make their returns to the special court. A grand jury is to be summoned to act upon the bills and other matters given them in charge, while the jurisdiction in Dauphin and Lebanon is restricted to bills found in the oyer and terminer and quarter sessions and transferred to the special court at the option of the district attorney. Thus, in effect, the electors of Dauphin and Lebanon choose the judge for Schuykill. With the justice, wisdom, or policy of this legislation we have nothing whatever to do." The act was held constitutional, and the decision was affirmed and followed in Com. ex rel. v. Hipple, 69 Pa. 9, which was a mandamus to the district attorney of Schuykill county to perform his duties in the criminal court established by it.

The controlling case, however, is the Application of President Judges, 64 Pa. 33, decided in 1870. The act of April 2, 1860 (P. L. 552), provided that, where the president judge of any judicial district should be unable to hold the regular term of his courts, he might call in any other president judge, and that judge so called in should be authorized "to discharge the duties appertaining to said office as fully as the regularly commissioned president judge of said district could do if present." Two president judges, being unable to hold their courts, and their power to call in another to hold the oyer and terminer either being challenged or considered by themselves as doubtful, applied to the Supreme Court to assign one of its members for that purpose. The question of the extent of the requirements of the elective clause was thus directly raised. The act was held constitutional; Agnew, J., saying: "This legislation is evidently a special organization of the several courts for necessary purposes, when the proper president judge is disabled, by the substitution of another judge in his place. Is this within constitutional power? We think it is, whether the act be a reorganization, or the creation of a new court for special purposes. If anything can be considered as settled by judicial determination it is that another judge learned in the law can be substituted for the president of the court as judge of the court of oyer and terminer." And, referring to the previous cases, cited supra, he added, "The reasoning on which these decisions rest is incontrovertible." Page 35. "In such a case it is only the organization of the court which is changed by the substitution of one president for another. Now the power to substitute is the very point decided in the Cases of Zephon, Kilpatrick and Foust, where it was held that an associate judge, learned in the law, could constitutionally take the place of the president. Whatever might have been the impression of any one formerly on this question, the point is conclusively adjudged." Page 37. And in the same case Chief Justice Thompson, in a concurring opinion, after referring to his dissent in Com. v. Kilpatrick, and the other cases, said: "I am not satisfied of error yet; but I must admit that the law is at present conclusively settled against me, and I am, as every other citizen, bound by it."

The elective clause of the Constitution was not specifically discussed in the opinion, but it was directly and necessarily involved in the case, and, in view of Chief Justice Thompson's reluctant concurrence, we are not at liberty to assume that so obvious and serious an objection was not considered and meant to be decided. We must concur with him that the case is of binding authority, and that the law is "conclusively settled." It is to be said for the act of 1905 that it nowhere indicates any intent to transgress the Constitution, to impair or restrict the powers of any constitutional court, or to impede or diminish the rights of electors. On the contrary, it is a bona fide effort for the relief of temporarily congested and overburdened court lists, without permanently burdening the judicial establishment of the state with officers who may not be permanently required. It is certainly in accord with the spirit of the constitutional control by the Legislature over the organization of existing courts and the creation of new ones. As such, all presumptions are in its favor. Viewed in this light, and under the authority of the preceding decisions, we must regard it as a valid special reorganization of the courts of common pleas for the disposition of cases under special and exceptional circumstances.

2. The further question raised by this case depends on the statutes for the adoption of children. Where a grandfather adopts a grandchild, daughter of a deceased daughter, and dies intestate, does the adopted grandchild inherit as a child only or in a double capacity, as child and grandchild? The act of May 19, 1887 (P. L. 125), after prescribing the conditions and mode of adoption, and, inter alia, that the adopted child "shall have all the rights of a child and heir of the adopting parent," continues: "Provided, that if such adopting parent shall have other children, the adopted shall share the inheritance only as one of them; in case of intestacy, he, she, or they, shall respectively inherit from and through each other as if all had been the lawful children of the same parent." The adopted child does not stand on the full footing of an actual child even as to his legal rights. He has only such rights as the statute clearly gives him. This has been uniformly held, with much strictness, not only under this act, but also under the prior acts on the same subject. Thus it was held that a devise from the adopting parent to the adopted child is not exempted from collateral inheritance tax (Com. v. Nancrede, 82 Pa. 389; Com. v. Ferguson, 137 Pa. 595, 20 Atl. 870, 10 L. R. A. 240), though it may be so if the special statute authorizing the adoption, clearly so intends (Com. v. Henderson, 172 Pa. 135, 33 Atl. 368), and a devise to the children of A. does not include adopted children (Schafer v. Eneu, 54 Pa. 304).

The act of 1887 intended to put the adopted child on the same footing as actual children, if such there should be, but not on any more favorable footing. This would be the natural and presumed intent, but it is put beyond question by the proviso. Having enacted that the adopted child shall have all the rights of a child and heir," the framers of the act, apparently out of caution lest the word "heir" should seem to give a preference over other children, added the proviso that he should inherit "only as one of them." The act did not apparently contemplate, certainly did not expressly provide, for the case of the adoption of a grandchild, but the plain intent that the status of the adopted child should be equal but not superior to that of the others is enough to settle the question. Had William H. Reel died intestate just before his adoption of the appellant his estate would have descended to three stocks, to wit, one-third to each of his daughters, Stella and Catherine, and one-sixth to each of his grandchildren, the plaintiff and appellant, children of his deceased daughter. By his adoption of the appellant he transferred her from the class of grandchildren to the class of children, and her status in the former was merged in her status in the latter. When he died thereafter his estate descended to four stocks, one-fourth to each of his actual daughters, another fourth to his adopted daughter, the appellant, and the remaining fourth to the plaintiff as representative of his deceased mother. Thus, and thus only, can the equality intended by the statute be maintained.

Decree affirmed.

BROWN, J. (dissenting). As a rule, it is better that a member of a court of last resort, not concurring in the view of the majority, confine, if possible, his dissent to the consultation room. This is especially true in the disposition of constitutional questions, which are always important. But there are times when public dissent cannot be withheld without being misunderstood, and, as I am unwilling to be understood as concurring in the view of the majority of my brethren in this case, I must dissent of record, and briefly state my reasons for doing so. By section 22 of the judiciary article of the Constitution, creating separate orphan's courts, it is provided that they are to exercise all the jurisdiction and powers vested in orphans' courts at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and, in addition, such as might thereafter be conferred. The act of 1905 confers no jurisdiction or powers upon separate orphan's courts. These are just what they were before the passage of the act, and the judges of the separate orphans' courts can now do nothing in their own courts that they could not have done prior to April 18, 1905; but, when transplanted into the equity side of a court of common pleas by the process pointed out by the act, a judge of the orphans' courts becomes, so long as he remains there, a judge of that court. The words of the act are that, while sitting in the common pleas at the invitation of one of its judges, "he shall be deemed to be specially presiding in, and to have the powers of, the court of common pleas of the proper county, sitting in equity." When this was enacted, section 15 of the same article of the Constitution was either overlooked or forgotten. It declares that "all judges required to be learned in the law, except the judges of the Supreme Court, shall be elected by the qualified electors of the respective districts over which they are to preside." The common pleas is recognized by the Constitution as a district court from a separate orphans' court, and the words of the fifteenth section of the judiciary article mean that the judges of the common pleas shall be elected as such by the qualified electors of the district over which they preside; and so of the judges of the separate orphans' courts. How, then, can one sit on the judgment seat of the common pleas unless he is sent to it as one of its judges "by the qualified electors"? The Constitution declares that to be the only way in which a seat there can be reached, and the Legislature cannot point out any other. It may modify and change the jurisdiction and powers of the court of common pleas, but it cannot change the mode of the selection of its judges. If the Legislature can authorize a judge of the common pleas to call an orphans' court judge to his assistance as a temporary part of his court, why can it not authorize the calling of any member of the bar for such a purpose? If allowed to sit in the common pleas as one of its judges, a judge of the orphans' court will not be there simply as an examiner or master to aid that court, but as a component part of it, and, when sitting or presiding alone, the court itself.

Even if the Legislature could direct an orphans' court judge to sit and act as a judge of the common pleas, it has not undertaken to do so, but has committed or delegated to a common pleas judge the power to create, for the time being, out of an orphans' court judge a judge of his own court, and to clothe him with all of his equity powers and jurisdiction. If for no other reason, for this delegation of power, which, if it existed at all, would be in the Legislature alone, not to be delegated by it to any one, the act ought not to be sustained. It is true that the act of April 2, 1860 (P. L. 552), providing that a president judge in any judicial district in the state may call in another judge to hold courts for him, was sustained; but the cases sustaining it are certainly not to be stretched in view of what has been said of them, and, in citing them as authority for the constitutionality of this act, it has been entirely overlooked that under that act, when one judge calls in another to hold court for him, the judge called has in his own court, to which he was elected by the qualified electors, the same jurisdiction and powers that the calling judge possesses, and into the court outside of his district the invited judge takes with him all the powers which he possesses in his own court; but not so here. In his own court the orphans' court judge has no more jurisdiction over a bill in equity for a decree for specific performance of a contract between living parties than a justice of the peace; but by the act of 1905, when he gets into the common pleas, he at once acquires all of its equity powers. The spectacle of a judge of a separate orphans' court sitting in the common pleas under the act of 1905 is truly anomalous. He is not a common pleas judge, for he was not elected as such, and therefore possesses none of the powers of such a judge. In his own court he cannot do what he does in the court into which he goes, for in his own court he has no such jurisdiction and powers, even under the act of 1905, as he exercises in the common pleas. This is a situation not only not contemplated by the Constitution, but in clear violation of it.

MESTREZAT and STEWART, JJ., concur in the dissent.

In re CHESTER COUNTY REPUBLICAN NOMINATIONS.

Appeal of GARRETT et al.

(Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 26, 1905.)

1. ELECTIONS—CONTESTS—APPEAL.

Where the facts appear upon the record in an election contest, the Supreme Court may determine whether the judgment is correct upon such facts, and may for that purpose consider the opinion of the lower court.

2. SAME—CONTESTS—SCOPE OF REVIEW.

Under the primary election statutes, which make party rules the law of a case, the duty of the courts in reviewing such an election is merely to see that the acting body of the party proceeded regularly according to its own rules.

3. SAME—COUNTY COMMITTEES—TERM OF OFFICE.

The words "ensuing year," used in the rules of a political party requiring the election by the voters of a district of a member of the county committee for the district for the ensuing year, mean the political year intervening between one election and the next annual election, and not a calendar year, when construed with other rules of the party providing for the management of the affairs of the party by the county committee, and making the whole machinery of party elections largely dependent upon the initiatory action of the county committee and the committeemen.

4. MANDAMUS—GROUNDS—SUPERVISION OF POLITICAL COMMITTEES.

Where members of a county political committee, who hold office for a political year, postpone a new election of committee members for the perpetuation of their own power or other unlawful or insufficient reason, mandamus will lie to compel them to hold such an election.

5. ELECTIONS—POLITICAL COMMITTEES—TERM OF OFFICE.

Members of a county political committee were, under the rules of the party, elected for a political year. Other rules gave the chairman of the committee power to fill all vacancies. The chairman, erroneously supposing that the committeemen held office for only a calendar year, reappointed the committeemen after the expiration of the calendar year, but before the termination of the political year for which such committeemen were elected. Held, that the appointments made by the chairman were nugatory, and any action of the committee before the end of the political year was valid by reason of the previously existing authority of the committeemen.

Potter and Mestresat, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Chester County.

Exceptions by Thomas Lack and others to a certificate of nomination issued to R. Thomas Garrett and others, as candidates, etc. From an order sustaining the exceptions, the candidates appeal. Reversed.

Argued before MITCHELL, C. J., and FELL, BROWN, MESTREZAT, POTTER, ELKIN, and STEWART, JJ.

Alfred P. Reid and D. T. Watson, for appellants. C. Wesley Talbot, George B. Johnson, and Wayne MacVeagh, for appellees.

MITCHELL, C. J. This proceeding, though under the confusing directions of the procedure act of May 9, 1889 (P. L. 158), called an appeal, is in fact a certiorari, and must be so treated. The principles and practice by which this court is governed in such cases are fully discussed in Independence Party Nomination 208 Pa. 108, 57 Atl. 844, and for present purposes may be stated to be that where the facts appear upon the record this court will examine whether the judgment is correct upon such facts, and may for that purpose consider the opinion of the court as part of the record. In this case there is no difficulty or dispute about the facts. They appear on the face of the certificate and the objections filed, and we take them without change from the specific findings of the court below. It is contended that there were certain other facts in connection with other nominating papers which were before the court below but are not here. But they related to a separate matter and are not relevant or material to the question of the correctness of the decision appealed from.

The court's statement of facts, slightly condensed, but otherwise unchanged, is as follows: (1) It is uncontroverted that on March 18, 1904, a county committee was duly elected in the several districts, and was duly organized March 23d by the election of Mr. Ruth as chairman and two others as secretaries. (2) That as the committeemen were elected for one year their term of office expired on March 18, 1905, but the chairman, secretaries, and treasurer held over until their successors should be elected. (3) That this county committee called primary elections to be held April 15, 1905, in the several districts of the county, for the purpose of electing delegates to a convention to nominate a county ticket, and also a member of the county committee, to serve for the ensuing year. Before the date for holding these elections had arrived many of the registered candidates had withdrawn their names, leaving no more than just sufficient to fill the various offices to be nominated, and on April 10, 1905, the chairman sent to each of the late committeemen a letter, in which, after quoting the act of June 22, 1897 (P. L. 179), as follows: "If any political party has, by its rules, provided for a registration of candidates for nominations, and at the time limited for such registration or at any subsequent time by reason of withdrawals or other cause there should be no more candidates for any office registered or remaining than are to be elected to such office, the person or persons so registered or remaining shall be deemed the nominee or nominees with the same effect as if he or they had been nominated by a convention or primary meeting or caucus or board. And one or more or all of the officers of the committee of such political party with which such registration shall be made or the officer with whom it is made shall make a certificate of such nomination in the same manner and with the same effect as if there had been a nomination by a convention or primary meeting or caucus or board"—he notified them that "in consequence of this condition it will therefore not be necessary to hold a primary election on Saturday evening next, and a convention on Tuesday, April 18th. I therefore notify you that said primaries and county convention will be abolished this year and the nominations will be certified by the county committee, in conformity with the aforesaid act of 1897." (4) On June 15, 1905, the chairman, in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 22, 1897, and as announced in the above letter, certified the remaining registered candidates to the county commissioners as the nominees of the Republican party. (5) On April 15, 1905, the chairman, by the authority conferred upon him, as he claimed by rule 5, to "fill all vacancies in the county committee," reappointed each and all of the late committee, the committeemen for their respective districts. (6) The committee thus appointed met on April 18, 1905, and reelected H. Morgan Ruth as its chairman, and William Taylor and J. Howard Coates as its secretaries. (7) On August 17, 1905, all the nominees, excepting the nominee for district attorney, withdrew their names from the certified ticket, and on the same day chairman Ruth called a meeting of his committee, resigned his office, and Thomas Lack was elected chairman in his place. (8) At a meeting of the committee on September 28, 1905, called by Mr. Lack, nominations were made to fill the vacancies created by the withdrawal of those certified by Mr. Ruth on June 15, 1905, and the same were duly certified and filed with the commissioners by Mr. Lack on October 2, 1905. These are the nominations objected to in the present proceeding. (9) In the meantime, many republicans of the county, dissatisfied with the management of their party affairs and especially with abolition of the primaries called for April 15, 1905, effected a new organization, in the manner detailed in the evidence of record, and in a convention duly called and held for the purpose on October 8, 1905, nominated a full county ticket to be voted for at the approaching election, and on October 4, 1905, Edward S. Darlington, the chairman of said convention, and its secretaries certified and filed the same with the commissioners as the ticket of the Republican Party or policy, and now claim that it is entitled to the Republican column on the official ballot.

The ninth finding sets out the facts alleged to be the ground of contention by appellees that all the facts before the court below are not now before us. But as already said they related to a separate matter. The court below held for reasons given that the nominations certified by Mr. Darlington on October 4th were not entitled to a place in the Republican column on the ticket, and, as there has been no appeal by those parties from his decision on that point, it is not before us.

The statutes make the party rules the law of the case, and the authority of the courts, as in the review of corporate or ecclesiastical elections and trials, is merely to see that the acting body proceeded regularly according to its own rules. The rules of the Republican Party of Chester county appear among the uncontroverted facts on the record, and the determination of this case depends upon their construction and application. Those which are relevant to the present discussion are the following:

"Rule 2. The party should hold a convention to nominate a county ticket, a convention to elect delegates to the national and state conventions when necessary, and such other conventions as may become necessary, to all of which conventions these rules shall apply.

"Rule 3. The convention to nominate the county ticket to be composed of delegates from the different election districts of the county shall be held at such time and place as may be fixed by the county committee.

"Rule 4. On the Saturday next before the time for holding the nominating conventions the Republicans of the respective election districts of the county shall assemble at the usual place of holding delegate elections, or at such place as shall be designated by the members of the county committee for the respective district, and elect by ballot the delegate or delegates to represent them in the nominating convention. At the same time and place they shall elect a member of the county committee for such district for the ensuing year. * * *

"Rule 5. The affairs of the party shall be managed by a county committee elected as aforesaid. Ten members thereof shall constitute a quorum to transact business. The county committee shall meet in West Chester for organization immediately after the convention for the purpose of nominating the county ticket has adjourned. They shall elect a president who shall be styled chairman of the county committee. They shall elect two persons as secretaries of the party, who shall audit the accounts of the former treasurer.

They shall elect one person treasurer who may be a member of the committee or otherwise. The chairman and officers of the preceding year shall act until their successors are elected. * * * The chairman of the county committee shall fill all vacancies in the county committee by the appointment of another Republican from the same district. * * * The chairman of the county committee shall be the executive officer of the party in the county, and shall put in operation these rules, the resolutions and orders of the county committee, and of the nominating convention, and shall preside at all meetings of the committee. * * *

"Rule 6. The county committeeman of each district shall be the executive officer thereof, and organize it in such a way as to bring to the election the whole vote of the party. * * *

"Rule 12. Each candidate for nomination by the Republican convention to nominate county officers shall be required to give his name and post office address and pay $5.00 to the chairman of the county committee not less than 30 days before the date fixed for the delegate elections. * * *

"Rule 13. In case of a vacancy by death, resignation or otherwise after the nominating convention of the party has been held, and before the next ensuing election, it shall be the duty of the chairman of the Republican county committee to call together the members of the county committee, and the members thus assembled shall have power to fill such vacancies."

The crucial question now before us is the regularity of the county committee which filed the certificate of nominations which is objected to. By rule 4 the primaries or delegate elections are to be held on the Saturday next before the nominating conventions, and the electors are then to elect delegates to represent them in the nominating convention, and "at the same time and place they shall elect a member of the county committee for such district for the ensuing year." The learned president judge of the court below in his second finding held that the term of the committee duly elected, as is conceded, on March 18, 1904, expired on March 18, 1905, and the committee became functus officio on that day, except the chairman, secretaries, and treasurer, who held over under rule 5 till their successors should be appointed. This part of the finding is a conclusion of law based on the interpretation of the phrase "for the ensuing year" in rule 4, and was an erroneous construction of the rule. The "ensuing year" meant by the rule was not the calendar, but the political year; that is, the interval between one election and the next annual election, which might be more or less than 12 calendar months. The delegate elections are not held at any set date, but at "such time and place as may be fixed by the county committee." Rule 3. The time is in the discretion of the committee, and it is common knowledge that it varies in different years, according to the exigencies or convenience of each year. Thus in the years of election of the president, or the governor, or other state officers, the date of county conventions is largely dependent on the date of the national or state conventions, while in years of election of county officers only the date is governed by local convenience. If a county election and convention should be held, as it often is, in August of one year and another in March in the next year, the new committee would come into power at once, and the term of the prior committee would end, though it had lasted only seven months, and, vice versa, the term of a committee elected in March might extend to August of the following year and thus cover 17 months, if the date of the primary election should be so fixed.

A brief consideration of the powers and duties of the county committee will show that this is necessarily the intent of the rules. By rule 3 the time and place of the county convention are to be fixed by the committee; by rule 4, on the Saturday before such date, the electors are to assemble at the usual place of holding delegate elections, "or at such place as shall be designated by the members of the county committee for the respective district," and the committeeman shall call the assembly to order, and they shall then proceed to elect a judge and two inspectors, and to hold the election; and by rule 6 "the county committeeman of each district shall be the executive officer thereof." It thus appears that the whole party machinery of party elections is centered, and to a large extent dependent, on the initiatory action of the county committee for the county and of the committeeman for his district. If the whole committee is liable to become officially dead at a fixed date of exactly a calendar year after their election, then the whole organization is in danger of being thrown into inextricable confusion by the accidental or intentional or factional failure by the old committee to fix a date for the election of a new committee before the expiration of their own year. The party will be helpless to proceed regularly under its own rules, for there will be no one with authority to make the calls or start the proceedings. It is impossible to suppose that the party in framing its rules meant to subject itself to such obvious risks. But, on the other hand, if the "ensuing year" was intended, as it must have been, to mean the political year, there is full provision for an organization always in existence ready for regular party action under the rules.

Testing the regularity of the nominations objected to by the rule thus understood it appears: (1) That the committee elected in March, 1904, has not been superseded by any new committee subsequently elected, and is therefore still in office de jure as well as de facto. (2) That on June 15, 1905, the chairman of the committee regularly certified the names of the candidates, as authorized by the act of 1897. (3) That on August 17, 1905, the committee met, and, the chairman having resigned, elected a new chairman. (4) That on September 26, 1905, all the nominees certified to the county commissioners on June 15, 1905, excepting the nominee for district attorney, having previously withdrawn, the committee met and made nominations to fill the vacancies caused by these withdrawals. (5) That on October 2, 1905, the chairman of the committee duly certified these nominations to the county commissioners. (6) That the nominees so certified, the appellants, are the regularly nominated candidates of the party, and as such are entitled to the Republican column on the official ticket.

Some collateral matters may be briefly noticed. The chairman of the county committee acted within his authority under the act of 1897 (quoted in the third finding of fact by the court below) in dispensing with the county convention to make nominations, but he was mistaken in assuming that there was no occasion for district elections to elect a new committee. Under rule 4 the two elections are to be held at the same time and place, but they are separate elections and involve separate rights of the electors. The rule requires the election for committeemen to be held at the time and place fixed by the committee, but it clearly contemplates an election each political year, and, if the electors should see or suspect a design on the part of the committee to postpone a new election for the perpetuation of their own power or other unlawful or insufficient reason, mandamus would lie to compel the committee to act. In the present case no such action was taken by any elector, and the action of the committee was acquiesced in so far as any contest in a regular way under the rules was concerned. The chairman of the committee was also in error in supposing that the terms of the committeemen had expired, and in reappointing them on April 15, 1905. Under rule 5 he had power to fill all vacancies in the committee, whether one or all of the number, but as there were no vacancies his action was nugatory. Having reappointed the same persons, however, no trouble ensued. The committee acted, and their action was valid by reason of their previously existing authority.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the objections to the nominations directed to be dismissed.

POTTER and MESTREZAT, JJ. (dissenting). It is certain that the writ of certiorari does not lie to revise the decision of the court below upon matters of fact. And without conceding that the record proper in this case contains sufficient to give us jurisdiction to inquire into the merits of the question, we are clearly of the opinion that under a reasonable construction of the party rules the terms of the county committeemen elected in March, 1904, expired at the time fixed for holding the meeting in April, 1905, to elect members for the then ensuing year. Apparently no other construction than this occurred to the mind of any one connected with the county committee, and the chairman showed that he so construed and understood the rule, by his action in attempting to appoint the members of an entire new committee to act from that date. It is suggested for the first time, in the opinion of the majority of this court, that the terms of the old committeemen were not limited to the ensuing year after their election, but, that they continued in office indefinitely, owing to the failure of a convention to elect their successors in April, 1905. With this view we cannot agree. Rule 4 provides "that on the Saturday next before the time for holding the nominating convention, the Republicans of the respective districts * * * shall elect a member of the county committee for such district for the ensuing year." In the present instance the time designated by the chairman for holding the convention was April 18, 1905, and the Saturday before was April 15th, so that, under the rule, the term of the committeemen elected for the previous year ended at that time. And the chairman so understood it and appointed new committeemen under his claim of right to fill vacancies. It was this action which the court below held was unauthorized and illegal, and we think the view taken by the court in this respect was right. Clearly under the rules, the county committee was an elective body to be chosen by the people of the districts, to serve only for the ensuing political year. The power of the chairman to fill vacancies extended only to such as occurred in the elective body and during the current year. We can see no power given to him by the rules to appoint an entirely new committee, without submitting the choice of the membership to the votes of the people of the respective districts at the time fixed, under rule 4.

We would dismiss the assignments of error, and affirm the proceedings in the court below.

SCHUCHLER v. COOPER.

(Superior Court of Delaware. New Castle.
Feb. 10, 1904.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

A statement by a debtor to a creditor that the debtor did not have the money to make payments, but that his farm was big enough to pay the bill, did not amount to an acknowledgment sufficient to revive the debt, as against limitations.

2. WORK AND LABOR—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

One furnishing board and services in the absence of an express contract is entitled to recover their reasonable worth.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Work and Labor, §§ 1, 2.]

Action by Henry T. Schuchler against Alexander B. Cooper, as administrator of Robert Coburn Dickson, deceased. Verdict for plaintiff.

Action of assumpsit for care and attention and board furnished Robert Coburn Dickson by plaintiff from June 10, 1892 to May 25, 1900. At the trial testimony was adduced as to the time covered by the board furnished and services rendered to Robert Coburn Dickson by the plaintiff, and the acknowledgment of indebtedness therefor by said Dickson, as follows:

Louise Schuchler, Jr., testified on direct examination as follows: "By Mr. Whiteman: Q. What relation are you to Henry Schuchler? A. I am his daughter. Q. Where do you now reside? A. At 1103 Clayton street, in this city. Q. With whom do you reside? A. Mr. H. W. Gause. Q. You are employed in his household? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did you reside in June, 1892? A. With my father, on the Joe Morrow place. Q. Was that in Christiana Hundred? A. Yes, sir. Q. In this county? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that it near Walnut Run School House? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you attend that school? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you know Mr. Robert C. Dickson in his lifetime? A. Yes, sir. Q. How far did he reside from your home? A. It was not very far from the Morrow place. Q. About how far, as near as you can tell? A. About a half mile. Q. How old were you when you first knew him? A. About seven. Q. How did you become acquainted with him? A. When we started to carry his meals, that is the way we first got acquainted with him. Q. Who started to carry his meals? A. My sister and I. Q. Is your sister older than you? A. She is two years younger than I. Q. How far did you have to go when you first began carrying his meals? A. When we first began carrying them we had to go about a half mile. Q. How long did you continue to take his meals to him? A. Eight years; from 1892 to 1900. Q. How many times a day did you take his meals to him? A. Three times a day. Q. What meals did you take to him? A. The best kind of meals. Q. Who took care of Mr. Dickson, if you know? A. My father. Q. What care did he take of him? A. He cleaned the house for him and swept the rooms for him, and saw that his fires were fixed and that everything was all right before father left the place. Q. What time would your father get away from there to go to his home? A. Between 10 and 11 o'clock sometimes, and sometimes it would be half-past 11. I know that because I used to wait for father at nights and go home with him. Q. Did Mr. Dickson ever pay your father for this board furnished him? A. No, sir. Q. How do you know that? A. Because I heard father ask him for the money, and Mr. Dickson asked him if he could not wait until he could get the money. Q. When did you hear that conversation? A. I guess it was about a year before he died. Q. What else, if anything, did he say about paying your father for the board furnished? A. He said the farm was big enough to pay for the bill. Q. What did your father say to him about being paid for this board furnished? A. He said, 'Mr. Dickson, could not you let me have the money for the bill?' And Mr. Dickson said he did not have the money for the board bill. Q. Where did this conversation between your father and Mr. Dickson relative to the payment of this bill take place? A. In the dining room of Mr. Dickson's house. I was in the kitchen. Q. Was the door open or closed? A. The door was open. Q. How far was the kitchen from the dining room? A. It was adjoining the dining room. The kitchen adjoined the dining room. Q. Did you say it was a year before or within a year of his death? A. It was a year before his death. Q. When did he die? A. He died in June, 1900."

Louise Schuchler, Sr., testified upon the same point as follows: "By Mr. Whiteman: Q. You are the wife of Henry T. Schuchler, the plaintiff, are you not? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you know Robert Coburn Dickson in his lifetime? A. Yes, sir; I knew him well. Q. How long did you know him? A. I knew him from 1892 until he died, on June 5, 1900. Q. Where did you live during those eight years? A. The first two years we lived on the Morrow place, and then we lived at the 'Owl's Nest,' and then from there we moved to Susie Donohue's place. Q. Did you and your husband ever do anything for Mr. Dickson? A. We boarded him, and Mr. Schuchler looked after him and took care of him. Q. Who prepared the food for him? A. I did. Q. What would you prepare? A. I prepared all kinds of vegetables that come on the table, and everything that the market brings. Q. Did you ever prepare any meats of any kinds for him? A. Yes, sir; beef, leg of lamb, and all kinds of meats. Q. Did you ever prepare any chicken? A. Yes, sir; he got chicken every day. Q. How many meals did you furnish him each day? A. Three meals. Q. And this was during the time that you lived on the Morrow property, at the Owl's Nest, and on the Donohue property? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was your husband ever paid for that board furnished Mr. Dickson? A. No, sir. Q. Did Mr. Dickson ever say anything in your presence about paying your husband that bill? A. Yes, sir; he did. Q. What did he say? A. My husband asked him about it, and he said had he not patience; that he had plenty of money coming to him, and he ain't got it at the present time. Then he said, 'If you don't get the money, the farm is big enough to pay you.' Q. Did he say anything about paying him when he got the money? A. He said he did not have it to spare. Q. What did Mr. Dickson say about paying your husband for this food that was provided for him? A. Well, he said that he would pay him $10 a week. Q. And when did he say he would pay it? A. He said when he got the money. Q. When was this conversation? A. That was about a year or two years before he died. Q. Where was he when he said this? A. He was in the dining room of Mr. Dickson's house. Q. When was the first time anything was said between your husband and Mr. Dickson as to how much board should be charged? A. Well, it was the first time, when Mr. Dickson asked my husband about whether he could board him. Q. What was said as to how much should be charged? A. He told my husband to make up the bill; how much the bill was. Q. What was the bill made out for? A. For his victuals, and for the work. Q. How much money? A. Ten dollars a week. Q. Was that satisfactory to Mr. Dickson? A. Mr. Dickson said he was satisfied with that. Q. And you say that that was the first week you began supplying him with food? A. Yes, sir."

The witness further testified, in cross-examination, upon the same points, as follows: "By Mr. Hilles: X. Q. About what year was it that your husband had this talk about the $10 a week that Mr. Dickson was going to pay for his board? A. It was in the fall. X. Q. What year? A. About two years, I think, before he died. X. Q. Was that the only talk that you ever overheard about it? A. No, sir; I heard it many times. X. Q. Before that? A. Before that. X. Q. I understood you to say, in answer to Mr. Whiteman's question, that, when you went on the farm, there was a talk about $10 a week. Is that right, or was I mistaken? A. When we took Mr. Dickson to board the first week, he told my husband to make up the bill, and he was satisfied with the bill which my husband made up for him at $10 a week. X. Q. When was that? A. That was in the spring of the year of 1892. X. Q. In the spring of the year 1892 your husband made up a bill, did he, for $10 a week? A. Yes, sir. X. Q. And he presented it to Mr. Dickson? A. Yes, sir. X. Q. And did Mr. Dickson pay him? A. No, sir. X. Q. Did he present a bill every week? A. No, sir. X. Q. Did he ever present a bill to Mr. Dickson? A. Yes, sir; he did. X. Q. When? A. In the spring of the year, the first time when we started to board Mr. Dickson. X. Q. Was that the only one that he presented? A. Yes, sir; the only one."

The defendant prayed the court to charge the jury as follows: (1) That under the evidence in this case the plaintiff, if entitled to recover anything in the opinion of the jury, can only recover for the items in the bill of particulars occurring within three years before the commencement of this suit. Burton v. Robinson, 1 Houst. 260. (2) In order to take the case out of the statute of limitations, the plaintiff must prove an unconditional acknowledgment of liability on the account, which is the basis of the suit. (3) That, unless the jury shall believe from the evidence that there was an express contract to pay a certain amount, they can find for the plaintiff only nominal damages, as there is no proof of the value of the service rendered. Carpenter v. Hays, 153 Pa. 434, 25 Atl. 1127. (4) Claims against a dead man's estate, which might have been made against himself, while living, are always subjects of just suspicion, and our books, from Graham v. Graham, 34 Pa. 475, to Miller's Est. 136 Pa. 239, 249, 20 Atl. 796, are full of expressions by this court of the necessity of strict requirement of proof and the firm control of juries in such cases. The present is no better than most of its class.

Wages for domestic service are presumed to be paid at the periods customary at the time and in the neighborhood, and claims for such wages for unusual length of time, and especially those not made until after the claimant has left the service, must be supported by affirmative proof that they have not been paid. As said by Strong, J., speaking of the similar presumption of payment of a bond after the lapse of 20 years, the legal presumption shifts the burden of proof, and "after 20 years the creditor is bound to show, by something more than his bond, that the debt has not been paid. Reed v. Reed, 46 Pa. 239. The English rule in regard to wages has long been settled. It is founded on the habits and usages of the people, the solid foundation of all common-law presumptions of fact. The same habits and usages obtain in this country, and the same rule was therefore adopted in McConnell's Appeal, 97 Pa. 31, and is now the settled law of the state. Houck's Ex'rs v. Houck, 99 Pa. 552; Webb v. Lees, 149 Pa. 13, 24 Atl. 169. The presumption grows stronger as each period of payment goes by. In the nature of things it is less potent against a claim for two or three months' wages than for two or three years; and, again, its strength is increased or diminished by other circumstances that in the usual experience of life make payment more probable or explain the delay. And the evidence to sustain the claim must vary in the same ratio. As said by our late Brother Clark, in Gregory v. Com., 121 Pa. 611, 15 Atl. 452, 6 Am. St. Rep. 804, "the presumption will gather strength with each succeeding year, and the evidence to overthrow it must, of course, be correspondingly increased."

Argued before LORE, C. J., and PENNEWILL and BOYCE, JJ.

William T. Lynam and J. Harvey Whiteman, for plaintiff. William S. Hilles, for defendant.

LORE, C. J. (charging the jury). In this action Henry T. Schuchler, the plaintiff, seeks to recover from Alexander B. Cooper, administrator of Robert Coburn Dickson, deceased, the defendant, for personal services and for board which he rendered and furnished to the deceased in his lifetime, and which are itemized in his bill of particulars as follows:

|--|------------|
| Board from June 10, 1892, to May 25, 1900, at $10 per week..... | $4,120 00 |
| Nursing, May 25 to June 5, 1900, at $5 per day..... | 55 00 |
| Care and attention, cleaning up and waiting upon deceased, from June 10, 1892, to May 25, 1900, at 75 cents per day..... | 1,463 00 |
| Probate..... | 15 |

Aggregating.....$5,638 15

One of the pleas relied upon by the defendant is the statute of limitations. Under that plea the defendant claims that no recovery can be had for any parts of the items named in the bill of particulars which were furnished or rendered more than three years before the date of the commencement of this action, which was September 13, 1901. Running back three years from that date, would bring you to September 13, 1898. The statute of this state provides that no action shall be brought, in cases like this, after the expiration of three years from the accruing of the cause of action. Portions of the claim in this case appear, upon the face of the bill of particulars, to be barred by the statute. We are unable to find in the evidence any acknowledgment of the part so claimed to be barred by the statute as a subsisting demand made either by the deceased in his lifetime or by his administrator, the defendant, since his decease, which would remove this bar. We say to you, therefore, that in reaching your verdict you are not to consider any part of the plaintiff's bill for services rendered or board furnished prior to September 13, 1898.

Should you be satisfied from the evidence that after September 13, 1898, and before the death of the defendant, which it is not disputed occurred June 5, 1900, the plaintiff rendered services or furnished board, or both, as claimed in his bill of particulars, for which he has not been paid, he would be entitled to your verdict covering that period of time. In ascertaining the value of such services or board, you should be governed by the price fixed by the parties, if any price was agreed upon and shown. If no price was agreed upon, your verdict should be for such sum as the services rendered and board furnished were reasonably worth, as disclosed by the evidence.

Verdict for plaintiff for $925.15.

NOTE. The above case was taken up to the Supreme Court on a writ of error and at the June term, 1904, thereof the writ of error was dismissed on motion of defendant's counsel, on the ground that the plaintiff, Schuchler, had no standing in said court; he having assigned to his counsel all his interest in the verdict immediately after same was obtained, but before judgment, and before the writ of error was taken.

MELVIN et al. v. CONNER.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Kent. Oct. 30, 1905.)

1. PLEADING—AFFIDAVIT OF DEFENSE—TIME OF FILING—EXTENSION.

An application to extend the time within which to file an affidavit of defense must be made by the first Friday of the term.

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

In an action of assumpsit, an affidavit of defense alleging that defendant "verily believes that there is a legal defense to the whole of the cause of action in the above stated suit, the nature and character whereof is as follows: That there is nothing due and owing from the said defendant to the said plaintiffs" is insufficient, in that it fails to state the nature and character of the defense, as required by Rev. Code 1893, p. 789, c. 106, § 4.

Assumpsit by Riley Melvin and another, trading under the firm name and style of Melvin & Son, against Alvin B. Conner. Judgment for plaintiff.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Rosewell Hammond and W. Watson Harrington, for plaintiffs. George M. Jones, for defendant.

The defendant filed the following affidavit of defense, viz.: "Be it remembered that on this twenty-sixth day of October, A. D. 1905, before me, Walter Pardoe, prothonotary of the superior court of the state of Delaware in and for Kent county, personally comes Alvin B. Conner, the defendant in the above-stated suit, who having been by me duly affirmed according to law, doth depose and say that he is the defendant in the above-stated suit; that he verily believes that there is a legal defense to the whole of the cause of action in the above-stated suit, the nature and character whereof is as follows: That there is nothing due and owing from the said defendant to the said plaintiffs." The above affidavit was duly signed and affirmed by the affiant.

Mr. Harrington, for plaintiffs: We ask for judgment notwithstanding the affidavit of defense. This is an action of assumpsit on a book account, and the affidavit does not state the nature and character of the defense according to the provisions of the statute (Rev. Code, 1893, p. 789, c. 106, § 4). Reynolds v. Fahey, 4 Pennewill, 265, 55 Atl. 221.

Mr. Jones, for defendant: This is an action of assumpsit, and the affidavit sets out what is equivalent to non assumpsit. But, if the court have any doubt about the sufficiency of this affidavit, I would ask that the time be extended in which to file an affidavit of defense.

LORE, C. J. You are too late to make that application now. That must be done by the first Friday of the term, and that time has passed. We hold that the affidavit of defense is insufficient, in that it does not set out the nature and character of the defense relied upon, as must appear in such affidavit under the well-settled rulings of this court.

We therefore order judgment to be entered notwithstanding the affidavit of defense.

STATE v. MAHANEY.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Dec. 5, 1905.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—CONSECUTIVE SENTENCES.

After convictions upon two indictments for breaking with intent, the court has power to impose a sentence of imprisonment upon one of the convictions to begin at the expiration of sentence imposed upon the other conviction.

2. SAME.

This power to impose consecutive sentences is not affected by the provisions of section 67 of the Criminal Procedure Act (P. L. 1898, p. 891).

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition of John Mahaney for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Argued November term, 1905, before FORT, GARRETSON, and REED, JJ.

Peter J. McGinnis, for petitioner. William H. Speer, for the State.

REED, J. The petition for the writ sets out that John Mahaney was convicted at the December term, 1899, of the Hudson county court of quarter sessions on two indictments for the crime of breaking with intent, and that he was sentenced on the first indictment to be imprisoned for the term of seven years, and on the second indictment for the term of five years in the State Prison. The petition states that the sentence of seven years expired on the 25th day of August, 1905, and that he is still imprisoned by virtue of the second sentence of five years. Copies of the commitments are annexed to the petition. The first commitment recites that the petitioner was sentenced to hard labor for the term of seven years, and that he pay the costs of prosecution, and be further imprisoned from and after the said term of seven years until the costs of prosecution are paid. The second conviction recites that he be imprisoned for the term of five years, with the same conditions. On the back of the second conviction is indorsed: "This term to begin at the expiration of the sentence imposed in indictment No. 53, September term, 1899."

The return to the writ contains a certified copy of the judgment record, setting out that in the September term, 1899, two indictments were found against the petitioner for breaking with intent, and that on the first of these indictments he was tried and convicted, and on the second indictment he pleaded guilty. On the first indictment, indictment No. 53, he was sentenced to be imprisoned in the New Jersey State Prison for the term of seven years, and thence till the costs of prosecution were paid, and on the second indictment he was sentenced to be imprisoned for the period of five years, and thence until the costs of the prosecution were paid, which said last-mentioned sentence was ordered to commence upon the expiration of the sentence imposed under indictment No. 53 of the term of September, 1899. Thus the judgment record shows that, as a part of the sentence of five years, it was adjudged that the sentence do commence upon the expiration of the sentence imposed on indictment No. 53 of the term of September, 1899. A prisoner confined on a sentence will not be released on habeas corpus for errors in the mittimus when the court has the judgment before it. Sennot's Case, 146 Mass. 480, 16 N. E. 448, 4 Am. St. Rep. 344. The judgment is the source of the right of the keeper of the State Prison to detain the petitioner. Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89; People v. Baker, 89 N. Y. 461.

The question, then, is whether the court had the power to pronounce the second judgment imposing a sentence to commence after the term of the preceeding sentence should terminate. That a court possesses this power was decided in England before the period of the American Revolution. In 1770 John Wilkes, having been twice convicted of libel, was sentenced to a term of imprisonment on each indictment, the sentence on the last to begin at the end of the period for which he was sentenced on the first. This judgment was taken by writ of error to the House of Parliament, and by that house the question was propounded to the bench of judges, whether the judgment upon the second conviction to commence from and after the termination of imprisonment to which he was sentenced for another offense was good in law. The answer was that the judgment of imprisonment is good in law. This case of Rex v. Wilkes is reported in 4 Burrows, 2577, and in 19 Howell's State Trials, 1133, 1134. As appears from the opinion of Chief Justice Wilmot, reported in the last-mentioned book, the doctrine was confined to misdemeanors, the reason being that in treason and felonies a certain known judgment which cannot be departed from, namely in the present tense of the subjunctive passive, must be imposed; but in misdemeanors, where punishment is discretionary, the limitation as to time seems only to be that the punishment shall take place before the total dismissal of the party. A punishment shall not hang over a man's head when he has once been discharged. This declaration respecting felonies has no application in the present case, for the reason that the offenses of which the petitioner was convicted are, under our statutes, high misdemeanors, and the court has a discretion as to limitation of time in the imposition of the punishment. This right to impose consecutive sentences, which had its origin before the American Revolution, is one well recognized in common law. 1 Chitty, Cr. Law, 718; Bish. Cr. Law, § 953; Bish. Cr. Pro. § 1827; Castro v. Reg., 6 App. Cas. 229. The doctrine is one resting in common sense, as well as in authority. It is apparent that, unless consecutive sentences can be imposed, the court must either suspend sentence for one offense until the expiration of the time of imprisonment named in the other sentence, at which time the personnel of the court and of the prosecutor's office may have changed, and the facts essential to the imposition of a sentence become difficult of ascertainment, or else the court must impose concurrent sentences, the effect of which is to entirely nullify the effect of one of them. For these reasons the great weight of authority in this country is that, without any statutory provision for consecutive sentences, the power to impose them resides in the court. Church on Habeas Corpus, 534. Kite v. Comm., 11 Metc. (Mass.) 581; Williams v. State, 18 Ohio St. 46; Brown v. Comm., 4 Rawle, 259, 26 Am. Dec. 130; Mills v. Comm., 13 Pa. 631; In re Esmond (D. C.) 42 Fed. 827; In re Fry, 3 Mackey, 135; Johnson v. People, 83 Ill. 431. The practice of imposing consecutive sentences has, so far as I am aware, been followed in this state during the entire period of its existence as a state. Nor do I find anything in our statutes which in any degree modifies the power of the court in this respect.

The counsel for the petitioner insists that a provision of the criminal procedure act, now embodied in section 67, p. 891, of the crim. proc. act of 1898, exhibits a legislative intention inconsistent with the imposition of consecutive sentences. This provision in substance enacts that upon a sentence of imprisonment in the State Prison the sheriff or his deputy shall, within 15 days after sentence and receipt of a copy of the taxed bill of costs, transport to the said prison, and deliver to the custody of the keeper thereof, the person so sentenced. It then provides that the person so delivered shall be safely kept therein until the time of his confinement shall have expired, and the costs of prosecution be paid or remitted or otherwise discharged by law. It is perceived that the first part of this provision contains only directions to the sheriff respecting the time he shall have to remove the prisoner to the said prison. The only part of the section which can be regarded as at all in point is the declaration that the person so delivered shall be safely kept in the said prison until the time of his confinement shall have expired. But, conceding the power to impose consecutive sentences, the time of confinement of this petitioner was fixed by the sentences, namely, first seven years and then five years, and the time of his confinement mentioned in the provision will expire when both these terms end. So there seems nothing inconsistent between the declaration of the statute and the imposition of the sentence.

For these reasons, we think the petition should be dismissed and the petitioner remanded.

KNICKERBOCKER IMPORTATION CO. v. STATE BOARD OF ASSESSORS et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

TAXATION—CORPORATIONS—FRANCHISE TAX.

Stock owned by the corporation which issued it should not be considered in determining the amount of the franchise tax or license fee under the corporation tax act.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by the Knickerbocker Importation Company against the State Board of Assessors and others to review a tax assessment. Tax reduced.

Argued June Term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

Rulif V. Lawrence, for prosecutor. Robert H. McCarter, Atty. Gen., for the State.

DIXON, J. The corporation tax act (Gen. St. p. 3335; P. L. 1901, p. 81) imposes on certain domestic corporations an annual license fee or franchise tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent. on all amounts of capital stock issued and outstanding on January 1st up to $3,000,000. The prosecutor, one of these corporations, claims that on September 26, 1903, its entire capital stock, $500,000, was issued to the Cazanove Champagne Company, and afterwards, before January 1, 1904, $346,000 of the stock was returned, and on January 1, 1904, was still held by the Knickerbocker Company. On the evidence before us some doubt may be entertained whether there was ever a real issue of the stock, but, if issued, it was certainly returned and held as claimed. Because of an erroneous report made by the company to the State Board of Assessors, a tax of $500 was levied for January 1, 1904, and the company now seeks to have it reduced to $154, on the ground that the stock so held by it was not outstanding.

On behalf of the state it is insisted that stock once issued is outstanding, within the meaning of the statute, until it has been retired, under the twenty-ninth section of the corporation act. Laws 1896, p. 236, c. 185. But stock thus retired has ceased to exist, and cannot properly be designated as stock at all. I think that the Legislature had in mind only existing stock, out of which it selected that which was outstanding, as the basis of the tax imposed. If all the stock not retired had been intended, it would have been sufficiently described as "stock issued," or, perhaps, with more certainty, as "stock issued and not retired." The Legislature, however, chose a different term to qualify "stock issued," by requiring that it should be also "stock outstanding." If a corporation were incapable of owning stock issued by itself, "stock outstanding" would be equivalent to "stock not retired," for all existing stock must then have been owned by other persons. But before the statute now under consideration was passed the Legislature had empowered domestic corporations to own stock issued by themselves, and the stock so owned still continued in legal contemplation to possess the qualities of real stock. Such stock is, I think, most obviously distinguished from other stock of the corporation by describing it as "not outstanding"; that is, not standing as a real charge against the corporation, just as a municipal bond in the sinking fund of the municipality might be regarded as an obligation not outstanding. But, even if it be conceded that the argument of the learned Attorney General creates some doubt, it should be remembered that, in the interpretation of tax laws for the purpose of ascertaining what persons and things are subjected to taxation, the courts incline to a strict, rather than a liberal, construction, on the idea that the Legislature, in imposing public burdens, will express its intention with clearness. We think it is not clearly declared that stock in the corporate treasury must be included in fixing the amount of this franchise tax.

The tax should be reduced to $154. No costs are allowed.

GRAVES v. WOODBRIDGE TP.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF JURY.

Findings of fact by a district court upon a trial without a jury are binding upon this court, unless unsupported by testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 3955-3995½.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of New Brunswick.

Action by Ferdinand L. Graves against the township of Woodbridge. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

C. D. Ward, for appellant. Ephraim Outter, for appellee.

GARRISON, J. Plaintiff sued the township of Woodbridge for the damages occasioned by his carriage being overturned by a miry place in the highway. The action is founded upon the following statute: "That if any damage shall happen to any person or persons, his, her or their team, carriage or other property, by means of the insufficiency or want of repairs of any public road in any of the townships of this state, the person or persons sustaining such damage shall have the right to recover the same with costs in an action on the case in any court of competent jurisdiction in this state, to be instituted by said person or persons, his, her or their executors or administrators, against such township by its corporate name." Gen. St. N. J. p. 2844, § 192.

It was incumbent upon the plaintiff, under his state of demand, to prove by preponderance of testimony the want of repair in the highway to which he ascribed his accident.

The state of the case settled by the judge who tried the issue in the district court of Perth Amboy, without a jury, fails to show that the plaintiff successfully sustained this burden; but, on the contrary, when taken in connection with his verdict, shows that the highway had just been repaired, and that the accident was attributable to natural causes, for which the defendant was not chargeable. There is nothing in the case that suggests that this finding of fact is not supported by the testimony.

Under these circumstances the judgment of the district court must be affirmed.

CITY OF PASSAIC v. PATERSON BILL POSTING, ADVERTISING & SIGN PAINTING CO.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 20, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ORDINANCES — BILLBOARDS.

A city ordinance requiring that sign or billboards shall be constructed not less than 10 feet from the street line is a regulation not reasonably necessary for the public safety, and cannot be justified as an exercise of the police power.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

The Paterson Bill Posting, Advertising & Sign Painting Company was convicted of violation of an ordinance of the city of Passaic, and brings error. Reversed.

William B. Gourley, for plaintiff in error. James Sullivan, for defendant in error.

SWAYZE, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of the violation of an ordinance of the city of Passaic regulating signs or billboards and the conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court. 71 N. J. Law, 75, 58 Atl. 343. The ordinance provides that no sign or billboard shall be at any point more than eight feet above the surface of the ground, and requires that it shall be constructed not less than ten feet from the street line. The statutory authority for this ordinance is the act of April 8, 1903 (P. L. 1903, p. 513, c. 240), which authorizes the governing body of any city to regulate the size, height, location, position, and material of all fences, signs, billboards, and advertisements. The statute does not limit the power of the municipal authorities to cases where the structures may be in a condition dangerous to the public safety, and the first section of the ordinance absolutely prohibits signs and billboards within ten feet of the street line. In the present case, the billboard was erected in 1902, prior to the passage of the act, and the police justice has certified that no evidence was offered of it being dangerous to life or limb because of insecure fastening. It is obvious that the effect of the ordinance is to deprive the landowner of the ordinary use for a lawful business purpose of a portion of his land. Such deprivation is a taking within the meaning of the constitutional provision (Trenton Water Power Co. v. Raff, 86 N. J. Law, 335, approved by this court in Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Angel, 41 N. J. Eq. 316, 7 Atl. 432, 56 Am. Rep. 1); and where no compensation is given to the land owner, the taking can only be justified if it is done in the exercise of the police power of the state.

Upon this question the legal rule is accurately stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court in this case as follows: "The true rule to be extracted from the cases, and the one abundantly supported by them, is that when statutes are obviously intended to provide for the public safety, and the ordinances prescribed under them are reasonable and in compliance with their purposes, both the statutes and the ordinances are lawful, and must be given due effect. When the control attempted to be exercised over private rights is in excess of that essential to effectuate such legitimate authority, it deprives the owner of his property, by circumscribing the use of it, without giving him the just compensation secured to him in such case by the organic law." The Supreme Court held that because the erection of such signs might be attended with danger to the public at times of severe storms or by the decay of their supports, the ordinance was not without legal authority. In our opinion the legality of the ordinance does not depend upon the possibility of danger thus suggested, but upon whether such a regulation is reasonably necessary for the public safety. There must always be a possibility of danger from the erection of any structure, and from its decay; but such a possibility is not sufficient to justify the municipal authorities in depriving a man of the ordinary use of his land. In all our cities and towns, fences and buildings are erected upon the street line, involving the same or even greater possibility of danger from severe storms or natural decay, but it would hardly be maintained that a municipality could be authorized by the Legislature to compel the owners of buildings already erected to take them down or move them 10 feet back from the street line. Yet the danger to the public from bricks or slates, ice and snow, falling from a building is much greater than any possible danger from a billboard. In determining whether a regulation is reasonably necessary to secure the public safety, and therefore within the legitimate exercise of the police power, existing habits and customs are of great weight, and the universal custom of building upon the street line is cogent evidence that the public safety does not require that structures like billboards should be set back from the line. The very fact that this ordinance is directed against sign and billboards only, and not against fences, indicates that some consideration other than the public safety led to its passage. It is obvious from the face of the ordinance that the object of the first section was not to secure the public safety; that section contains no reference to a dangerous condition of billboards, while the second section expressly undertakes to deal with those that become dangerous.

We think the control attempted to be exercised is in excess of that essential to effect the security of the public. It is probable that the enactment of section 1 of the ordinance was due rather to æsthetic considerations than to considerations of the public safety. No case has been cited, nor are we aware of any case which holds that a man may be deprived of his property because his tastes are not those of his neighbors. Æsthetic considerations are a matter of luxury and indulgence rather than of necessity, and it is necessity alone which justifies the exercise of the police power to take private property without compensation. In two similar cases, the courts of other states have reached the same result. Crawford v. Topeka, 51 Kan. 756, 33 Pac. 476, 20 L. R. A. 692, 37 Am. St. Rep. 323; Commonwealth v. Boston Advertising Co., 188 Mass. 348, 74 N. E. 601. The view taken by the majority of the Appellate Division in New York is to the same effect. People v. Green (Sup.) 83 N. Y. Supp. 460. In Missouri it was held that the owners of property along a boulevard could not be restricted from building within forty feet of the street. St. Louis v. Hill, 116 Mo. 527, 22 S. W. 861, 21 L. R. A. 226. And in Maryland it was held that an ordinance of Baltimore forbidding the grant of a building permit unless in the judgment of the municipal board, the size, general character, and appearance of the building would conform to the general character of the buildings previously erected in the same locality, was invalid. The proposed building in that case was for the purpose of showing wild animals and in reality conducting a continuous circus performance upon one of the most beautiful streets in Baltimore. Bostock v. Sams, 95 Md. 400, 52 Atl. 665, 59 L. R. A. 282, 93 Am. St. Rep. 394. The case differs from Rideout v. Knox, 148 Mass. 368, 19 N. E. 890, 2 L. R. A. 81, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560. The statute in that case gave a right of action in tort to an adjoining owner where a fence unnecessarily exceeding six feet in height was maliciously erected and maintained. Two elements were necessary for the right of action; the unnecessary character of the fence, and the malicious motive; and the court held that not only must the motive be malicious but the malevolence must be the dominant motive. Such a statute does not deprive the landowner of any ordinary or beneficial use of his property. It merely prevents him from using it to injure his neighbors without benefit to himself. In Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 58 N. E. 678, 79 Am. St. Rep. 659, 53 L. R. A. 548, the ordinance under consideration went no further than to require the permission of the common council for the erection of a billboard more than 6 feet in height, and that permission could only be given after notice to owners and occupants of land within 200 feet. The ordinance did not authorize the council to regulate the location and position of the billboard, and we must assume that in granting or withholding the permission, the council would act judicially and solely with reference to considerations of the safety, health, or morals of the public. The court said: "We think this statute conferred upon the common council of the city authority to regulate boards erected for the purpose of bill posting, so far, at least, as such regulation was necessary to the safety or welfare of the inhabitants of the city or persons passing along its streets." The invalidity of the ordinance in the present case, in our opinion, lies in the fact that it exceeds that necessity. Since the effect of the ordinance is to take private property without compensation, and cannot be justified as an exercise of the police power, it is invalid.

The judgment of the Supreme Court should be reversed, and a judgment entered reversing the conviction.

FLAHERTY v. PACK et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

NEW TRIAL—TIME FOR APPLICATION.

A district court has no authority to grant a new trial upon an application made more than 30 days after judgment, unless the application is based on newly discovered evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 240.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari to District Court of Atlantic City.

Action by James Flaherty against William H. Pack and others. Judgment for plaintiff. On an order setting aside the same, plaintiff brings certiorari. Order set aside.

Argued June term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

Thompson & Cole, for prosecutor. Eli H. Chandler, for defendants.

DIXON, J. In a case commenced by attachment in the district court of Atlantic City the plaintiff on September 17, 1903, obtained judgment after a hearing, without the defendants having entered an appearance to the action under sections 71 and 72 of the district court act (P. L. 1898, pp. 583, 584). In December 1904 the defendants moved to open the judgment so that a new trial might be had, and on January 5, 1905, the court made an order granting the motion. This order the prosecutor seeks to have set aside for lack of authority in the court to make it.

The power of district courts to grant new trials is derived from, and therefore limited by the seventeenth section of the statute above cited (page 559), which enacts that "In every case tried in any of said courts the judge may * * * order a new trial * * * provided that application for such new trial, except where the said application is based on newly discovered evidence, shall be made within thirty days after judgment." In the present case the application on which the new trial was ordered was not based on newly discovered evidence, and assuming, without deciding, that the hearing was a trial within the intent of the statute, the application was not made in time to authorize its allowance. The fact that a previous application had been made in time did not alter the legal situation. When that application was on April 14, 1904, formally and finally overruled, the power of the court to grant a new trial was exhausted, unless newly discovered evidence was presented.

The order under review must be set aside, with costs.

FRANZ-MILTON CO. v. HALL.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

APPEAL—SETTLEMENT OF CASE.

If the party who has appealed from a judgment of a district court fails to have the state of the case agreed upon or settled, and also fails to obtain a grant of further time therefor within 15 days after the judgment, his right to prosecute the appeal is at an end.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 1923.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Trenton.

Action by the Franz-Milton Company against William I. Hall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRISON, SWAYZE, and DIXON, JJ.

John T. Bird, for the motion. John H. Backes, opposed.

DIXON, J. On September 28, 1905, the district court of Trenton rendered judgment for the defendant, and on October 7th the plaintiff gave notice of appeal, and executed the necessary bond, which was approved by the judge of the court and filed. On October 21st the judge, at the request of the plaintiff made after the rendition of judgment, reduced his findings of law and fact to writing, and filed the same, and on November 6th, he signed an order granting the plaintiff 15 days thereafter, in which to have a state of the case agreed upon or settled. The defendant now moved to dismiss the appeal, insisting that, after the lapse of 15 days from the date of the judgment, the judge had no authority to extend the time for preparing the case on appeal.

We think this position of the defendant is correct. The provisions of the act giving the right of appeal (P. L. 1902, p. 565) are evidently intended to secure a speedy hearing, and in furtherance of that intent we think the third section shall be held to mean that, if the appellant allows 15 days to elapse after judgment without having the case agreed upon or settled, and without obtaining from the judge an extension of time therefor, his right to prosecute the appeal is at an end. Jones v. Proprietors, 36 N. J. Law, 206; Jones v. Morristown Aqueduct Co., 37 N. J. Law, 556. The request of the plaintiff that the judge would put his findings in writing, although assented to by the judge, cannot be deemed an implied extension, because the grant of further time should be in writing, and for a definite period, in order that the adverse party may be able to learn when the appeal is being duly prosecuted. Perhaps the assent of the judge to write down and file his particular findings of fact and law might have been regarded as a postponement of the final rendition of judgment, but it was not so treated by either the judge or the appellant; and it would not now avail the appellant for us so to treat it, because the appellant did not give notice of appeal and enter into bond within 10 days after the findings were filed, or have a state of the case perfected or an order of extension signed within 15 days after such filing.

The appeal must be dismissed.

CITY OF LAMBERTVILLE v. APPLE-GATE.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ORDINANCES — VALIDITY—LEGISLATIVE DISCRETION.

When the authority to impose a penalty conferred upon the legislative body of a municipality involves a purely legislative discretion, such body must itself exercise such discretion by fixing the precise sum of such penalty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, §§ 154, 1310.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Richard B. Applegate against the city of Lambertville to review a conviction of a violation of a city ordinance. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Walter F. Hayhurst and Frank S. Katzenbach, for prosecutor. Lambert H. Sergeant, for defendant.

GARRISON, J. The prosecutor of this writ of certiorari was convicted before a justice of the peace of the violation of an ordinance of the city of Lambertville, entitled "An ordinance to license and regulate hawkers and peddlers," passed September 6, 1893. Judgment was given for $10 penalty and costs.

The charter of the city of Lambertville (P. L. 1863, p. 960, § 21) authorizes the passage of such an ordinance. Section 23 (page 962) provides "that in all cases where by the provisions of this act the common council have authority to pass ordinances on any subject they may prescribe a penalty or penalties for violation thereof, either by imprisonment, not exceeding seven days if in the town jail, or by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or both."

The ordinance under review in its fourth section provides:

"Sec. 4. Any person found guilty of a violation of this ordinance shall be fined a sum not less than five dollars nor more than twenty dollars or be imprisoned in the city jail for a time not exceeding seven days or in the common jail of the county of Hunterdon not exceeding sixty days, or to be both fined and imprisoned."

This delegation to the magistrate of the power to fix the penalty for the violation of the ordinance is not within the authority conferred by the Legislature upon the common council of the city of Lambertville. Slocum v. Ocean Grove, 59 N. J. Law, 110, 35 Atl. 794.

The determination of the penalty that will be likely to induce peddlers to take out the prescribed license or to deter them from pursuing their calling without one is purely a legislative question; hence when the authority to prescribe such penalty is conferred upon a legislative body such body must itself fix the precise sum of such penalty. Young & McShea v. Atlantic City, 60 N. J. Law, 125, 37 Atl. 444.

This is equally so with respect to license fees imposed for revenue. Where the fixing of the amount of the penalty presents a judicial question arising from the circumstances of each case that calls for its imposition, the exercise of such right by a magistrate within limits prescribed by the legislative body of the municipality is not deemed a delegation by such body of its authority, but only a mode for its more efficient exercise. Haynes v. Cape May, 52 N. J. Law, 180, 19 Atl. 176.

It is a question of legislative intention for the ascertainment of which the guide applicable to the present case is that a legislative function conferred upon a legislative body is intended to be exercised by it, and not to be handed over to the determination of a judicial tribunal.

The ordinance brought up by this writ being invalid in this essential particular, the conviction of the prosecutor under it is set aside without regard to the other reasons filed and argued by him.

LANG v. MAYOR OF CITY OF BAYONNE et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DISMISSAL OF PATROLMAN.

The action of a de facto board of police commissioners, expelling a patrolman from the police force, is as to him valid.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Rule to show cause why mandamus should not issue on the petition of Lewis Lang against the mayor and chief of police of the city of Bayonne. Rule discharged.

. Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON, GARRISON, GARRETSON, and SWAYZE, JJ.

Gilbert Collins, for the rule. Thomas F. Noonan, opposed.

GARRISON, J. The relator was appointed as a patrolman on the police force of the city of Bayonne on July 3, 1893, and served continuously as such until April 24, 1905, when after notice and a hearing he was expelled by a resolution of the board of police commissioners of that city. His present application is for a mandamus requiring the mayor and chief of police to assign him to duty as a patrolman on the police force of the city.

If the action of the board of commissioners by which the relator was expelled from the police force was as to him valid, his present application, of course, must fail. His contention is that his said expulsion was invalid, for the reason that the act of the Legislature (P. L. 1905, p. 155, c. 76) under which the board of police commissioners was created was unconstitutional.

This contention, if sound, avails the relator nothing. The board at the time it directed his expulsion was a de facto body, exercising public functions under a color of right. Hence, its acts so far as the relator is concerned are valid. Mitchell v. Tolan, 38 N. J. Law, 201; Bownes v. Meehan, 45 N. J. Law, 189; Dugan v. Farrier, 47 N. J. Law, 383, 1 Atl. 751.

The rule to show cause will be discharged.

CONN v. REED, DAWSON & CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

SALE — FAILURE TO DELIVER — LIABILITY OF CONSIGNEE — DEFAULT OF CARRIER.

As between consignee and consignor, the loss of goods by a common carrier falls upon the consignor when the carrier was selected by him in the performance of his agreement to make a delivery to the consignee.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Newark.

Action by Charles G. Conn against Reed, Dawson & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The case settled by the judge of the district court is as follows:

"The suit was brought to recover the amount due on a book account for goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendants. The trial was had before the court without a jury and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff for $160.60.

"I find the facts of the case as follows:

"Plaintiff, a manufacturer of musical instruments at Elkhart, Ind., agreed with defendants, retailers, of the city of Newark, in this state, to consign to them on sale certain goods, the same to be paid for when sold by defendants, and the latter to have the right to return at their expense any goods which they might not sell and to have credit for the same. In pursuance of that agreement plaintiff shipped to defendants several consignments of goods, and payments were made and goods returned on account from time to time. After thus dealing for something over one year, the account was closed at request of the plaintiff, and defendants agreed to settle the account by the payment of cash and return of goods then remaining in their hands. Defendants packed and shipped all the said goods remaining, but when the packages were delivered to the plaintiff it was discovered that certain instruments were missing. The price at which the missing instruments were bought by defendants was $61.60; and it is only this item of plaintiff's claim which the defendants dispute.

"The amount charged to defendants before it was agreed that the account should be closed was $199. The price charged for the goods received by plaintiff in return was $38.40, and defendants admitted that they owed plaintiff $99 for instruments sold by them.

"I find that the goods about which the dispute arises were packed and shipped by defendants, but were not received by the plaintiff. The correspondence between the parties, which was admitted in evidence, shows that defendants were to pay all charges of transportation; that the goods consigned by plaintiff to defendant from time to time were shipped by express; that, when the account was closed, plaintiff requested defendants to return the goods by express, and that defendants refused to return goods by express unless plaintiff should pay the charges; and that defendants shipped the goods by freight over the Pennsylvania Railroad. There is no evidence before the court that plaintiff consented to this means of returning the goods, nor is there evidence that he objected to the same after defendant's first refusal to return the goods by express.

"All of which is respectfully submitted this 10th day of March, 1905.

"Thomas J. Lintott, Judge."

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Michael T. Barrett, for appellants. Horton & Tilt, for appellee.

GARRISON, J. (after stating the facts). Upon the case stated by the district court its judgment should be affirmed. The parties, while holding the relation of principal and agent with respect to the title to the goods, dealt at arm's length in reference to the agreement between themselves regarding the manner in which the settlement should be made and the unsold goods returned. Part of this agreement was that the defendant should return such goods and bear the expense of such return. If the parties had agreed as to the method of making such return and the goods had then been lost in transitu, a different question might arise, but here the defendant for his own pecuniary benefit and without the concurrence of the plaintiff selected the mode of carriage he desired and which the plaintiff did not desire; hence the district court properly held that the loss must fall upon the defendant, whose duty it was under the contract to return the goods to the plaintiff, if he would be credited with their value.

For this purpose the railroad company was in no sense the agent of the plaintiff to accept delivery, but, on the contrary, was clearly the agency selected by the defendant to make delivery.

The judgment of the Second district court of Newark is affirmed.

HAINES v. ROGERS et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

EXECUTORS—ACTIONS AGAINST—PLEADING.

A count stating that N. H. in his lifetime was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $500, and made a writing by which he ordered his executors to pay, one year after his death, to plaintiff the sum of $500, does not state a cause of action against the executors. There is no statement of a promise to pay, nor statement of a delivery of the paper. The paper set out is testamentary.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by Sarah B. Haines against Edward Rogers and others. Demurrer to the declaration overruled.

Argued June term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and GARRETSON, GARRISON, and REED, JJ.

Charles Ewan Merriitt, for demurrant. Henry S. Scovel, opposed.

REED, J. This is an action against the executors of Nathan Hollinshead. The first count sets out that Nathan Hollinshead in his lifetime became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $500, and thereupon, in full consideration, did make a certain writing, bearing date May 1, 1888, by which writing he did order and direct his executors, named in his will, to pay said plaintiff, one year from the date of his death, the sum of $500; that said Nathan Hollinshead died November 2, 1903, testate, having appointed the defendants executors; that the will was duly probated; that the plaintiff presented her said claim in writing to both of them, who refused to pay it, and notified her to bring suit therefor. There is attached to the declaration a writing, presumably the one alluded to in the declaration, but it is not made by reference thereto a part of the declaration itself. The question before us is whether the first count, as it stands, presents a cause of action.

It is clear that the mere statement that the deceased was indebted to the plaintiff presents no cause of action. There must be a statement of a promise to pay, whether the promise is express or implied. 1 Chitty on Pleading, p. 802. But, considering the statement of indebtedness as an allegation of a valuable consideration, does a written order create a right of action? The writing itself contains no admission of the existence of a debt. The pleader does not say that the written order was executed to pay $500, being the amount which he was indebted to the plaintiff. Nor as a promise to pay a debt would it have any efficacy, for it never was delivered to the plaintiff, and was revocable at any time. Indeed, the writing seems to have been testamentary in character, and void for want of proper execution as a will. In Cover v. Stem, 67 Md. 449, 10 Atl. 231, 1 Am. St. Rep. 406, an order by the deceased upon his executors to pay at his death to a certain person a certain sum was held to be void, as testamentary in character, although sealed, thus importing a consideration, and also delivered. Upon the first count judgment must be for the demurrant.

The remainder of the declaration contains the common counts, without reference to the paper writing, so is good. Upon this there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

BUTLER et ux. v. HOBOKEN PRINTING & PUBLISHING CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. NEW TRIAL—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

On a rule to show cause a new trial may be granted, where an error has resulted in a verdict for excessive damages, although such error was not the subject of an exception at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 131.]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER—DAMAGES.

In an action for libel or slander, damages cannot be assessed for physical sickness alleged to have been caused by the libel or slander.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, §§ 343, 347.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by Frank E. Butler and Annie E. Butler against the Hoboken Printing & Publishing Company. Verdict for plaintiffs. Rule to show cause made absolute.

Argued June term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and GARRETSON, GARRISON, and REED, JJ.

McCarter, Williamson & McCarter, for plaintiffs. Bedle, Edwards & Thompson, for defendant.

REED, J. This is an action for damages for libel, defaming the plaintiff. The plaintiff was a professional rifle expert. Her professional name is Annie Oakley. As such she traveled with Buffalo Bill's show for a number of years. The Hoboken Observer, published by the defendant, published an article headed "Downfall of a Famous Woman Sharpshooter. Annie Oakley, a Victim of Drugs, Sent to Jail." It was asserted that Annie Oakley was a prisoner in the Harrison street police court; that she was arrested, charged with robbery; that she pleaded guilty, and was fined; that according to the police she was addicted to the use of drugs; that she was formerly with Buffalo Bill's show; that she was then destitute, and forced to accept shelter from an old colored man named Curtis; that a justice of the peace sent her to bridewell for 25 days. For the injury occasioned by this publication this action was brought, and a verdict of $3,000 recovered. This hearing is upon the return of a rule to show cause why this verdict should not be set aside and a new trial granted. It appears that the same item was sent out from Chicago, and was published in a number of newspapers throughout the country. The trial justice very properly charged that the defendant was liable for only that portion of the entire injury resulting from these publications as could be attributed particularly to the defendant. The trial justice also properly overruled testimony to show the particulars of actions brought against other newspapers for publishing a similar libel and the amount of damages received in some of those suits.

There is, however, another phase of the case which seems to call for more consideration. The declaration charged, as the result of the publications, that the defendant was greatly injured in health and obliged to go to great expense for procuring physicians and medicines. The trial justice charged that the defendant was responsible for so much of the injury to her health and resultant disability to follow her profession as was produced by this article. No exception was taken to this part of the charge, nor was the attention of the trial justice called to this language, nor, indeed, was any modification of this language suggested. The counsel for the defendant now insists that injury to health is not a legitimate element of damage in actions for defamation of character. Even if this insistent is well grounded, as no exception was taken at the trial to the charge, the defendant is not strictissimi juris entitled to now raise that point. When an exception is taken to an instruction or to the admission of illegal evidence, the court, upon motion for a new trial, will not set aside the verdict if it appears that justice has been done. So, on the other hand, a verdict may be set aside when the rules of damages adopted are erroneous or testimony concerning them irrelevant, although no objection was made at the trial. Stewart's Digest, pp. 838, 839, §§ 10, 11, 40; Lippincott v. Souder, 8 N. J. Law, 161-165; Hatfield v. C. R. R., 33 N. J. Law, 251. The Hoboken Observer is a local newspaper circulating in the southern part of Hudson county. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that the element of ill health and its alleged consequences must have figured most influentially in inducing the jury to award $3,000 as damages. The injury caused by this publication to the private or professional reputation of the plaintiff, she following her profession in Europe as well as the United States, could hardly have been, under the circumstances, equivalent to $3,000. Indeed, in her testimony the money feature of special importance was her inability to shoot because of nervous prostration caused by this and other publications. By reason of this, she says, she was compelled to abandon an arrangement for the season of 1903 by which she was to receive $150 a week. So it would seem clear that this factor must have entered into the assessment of damages returned by the jury. If, therefore, it be true that injury to the health of a libeled person and the consequences flowing therefrom is not a legitimate ground for assessing damages, a new trial should be directed, although the error crept into the trial without objection.

The case upon the authority of which the defendant's insistent is grounded is Terwilliger v. Wands, 17 N. Y. 54, 72 Am. Dec. 420. That was an action for slander charging the plaintiff with unchastity. The special damages proved were impaired health and mental trouble caused by the spoken words. The words spoken were not actionable in themselves, and so it required proof of some special damages to support the action. It was held that ill health, although actually produced by the slander was not, in a legal view, a natural or ordinary consequence of the slander. This case was decided in 1858. Two years later the English Court of Exchequer, in Allsop v. Allsop, 5 Hurl. & N. 534, was called upon to deal with an action for slander, in which damages were claimed for sickness caused by a false charge of unchastity. Pollock, C. B., said: "There is no precedent for any such special damage as that laid in the declaration being made a ground of action, so as to render actionable what would otherwise not be so. * * * This particular damage depends upon the temperament of the party affected, and it may be laid down that illness, arising from the excitement which the slanderous language may produce, is not that sort of damage which forms a ground of action." In Lynch v. Knight, decided in the House of Lords in 1864, and reported in 9 House of Lords Cases, 598, and in 8 English Rul. Cases, 382, 388, Lord Brougham, in giving judgment, remarked: "I think Allsop v. Allsop was well decided, and that mere mental suffering or sickness supposed to be caused by the speaking of words not actionable in themselves, would not be special damages to support the action." Lord Wensleysdale said: "Mental pain or anxiety the law cannot value, and does not pretend to redress when the unlawful act complained of causes that alone; though, where a material damage occurs and is connected with it, it is impossible a jury in estimating it should altogether overlook the feelings of the party interested. For instance, when a daughter is seduced, however deeply the feelings of the parent may be affected by the wicked act of the seducer, the law gives no redress, unless the daughter is also a servant, the loss of whose services is a material damage, which a jury has to estimate. When juries estimate that, they usually cannot avoid considering the injured honor and the wounded feelings of the parent."

Each of the three cases mentioned was an action for slander, and the slander charged was for speaking words which were not actionable per se, and only became such if followed by special damage. The question in each case was in respect to the kind of special damage which would give rise to a cause of action. These cases seem to settle the rule that neither mental suffering nor physical sickness will alone do so in that class of actions. The present action belongs to a different class. The words for which damages are sought, not only charged the defendant with a crime and so were actionable per se, but they were printed and, as a libel, were similarly actionable. In this class of actions for defamation of character, upon proof of the publication, damages are presumed to have accrued; therefore in such actions it is not necessary for the plaintiff in his declaration to plead special damages in order to support his action. If he desires to prove special damages he must plead them, it being the rule that no evidence shall be received of any loss or injury which the plaintiff sustains from the words used unless it be specially stated in the declaration and if named it must be proved as stated. 2 Saunders on Pleading & Evidence, marg. p. 927.

At this point arises the important question whether the range of what may be pleaded or proved as damages is wider in this class of actions than in those which depend entirely upon proof of special damages. Mr. Odgers, after stating the rule respecting special damages in the first class, if they have been properly pleaded proceeds to say that the law is not quite so strict in actions where the words are actionable per se; and that although when the words are not actionable per se, mental distress, illness, etc., do not constitute special damages, yet where the words are actionable per se the jury may take such matters into their consideration in according damages. Odgers on Libel & Slander. His authority for this statement is the remark of Lord Wensleysdale in Lynch v. Knight, supra, already quoted. Now it is to be observed that Lord Wensleysdale did not say that mental sufferings are to be regarded as a subject for special damages when the words are actionable per se. What he did say was that a jury, if permitted to return damages for a legal cause of action, would be influenced by the considerations mentioned. It is conceded, however, that while mental suffering will not support an action for words not actionable per se, nevertheless, damages for mental suffering may be assessed in actions for defamation actionable per se. In Massachusetts, such damages for mental distress are regarded as general, and are recoverable, without being specially pleaded. Chesley v. Thompson, 137 Mass. 136; Lombard v. Lennox, 155 Mass. 76, 28 N. E. 1125, 31 Am. St. Rep. 528. In New York such damages seem to be regarded as punitive and assessable only in cases where there is proof of actual malice. Brooks v. Harrison, 91 N. Y. 83-92; Warner v. P. P. Co., 132 N. Y. 181, 30 N. E. 898; Van Ingen v. Star Co., 1 App. Div. 429, 37 N. Y. Supp. 114, affirmed 157 N. Y. 695, 51 N. E. 1094.

The right of a libeled person to recover damages as a compensation for her feelings was recognized by our Court of Errors and Appeals in the case of Knowlden v. Guardian Printing Co., reported in 55 Atl. 287. Indeed, mental anguish, mortification, and anger are the necessary results from defamation of character, and so may be said to be legally inferred from the fact of defamation. But, when physical injury is predicated of the defamatory words spoken, it cannot be said that it is either the necessary or natural consequence therefrom. In rare instances physical sickness may result from mental worry, but it is an exception to the rule. Even then, it is a step removed from the first result, and cannot be said to be the proximate consequence of the defamatory words. The entire absence of any precedent, so far as I have examined the question, for the assessment of damages in this class of cases for physical ailment is a remarkable feature in the administration of the law, if such right to damages exists. There is an abundance of authority supporting the assessment of damages for mental anxiety, but none for damages for physical sickness. The same may be said of the other class of actions alluded to by Lord Wensleysdale, actions for seduction based upon the fiction of loss of services. By inveterate usage, the relations of master and servant having been established, the parent is to be permitted to recover for injured feelings. But it admittedly rests upon the ground of inveterate usage, and not upon any logical basis. Sedgwick on Damages, p. 542.

In the present case the damages resulting from physical illness which the jury was permitted to consider did not stop with the mere compensation for such physical pain and expenses for medical treatment. The important loss resulting from her broken health was that she was compelled by reason of it to abandon her profession for a season at a loss of $150 a week. This alleged loss, it is perceived, did not result from failure to procure engagements by reason of loss of professional standing caused by the defendant's words. The loss of employment, therefore, was not the result of injured reputation, but of physical inability to shoot. This inability is traced back to mental worry, which resulted from knowledge by the plaintiff that she had been defamed. I am of the opinion that damages for loss of earnings so resulting, as well as for physical distress, are too remote. Nor can the amount of damages found be vindicated upon the ground that they might have been exemplary. The absence of actual malice was admitted by the plaintiff upon the trial, and the right to recover punitive damages was disclaimed.

The rule should be made absolute.

SPROUL et al. v. BOROUGH OF STOCKTON.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF SIDEWALKS—PROCEDURE.

An ordinance of the borough of Stockton undertook to make it lawful for the borough council to require the construction of sidewalks by resolution when in their judgment it might be necessary. Held that, notwithstanding this ordinance, the council must proceed in accordance with the statute, by general or special ordinance, to require the construction of a sidewalk.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 802.]

2. SAME—SHADE TREES—REGULATION.

A borough ordinance, which makes it the duty of any person having shade or ornamental trees in a street to cut down and remove the same within 10 days after notice so to do, is not authorized by the statutory power to regulate the planting and protection of shade trees.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Amy H. Sproul and Hannah Dilts against the borough of Stockton to review an assessment. Assessment set aside.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON and SWAYZE, JJ.

H. B. Herr, for prosecutors. O. I. Blackwell and George H. Large, for defendant.

SWAYZE, J. The assessment is for the cost of a new sidewalk, and of removing a tree. It is sought to sustain it under two ordinances. The first ordains that, to provide for the construction, relaying, repairing, and keeping in repair the sidewalks on any and all streets, roads, and public places in the borough, it shall be lawful for the common council, by resolution, when in their judgment it may be necessary to construct, relay, or repair said sidewalk, to order and require the owners of the respective lots fronting on such streets, roads, or public places to construct, relay, or repair said sidewalks with the same or any other material, and of such width as they may determine and adjudge that there is a public necessity for so doing. The ordinance does not provide that any specified sidewalk, nor that all the sidewalks in the borough, shall be constructed, relaid, or repaired. It seeks only to authorize the common council to act by resolution when in their judgment it may be necessary. The statute requires that it act by general or special ordinance. P. L. 1897, p. 301, § 33, pt. 3. It might, under this power, provide for the construction of sidewalks in all streets, or in specified streets, or in a single street, or perhaps in a portion of a street; but that is not the aim of this ordinance. There is another objection equally serious. By the amendment of the borough act (P. L. 1899, p. 171) ordinances passed pursuant to section 33 must be preceded by an application in writing for such improvement, describing the nature, kind, and extent of the work or improvement desired, signed by at least 10 freeholders of the borough, residing therein. There seems to have been no such application in this case. It is argued that this application is not required when the only thing to be done is to repair the sidewalk. Whether the substitution of a flag sidewalk for a board walk is a repair may well be doubted, but need not be decided, since section 33, pt. 3, relates to repairs as well as to original construction. The assessment for the sidewalk was without warrant.

The removal of the tree is justified under an ordinance which makes it the duty of any person having shade or ornamental trees, shrubs, or bushes, in any street or public grounds to cut down and remove the same within 10 days after having been properly notified so to do. The case fails to show that any notice was given, but the ordinance itself cannot be sustained. The statutory power of the council is to regulate the planting and protection of shade trees in the streets and parks. P. L. 1897, p. 296, § 28, pt. 1. The attempt of the ordinance is to compel the cutting down and removal of all trees upon notice. This is not protection, but destruction. The council is empowered to prevent and remove all obstructions, encroachments, incumbrances, and nuisances in and upon any street or sidewalk. Such a power is only a police ministerial power to prevent and relieve the public from such obstructions in the enjoyment of their streets as are apparent or readily ascertainable without the necessity of any adjudication. Associates of the Jersey Company v. Jersey City, 34 N. J. Law, 31, 38, 39. Such a power does not authorize the summary removal of growing trees without notice to the owner. Avis v. Vineland, 56 N. J. Law, 474, 28 Atl. 1039, 23 L. R. A. 685. Such trees are not necessarily an unlawful incumbrance or encroachment. In a proper case an action lies in favor of the landowner for their destruction. Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. Law, 524, 61 Am. Dec. 678. In the present case no attempt was made to adjudge that the tree in question was an obstruction, encroachment, incumbrance, or nuisance. The testimony taken after the destruction of the tree, and after the writ in this case was allowed, cannot take the place of a prior adjudication. The landowner was entitled to notice. Vantilburgh v. Shann, 24 N. J. Law, 740; Clark v. Pierson, 37 N. J. Law, 216; Dawes v. Hightstown, 45 N. J. Law, 127.

The assessment must be set aside, with costs.

MILLER v. BARBER et al.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

INSANE PERSONS—AVOIDING CONVEYANCE—TENDER OF CONSIDERATION.

Payment or tender of the consideration received by the lunatic, after proper reduction for rents and profits, is a condition precedent to avoidance of his deed of assignment for a valuable consideration of a leasehold interest, made before his lunacy was found by commission, to one having no knowledge or notice of the insanity and acting in good faith, so that such assignee is entitled to judgment in ejectment for the premises against the lunatic's guardian, she having made no payment or legal tender, but merely requested a reconveyance, and offered to return the consideration on ascertainment of the amount due after an accounting of the rents; the guardian having the right, however, to further proceed in such action, or by bill in chancery, on her right to avoid the deed, on making a proper tender or bringing the money into court.

Action by Alexander A. Miller against Siscilia Barber and others. Heard on plaintiff's motion for judgment on a special verdict. Judgment for plaintiff.

Argued June term, 1905, before PITNEY, J.

George H. Pierce and Coult, Howell & Ten Eyck, for plaintiff. Alonzo Church, for defendants.

PITNEY, J. This is a motion to enter judgment for the plaintiff upon a special verdict in ejectment. Plaintiff claims the right of possession as assignee of a leasehold interest in the premises. The verdict sets forth that one John Barber, being owner of the entire leasehold interest in question, and being in actual possession of the whole of the premises as such lessee, assigned the leasehold interest to one Anna Miller, who, in turn, assigned it to the plaintiff. John Barber was at the time mentally incapable of understanding the nature and effect of the transaction in which he was engaged. The assignment, although taken in the name of Anna Miller, was taken by her for the plaintiff's benefit through one August Miller, who acted as the plaintiff's agent in the negotiations for and purchase of the lease. He did not know at the time, nor did he have such knowledge as would have led a reasonably prudent person to believe, that John Barber was mentally incapable. The price paid by August Miller, as agent for the plaintiff, to John Barber as the consideration for the assignment was $3,500, which was paid to Barber in cash. This was $1,500 less than the fair market value of the leasehold interest. Immediately after the assignment Barber disappeared, and his whereabouts from that time have been unknown. The family of Barber, who are defendants in this suit, continued to occupy a part of the premises and refused to recognize the assignment, having neither paid rent to the plaintiff nor recognized his title as owner of the lease. Shortly after the disappearance of John Barber a commission in lunacy was issued by the Court of Chancery, under which he was found to be a lunatic, and his daughter Matilda Barber was appointed his guardian prior to the beginning of this action. She was in actual possession of a part of the premises, with her mother and brothers and sisters, at the commencement of this suit. No formal tender of any amount was ever made by or on behalf of Barber or his guardian either to Anna Miller or to the plaintiff or to any one representing him; but Matilda Barber, as guardian, through her attorney, prior to the beginning of this action, requested a reconveyance of the leasehold interest, and offered to return the amount of the consideration paid to John Barber, upon proper ascertainment of the amount remaining due after an accounting should be had of the rents received by the plaintiff up to that time for the residue of the premises. This offer was refused.

It is properly conceded by counsel for defendants that since John Barber's deed of assignment was made before his lunacy was found by commission, and since the plaintiff or his agent had no knowledge or notice of the insanity, and dealt with the lunatic in good faith, paying for the assignment a good and valuable consideration, the deed is not void, but only voidable, and that it can be avoided only on paying or tendering back to the plaintiff the consideration paid to him, less so much as he has received by way of rents and profits since the assignment. Eaton v. Eaton, 37 N. J. Law, 108, 116, 18 Am. Rep. 716; Blakeley v. Blakeley, 33 N. J. Eq. 502, 508; Doughten v. Camden B. & L. Ass'n, 41 N. J. Eq. 556, 561, 7 Atl. 479; Matthiessen & Weichers Refining Co. v. McMahon's Adm'r, 38 N. J. Law, 536. Until avoidance the deed of the lunatic in such cases remains good in law. Payment or tender of the consideration money received by the lunatic, less any proper offsets, is a condition precedent to avoidance. The special verdict in the present case does not set forth a legal tender, and there is, therefore, no legal obstacle to the recovery by the plaintiff of the premises in dispute. As the case stands, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the special verdict. This judgment, of course, will only settle the legal title and right of possession as they stand at present. Ejectment Act, §§ 42, 43, 44 (Gen. St. p. 1288). Whenever the deed of the lunatic shall be legally avoided, the premises may be recovered back from the plaintiff, for the judgment herein will not conclude the defeated party as to a title or right of possession subsequently accruing. Hoboken L. & I. Co. v. Mayor, etc., of Hoboken, 36 N. J.

Law, 540, 545; Hunt v. O'Neill, 44 N. J. Law, 564. Nor does it necessarily follow, even from the present judgment, that the defendants must submit to be actually ousted from the premises. They, or at least one of them (the guardian in lunacy), asserts a right to avoid the deed of assignment, which right is legally incomplete because the tender has not been effectively made and followed up. The judgment herein will not be conclusive against such an equity. The guardian is still at liberty to assert it by making an effective tender of the amount paid by the plaintiff to John Barber, with interest, subject to a proper discount for the amount of rentals received by the plaintiff from the premises since the assignment.

Whether this relief shall be sought by the defendants through application to this court for a stay of execution, or by bill in chancery to restrain the enforcement of the judgment in ejectment, is for the defendants to determine. It is well settled that this court, like other courts of law, has a summary jurisdiction of an equitable nature, exercised through stay of execution and the like, for the purpose of preventing its own judgments and process from being made the means of working injustice. Numerous instances of the exercise of this jurisdiction are cited in Johnston v. Bowers, 69 N. J. Law, 544, 547, 55 Atl. 230. See, also, Wemple's Adm'r v. Van Arx, 46 N. J. Law, 531; Hickman v. State, 62 N. J. Law, 499, 504, 41 Atl. 942; Weatherby v. Weatherby's Ex'rs, 63 N. J. Law, 445, 448, 43 Atl. 683; Intiso v. Metropolitan, etc., Assoc., 68 N. J. Law, 588, 590, 53 Atl. 206; Bailey v. Penna. R. R. Co., 70 N. J. Law, 308, 311, 58 Atl. 83.

Let judgment be entered for the plaintiff upon the special verdict, with a stay of execution for 30 days, within which time the defendants may apply either to the Court of Chancery for an injunction or to this court for a further stay, on bringing into court a proper sum to cover what will be found due to the plaintiff for the consideration paid to John Barber, with interest, after proper allowance on account of rents and profits received by the plaintiff from the property.

BRADY v. FRANKLIN SAVINGS INSTITUTION OF NEWARK.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)
MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED—ESTOPPEL.

The plaintiff acquired an interest in mortgaged premises after a final decree on foreclosure of the mortgage, and thereupon made a payment to the solicitor of the mortgagee on account of interest, costs, and sheriff's fees. No credit was made for this payment, and upon a subsequent sale of the mortgaged premises the mortgagee was paid the full amount of the decree. Thereafter the plaintiff applied to the Court of Chancery for surplus money, and his share was decreed to be paid to him. In a suit against the mortgagee to recover the amount paid its solicitor, held:

1. That the failure to credit the payment upon the final decree entitled the plaintiff to recover as for money had and received.

2. That the application of the plaintiff to the Court of Chancery for surplus money did not estop him from such recovery.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Newark.

Action by Henry M. Brady against the Franklin Savings Institution of Newark. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON and SWAYZE, JJ.

Edwin A. Rayner and Alexander Grant, for appellant. F. M. P. Pearse, for respondent.

SWAYZE, J. This action was for money had and received. The money had been paid by the plaintiff to the solicitor of the defendant, then the complainant in a foreclosure suit, on account of interest, costs, and sheriff's fees. The mortgaged premises were at the time advertised for sale. The plaintiff had acquired an interest in the property after the final decree. Six months after this payment by the plaintiff the property was sold for more than enough to pay the amount of the decree, and the full amount of that decree with interest and costs was paid to the present defendant, without any credit for the money paid by the plaintiff. Subsequently the plaintiff filed a bill in chancery to secure reimbursement out of the surplus money for all that he had paid on account of the purchase of the property. To this bill he made the sheriff and one Zubler, who was jointly interested with him in the property, parties. The defendant was not a party. The decree adjudged that the defendant was entitled to one-ninth of the surplus money and Zubler to the balance. The district court judge found as a fact that the money paid to the solicitor was not directly involved, nor was the same disposed of in the chancery suit. Judgment was rendered in the district court for one-ninth of the money paid, and the defendant appealed.

The only legal question presented by the state of the case is the admissibility of a letter from the plaintiff's attorney to the solicitor in the foreclosure suit, notifying him not to pay over the money to any person claiming the same. This was objected to as immaterial, and upon the further grounds that it was written by a stranger to the defendant, and that it showed no reason for the claim in that there was only one fund and that fund was then impounded in the Court of Chancery subject to its adjudication. As to the first objection, it is enough to say that, if the evidence was immaterial, no harm was done to the defendant by its admission. Justice v. Davis (N. J. Sup.) 59 Atl. 6. Since the state of the case fails to show that the defendant made any other complaint of the conduct of the trial, we are not required to examine the questions argued in the brief (O'Donnell v. Weller [N. J. Sup.] 59 Atl. 1055); but, inasmuch as the third objection to the admissibility of this letter suggested a defense upon the merits, we have considered the whole case. The situation presented is that the plaintiff paid the defendant (through its solicitor) money to be applied upon the decree of foreclosure, and that the defendant did not apply the money to that purpose. The consideration for the payment failed, and the defendant retained the plaintiff's money. This fund was, by the defendant's failure to act in accordance with the intention when the payment was made, treated as a fund separate and distinct from the fund realized upon the foreclosure sale. It could not have been disposed of by the Court of Chancery on the application for the surplus money. That amount was fixed by the proceeds of sale and the amount decreed to be due. The payment by the sheriff was in accordance with the command of his writ. It is true that the amount of the surplus money would have been greater by $400 if the defendant had made the application of the money to the decree; but the defendant chose not to do so, and it was not obligatory upon the plaintiff to take proceedings in the Court of Chancery to have this credit made. He had the right to treat the decree as an outstanding decree for the full amount, and to make his application for the surplus money on that basis, without making the defendant a party. The defendant then held money of the plaintiff which it had been authorized, but failed, to apply on the decree. Upon its failure, the plaintiff was entitled to reclaim his money. The court below allowed him to recover only one-ninth of the amount, evidently upon the theory that Zubler was interested to the extent of eight-ninths. She would have been so interested if the defendant had applied the money as was contemplated at the time of its payment; but, until that application was made, she had no interest in this fund.

The plaintiff has not appealed, and, as there is no error harmful to the defendant, the judgment must be affirmed, with costs.

WOOLLEY, Custodian of School Moneys, v. HENDRICKSON, Collector of Taxes.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 18, 1905.)

1. SCHOOL AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—TAXATION—VALIDATING TAXES LEVIED—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

The act of October 19, 1903, entitled "An act to validate taxes heretofore levied," etc. (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 96), is constitutional.

2. SAME—EFFECT.

Said act (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 96) has the effect of validating all appropriations, taxes, and assessments theretofore made, levied, and imposed, and all other acts theretofore had, passed, done, or taken, for school purposes, under or pursuant to the provisions of the general school laws of 1900 and 1902, which laws, respectively, were declared unconstitutional in Lewis v. Jersey City, 50 Atl. 346, 68 N. J. Law, 582, and in Riccio v. Hoboken, 55 Atl. 1109, 69 N. J. Law, 649, 63 L. R. A. 485.

3. SCHOOL AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENT OF TAXES.

Upon a review of the general school law of October 19, 1903 (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 5), together with the validating act approved on the same day (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 96), held, that this legislation had not the effect of disarranging pending proceedings for the assessment and collection of taxes already ordered to be raised to meet the payment of school bonds maturing during the school year, even in cases where by section 32 (page 14) of the new general school law the boundaries of school districts were changed, and notwithstanding the provisions of section 34 (page 15) respecting the transfer to new school districts of the obligation to pay outstanding indebtednesses of the former school districts.

4. SAME—OPERATION OF GENERAL SCHOOL LAW.

Section 33 of the new general school law (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 15) indicates a legislative intent to postpone the operation of the act with respect to all fiscal adjustments between new school districts and the former school districts until the end of the then current school year.

5. SAME—BOARDS OF EDUCATION.

Quære, whether the establishment of new boards of education required for the new districts created by section 32 of the act (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 14), and the assumption by new boards of education of outstanding indebtednesses as required by section 34, were not intended to be postponed until after the annual school election that was to be held in March, 1904?

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by the state, on the relation of Thomas R. Woolley, custodian of school moneys of Ocean township school district, for a writ of mandamus to Samuel W. Hendrickson, collector of taxes of the Borough of Deal. Writ granted.

Argued November term, 1904, before FORT and PITNEY, JJ.

John W. Slocum, for relator. Robert L. Lawrence for respondent.

PITNEY, J. This is a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued to require the collector of taxes of Deal borough, in the county of Monmouth, to pay over to the relator, as custodian of school moneys of Ocean township school district, certain moneys in his hands belonging to that district. The controversy is with respect to the sum of $3,057.19, which was assessed in the year 1903 upon the taxpayers resident in Deal borough for school purposes for the school year 1903-04, collected by the respondent, then being tax collector of the borough, and demanded by the relator on June 11, 1904 (prior to the termination of the school year); the relator then being custodian of school moneys of the Ocean township school district, a district that included the territory of the borough of Deal at the time the taxes were ordered and assessed. It is admitted that since the year 1894 the township of Ocean (outside of the Long Branch school district) constituted a township school district, including the boroughs of Deal and Allenhurst, until changed by the new general school law of October 19, 1903.

It is not easy to determine what constitutional legislation existed as a support for the tax proceedings of 1903, at the time those proceedings were taken. A general revision of the school laws enacted in 1900 (P. L. p. 192) was adjudged unconstitutional in Lewis v. Jersey City, 66 N. J. Law, 582, 50 Atl. 340, and a subsequent revision (P. L. 1902, p. 69) was held unconstitutional in Ricclo v. Hoboken, 69 N. J. Law, 649, 55 Atl. 1109, 63 L. R. A. 485. The latter decision was promulgated September 21, 1903; the decision of the Supreme Court in the same case (69 N. J. Law, 104, 54 Atl. 801) having been favorable to the constitutionality of the act of 1902. We find that the proceedings which resulted in the levying and assessment of the taxes in question conformed to the provisions of the act of 1902. This is not disputed. The elimination of that act would have necessitated a search for constitutional enactments antedating the revisions of 1900 and 1902 (a confusing task), but for the fact that shortly after the decision of the Ricclo Case the Legislature met in special session, and not only enacted a new general school law, but also an act (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 93) declaring that all contracts, bonds, and obligations theretofore entered into, made, or incurred, all appropriations, taxes, and assessments theretofore made, levied and imposed, and all other acts theretofore had, passed, done, or taken, for school purposes under or pursuant to the provisions of any law declared by the court to be unconstitutional, were thereby validated and confirmed. We have no doubt of the constitutionality of this validating act, and hence may deal with proceedings antedating its passage, and taken pursuant to the acts of 1900 and 1902, respectively, as being valid in law. Of the $8,057.19 now in controversy, approximately one-half was assessed for the share chargeable upon the taxpayers of Deal borough out of a special school district tax of $3,525 appropriated and ordered to be raised by the voters of the combined school district at their annual meeting, held March 17, 1903, for the purpose of paying teachers' and janitors' salaries and for fuel, repairs, tuition, etc. The remainder of the moneys in question were assessed and collected as the quota chargeable against the taxpayers of Deal borough out of a total tax of $3,690, ordered by the district president and district clerk of the combined school district to be raised for paying principal and interest moneys falling due during the school year upon the bonds of that district. The case shows that the school building for whose construction these bonds were issued was erected in the spring of the year 1900, and is situate in that part of the territory of the township which is outside of the borough limits of Deal. The total bond issue was $11,600, amounting with interest to $13,080. Prior to the school year 1903 $9,340 had been paid for the principal and interest, leaving unpaid only the $3,690, which fell due during the school year 1903-04.

The school law provides what may be called an "automatic tax" (that is, operative without the annual approval of the voters of the school district) for the purpose of raising each year an amount sufficient to pay the bond or bonds of the school district maturing during the year, with the interest accruing upon the unpaid bonds. Thus the statute law has stood at least since 1894. P. L. 1894, p. 515, § 20; Gen. St. p. 3060, pl. 253; P. L. 1900, p. 263, § 211; P. L. 1902, p. 142, § 191; P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 39, § 100. The language of section 191 of the act of 1902 in this behalf is that "whenever a township, incorporated town or borough school district shall have ordered and authorized the issue of bonds and the same shall have been issued, the district clerk shall each and every year issue to the assessor of the taxing district in which such school district shall be situate, an order directing him to assess upon the owners of property in said taxing district and their estates and the taxable property therein, an amount sufficient to pay the bond or bonds maturing in such year, together with the interest accruing upon all the unpaid bonds of such district, which order so issued as aforesaid shall be duly executed by said assessor. The moneys so assessed shall be levied and collected by the collector of said taxing district, who shall, on or before the fifth day of January next thereafter, pay the full amount so ordered to be assessed, levied and collected to the custodian of the school moneys of said school district," etc. Section 100 of the general act of 1903 contains identical language, and from this we derive the duty of the respondent with respect to proceedings from and after its approval on October 19th in that year. By sections 181 and 182 of the act of 1902 (P. L. 1902, p. 138) the collector of the municipality in which a school district was situate was made custodian of school moneys, with the duty of receiving and holding in trust all school moneys belonging to such district, whether received from the state appropriation, state school tax, district tax, appropriation, or from other sources, and of paying out the same only on orders signed by the president and district clerk or secretary of the board of education; it being declared in section 182, in effect, that the township committee, common council, or other governing body of the municipality should have no control over moneys belonging to the school district in the hands of the custodian. By section 183, whenever in any school district there were two or more collectors, the board of education was to appoint a suitable person as custodian of school moneys. By section 184 the collector or treasurer of each municipality in which a school district was situate was required to pay to the custodian of school moneys the amount ordered to be assessed, levied, and collected in such municipality for the use of the public schools therein on the requisition of the board of education. The provisions of the new school law with respect to the custody of school moneys and the duty of the custodian are of like import. P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. pp. 71, 72, §§ 184-186.

The evidence in the case shows that the legal voters of the combined school district, at their annual meeting in March, 1903, ordered a special school district tax of $3,525, and that the assessors of the three municipalities whose territory formed the school district were duly notified of this, and also of the requirement for an assessment of $3,690 to pay principal and interest upon school bonds falling due during the year. The three assessors met at the proper time and apportioned the moneys thus required to be raised among the taxpayers resident in their several municipalities, viz., Deal borough, Allenhurst borough, and the township outside of the boroughs. The amount thus apportioned against the taxpayers of Deal borough was $3,057.19. The evidence also shows that the tax was properly assessed in Deal borough, and that sufficient moneys were realized by the respondent, as collector of that borough, to enable him to pay to the custodian of school moneys the amount assessed for school taxes. The claim of the relator for the payment of these moneys to him, if valid, has preference over the claims of the borough treasury upon the moneys in the collector's hands, under Ross v. Walton, 63 N. J. Law, 435, 44 Atl. 430, affirmed 67 N. J. Law, 688, 52 Atl. 1132; Coe v. Englewood, 68 N. J. Law, 559, 53 Atl. 562. At the beginning of the school year 1903-04, the relator was custodian of school moneys for the combined district. He demanded payment from the respondent of the money in question on June 11, 1904, which was before the termination of the school year. The relator at that time still remained custodian of the combined district, unless his office in that behalf had been terminated by the force and effect of the new general school law of October 19, 1903. Payment of the moneys is resisted on the ground that, by section 32 of the latter act (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 14), each township, city, incorporated town, and borough was made a separate school district, thus abolishing the former combined district of Ocean township, and that by section 34 of the same act the new school district thereby established for the territory of the township of Ocean lying outside of the boroughs became invested with the title of the school building for which the bonds in question had been issued, and that by the terms of section 34 the outstanding bonded indebtedness was made the obligation of the board of education of this new district.

The question is whether this transfer of the burden of outstanding bonded indebtedness has reference to that portion of such indebtedness for whose payment provision had already been made in the tax levies of 1903, and, if so, whether the Legislature intended to effect the purpose by disarranging pending proceedings for the collection and transmission of taxes already levied to meet bond payments, or to reach the same end through the use of other means. In seeking out the Legislative intent upon these points, we must have regard to the whole of the general school law of 1903, and the contemporaneous validating act, and must keep in mind the practical situation that confronted the Legislature at the time they were enacted. These acts were approved on October 19th, in the very midst of the "school year" previously established and by the new act perpetuated for fiscal and administrative purposes, which began on July 1st. P. L. 1903, p. 326, § 2; Gen. St. p. 3050, pl. 206; P. L. 1900, p. 281, § 264; P. L. 1902, p. 165, § 242; P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 93, § 238. Everywhere throughout the state the public schools were being maintained and conducted pursuant to arrangements already undertaken for the full year. Fiscal budgets had already been made up in the several school districts, including provision for payment of all school bonds that were to mature during the school year. The operations of ordering and assessing local taxes for school purposes, throughout all the school districts, had already been completed, the moneys to be raised had already been appropriated to specific purposes exigent during the current year, and the taxes were in course of collection. Among the existing school districts there were many, like that of Ocean township, that had been made up by combining the whole or parts of the territory of adjoining municipalities. These the Legislature designed to dismember, so that school district lines might thenceforth generally conform to municipal boundaries. Without doubt the Ocean township district was only one of many combined districts that had bond payments falling due during the year, to meet which taxes had already been ordered, apportioned and assessed. We may therefore properly treat this typical instance as being distinctly presented to the legislative mind in the framing of the new act. It was by section 32 (P. L. 1903, Sp. Sess. p. 14) that each township, city, incorporated town, and borough was made a separate school district, and the two sections immediately following have reference to adjustments thereby necessitated. These sections are as follows:

"Sec. 33. Whenever a new school district shall be created, the children residing in said new district shall continue to attend the schools in which they shall be enrolled until the end of the then current school year. In case there shall be a schoolhouse in such new district in which school shall be then maintained, the board of education of the school district from which such new district shall have been set off shall have charge and control of such school until the end of the then current school year, and shall pay the salaries of the teachers, janitors and other persons employed in such school until the end of said year. In case there shall be any balance at the end of said school year in the hands of the custodian of the school moneys of the school district to the credit of the school district from which said new district shall have been set off, said custodian shall certify to the county superintendent of schools the amount of such balance, and what portion of such balance was received from state appropriation, state school tax and interest of the surplus revenue, and what portion was received from district school tax. Said county superintendent of schools, upon receipt of such notice, shall divide between said districts that portion of the balance arising from the state appropriation, state school tax and interest of the surplus revenue on the basis of the aggregate number of day attendance of pupils in the public schools as ascertained from the last published report of the state superintendent of public instruction, and shall divide between said districts that portion of said balance arising from district school tax on the basis of the respective ratables of said districts, and shall issue an order in favor of the custodian of the school moneys of such new district for that portion of said balance found to be due said district from the district from which it shall have been set off.

"Sec. 84. In any new school district the board of education, in its corporate capacity, shall become vested with the title to all school property real and personal in such district, and if for the erection, repair or purchase of any such property there shall be an indebtedness for which the board of education of the school district to which said property originally belonged shall be liable, the said indebtedness shall be assumed by and become the obligation of the board of education of the school district which shall have become vested with the title to such property, and upon payment of said indebtedness by the school district originally liable therefor, an action may be maintained therefor by the board of education so paying the said indebtedness against the board of education of the school district which shall have become vested with the property for which the said indebtedness was originally incurred."

The act, by its 247th section, is made to take effect immediately. But this does not make its provisions operative previous to the time when by their own terms, fairly interpreted, they become operative.

Dealing with the case before us as a typical case, for which the Legislature intended to make provision, it will be observed that at the date of the approval of the new act (October 19, 1903) the moneys that the respondent was engaged in collecting from the taxpayers of Deal borough for school purposes were public moneys that, by force of legislation existing at the time the levy was ordered (coupled, if need be, with the validating act already alluded to), had been duly appropriated to specific public purposes, to wit, in part for the maintenance of education in the combined school district during the school year 1903-04, and in part for the payment of principal and interest upon bonded indebtedness of the combined district maturing during the same year. These moneys, when collected, were no longer the property of the taxpayers of Deal borough; but were in every sense public funds in course of transmission to effectuate the ends for which they had been appropriated. The municipal corporation of Deal borough had no possible claim upon them. On the contrary, that corporation and its governing body had been, by express legislative enactment, excluded from any control over or interference with them. Conceding that the Legislature, while enacting the new school law, might have diverted those moneys, or so much thereof as had been previously appropriated toward the bond payments, to another public purpose (such, for instance, as the reimbursement to the taxpayers of Deal borough of a part of what had been already taken from them towards the construction of a schoolhouse which by the same act was vested in a separate school district), the question is whether by a reasonable construction of the whole of the act of 1903 such a diversion of this portion of the public moneys from the purposes for which it had been raised was within the legislative intent. Our examination of the matter constrains us to reply in the negative. Many considerations concur in leading us to this view. In the first place, it is manifest from section 33 that the Legislature realized and intended to avoid the confusion that would have resulted in fiscal arrangements already undertaken if the act had been made operative with respect to these at the date of its passage, occurring in the midst of the fiscal school year. By the express terms of that section (applying them to the case before us) the schoolhouse of the combined district was required to be maintained by the old board of education until the end of the then current school year, and the salaries of teachers, janitors, etc., were to be paid by them, and any balance remaining in the hands of the custodian at the end of the school year was required to be certified to the county superintendent of schools with the sources from which it was derived, and to be by him apportioned. The sources specified in the section include the district school tax. No more express mention is made of moneys raised for bond payments; but, of course, the Legislature contemplated that there would be no balance remaining unexpended at the end of the year of any amount raised for payment of school bonds maturing during the year, for the whole amount would have been expended in the payment of the bonds.

Again, the school laws of this and previous years make no distinction between moneys ordered to be raised by district tax for current school purposes and moneys required to be raised for payment of school bonds, so far as concerns the assessment and collection of the taxes and the turning over by the collector to the custodian of the amounts collected. It is a combined assessment, with whose apportionment neither the assessor nor the collector has anything to do. That is the duty of the board of education. Moreover, it is reasonable to suppose that if the Legislature in enacting the school law of October 19, 1903, had intended to relieve the taxpayers of Deal borough, and of other places similarly circumstanced, from all further payments for account of school bonds, they would have stopped the money in the hands of the taxpayer by nullifying tax proceedings pro tanto, and would at the same time have provided some other fund out of which the maturing bonds might be met; for it is most important to remember that the Legislature has at all times (at least since 1894, as above pointed out) been scrupulously careful to safeguard bond payments against repudiation or even deferment at the instance of local taxpayers or local officials. Now, if by the new act they intended to stop the moneys that had been assessed and were in process of collection to meet bond payments accruing during the current year, in all cases where, by the force of the act, they created new school districts, it is manifest that at the same time they were driving the combined Ocean township school district, and all other school districts similarly situated, into the necessity of making default upon the public school bonds; for we have found nothing in the act to provide for any other source of payment, and it is plain there could be no other source, except an additional tax levy upon the district, which would be thus required to assume the entire payment of bonds maturing during the year. And, still further, if the Legislature intended to subvert pending tax proceedings in order to appropriate moneys that had been once devoted pursuant to law to specific public purposes and devote them to some other public purpose (as in the case before us, typical of many others, to divert the moneys of the taxpayers of Deal borough previously appropriated and ordered to be raised to pay bonds of the combined district), it is significant that the Legislature has not in terms declared that this shall be done, and has not expressly, nor, as we conceive, has it by implication, pointed out to what other public purpose these moneys shall be devoted. It is not reasonable to attribute to the Legislature an intent to cause such confusion and such impairment of the credit of school districts without clear language requiring it. We find no such language in the act of 1903. We find language indicating, on the other hand, an intent to postpone the operation of the act with respect to all fiscal adjustments until the end of the then current school year. We think this is the reasonable construction to be placed upon section 33. And we find corroborative evidence of the same intent in the validating act approved on the same day and already alluded to, which, so far from disturbing in any wise previous appropriations, taxes, and assessments, expressly validates and confirms them.

Nor do we find any sufficient evidence of a contrary intent in section 34 of the new general school law. Referring to the language of that section above quoted, and applying it to the case in hand, the "new school district" which is to become vested with the title to the school property is the district established by section 32 in that portion of the township of Ocean which lies outside of the bounds of the boroughs. Now it is significant that there seems to be no provision in the act for the establishment in a corporate capacity of a board of education for such new district prior to the annual school meeting to be held in March, 1904. Section 77 provides that in each township school district the members of the board of education shall be chosen at the annual school meeting. Section 79 provides that this meeting shall be held on the third Tuesday in March. Section 84 provides that each board of education thus elected shall be a body corporate. And section 85 provides that the board shall organize within 10 days after the annual school meeting. Section 242 provides that members of the boards of education who are residents of the territory contained in the several school districts as constituted by this act, and who are now acting as such, shall continue to serve for the full term for which they were severally elected or appointed as though elected or appointed under this act. This would continue members of the board of education of the combined school district of Ocean township, who were residents in that portion of the township that lies outside of the boroughs, as members of the board of education of the new township school district; but it has no bearing upon the question when the new board of education is to begin its corporate existence. It is true that by section 25, par. 4, of the act, the county superintendent of schools is given power to appoint members of the board of education for a new township school district, to serve until the next election in the district for members of the board of education. But this power of appointment may be fairly construed as limited to cases where there exists a necessity for such appointment. Now by section 33 the ordinary functions of the board of education, with respect to the charge and control of the schools, are expressly reserved to the old boards until the end of the then current school year. Until that time there seems to be nothing for the new board to do beyond meeting for the purpose of organization.

Upon the whole of the act, therefore, we are inclined to think that the establishment of the new boards of education required for the new districts created by section 32 was intended to be deferred until the election of members of such boards at the annual meetings to be held in March, 1904. If this view is correct, then the taking effect of section 34 with respect to the assumption by such new boards of education of outstanding indebtednesses must be postponed in like manner, and the assumption would relate only to such indebtednesses for which a tax levy had not already been made at the time of the passage of the act. But, if this view is not correct, and the Legislature intended by section 34 that the new district should assume payment of outstanding school bonds that fell due during the school year 1903-04, still section 34 is clearly consistent with the view that those obligations should be paid by the combined district out of the moneys already ordered to be raised by tax for that specific purpose, and that the remedy of the combined district against the new district should be by action for reimbursement, pursuant to the express provisions of section 34 in that behalf. The moneys recovered in such a case would, of course, be subject to apportionment among the several school districts that resulted from the dismemberment of the combined district; such apportionment being provided for by section 38. And so, upon a review of the whole of the act of 1903, we are unable to give to it such a force and effect as to absolve the collector of Deal borough from the duty of turning over to the custodian of the combined district the taxes that were collected in the year 1903 from the taxpayers of the borough, pursuant to the appropriation and levy that antedated the act of 1903.

The argument to the contrary is rested largely upon the hardship that results from requiring the tax payers of Deal borough to contribute further toward payment of the school bonds of the combined district, when by the same act the schoolhouse for whose construction the bonds were issued was practically taken from them. In one of the views above suggested for the interpretation of section 34 the moneys now payable would eventually be restored by means of an action against the new district and an apportionment of the proceeds thereof. In this event, there would be no hardship beyond a temporary inconvenience. But, even though that view be untenable, so that the moneys now payable are never to be restored either directly or indirectly, still, unless there be some express provision of law to relieve this hardship, it must be dealt with by the courts as one of the necessary incidental burdens of government. It is impossible that any system of taxation shall be absolutely just to every taxpayer. Approximation to justice is all that is possible, and all that the Constitution requires. It must be remembered that the inhabitants of the combined district were already legally liable for the payment of the bonds; their public credit having been already pledged in that behalf by authority of the Legislature. The real hardship of the act of 1903 consists in depriving them of property in the schoolhouse. If the hardship of paying their quota of the $3,690, which fell due during the school year in question, must be considered in solving the question of statutory construction, what is to be said with respect to the larger sum previously contributed by the taxpayers of the borough as their quota towards paying the $9,340 of principal and interest upon bonds that had been liquidated by the combined district previous to the year in question? It is manifest that, wherever in the state a combined school district had a school building previously erected from the proceeds of combined taxation, the force of the act in rendering school district lines conformable to municipal boundaries necessarily resulted in hardship to some of the taxpayers. Doubtless the Legislature deemed that the general benefits of the new adjustment of district lines outweighed its incidental burdens. Nor, as we think, can the respondent place himself in the attitude of resisting the payment now in controversy on the ground of any equity supposed to inhere in the municipality of Deal borough or in the taxpayers resident within that borough. He is not their agent or representative in this matter, but, on the contrary, is a public functionary of the state, charged by law with specific public duties. It happens that the Legislature, from motives of convenience, selected the borough collector as the public agent for the collection of school taxes. But it might have selected any other public agency. His duty in this behalf is not to the taxpayers from whom he has collected the money, nor to the borough in which his municipal functions are exercised. His duty, as a public agent is to transmit to the relator, as the public agency designated for the purpose by law the public funds which he has been instrumental in gathering from the taxpayers. From the moment the tax was lawfully collected the individual taxpayers lost all property interest therein. The municipality never had any interest in the moneys, being expressly debarred therefrom by law.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that a mandamus should issue; and as the matter is of public importance, and the facts are not at all in dispute, it may be peremptory in form.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 16, 1905.)

CARRIERS — LOSS OF FREIGHT — DAMAGES — LIMITATION.

On delivering to a common carrier a drop curtain of ordinary character and value, the shipper received as a voucher therefor an instrument in which it was stated that, when the shipper omits to declare the value of the goods, he agrees that the value does not exceed $50. Held, that the responsibility of the carrier for the real value in case of loss was not thereby restricted, unless the shipper had knowledge of the stipulation; and his knowledge that the carrier's charges depend on the value of the goods is not sufficient to render the limit of liability obligatory.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Elizabeth.

Action by Norman S. Hayes against the Adams Express Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before SWAYZE and DIXON, JJ.

P. H. Gilhooly, for appellant. Conover English and R. H. McCarter, for respondent.

DIXON, J. On April 2, 1904, the plaintiff's employé delivered to the defendant's agent in Elizabeth a drop curtain consigned to Syracuse, and received from the agent a document on which were written the names of the shipper and consignee, and a description of the article shipped. The document also contained in print many terms and conditions, to which, it declared, the shipper agreed, and among them one to the effect that, if no value of the goods was declared the value did not exceed $50. Nothing was then said by either the employé or the agent about the value of the curtain, or the contents or nature of the document. The curtain should have reached Syracuse within three days, but no tidings of its whereabouts since shipment appear. In an action brought in the Elizabeth district court to recover compensation for its loss, the plaintiff produced evidence tending to show that the curtain was worth $300, and the defendant relied on the terms of the document to bar a recovery for more than $50. On this issue the judge instructed the jury that the only point was whether the plaintiff knew that the defendant's rates depended on the value of the goods. If he did, the verdict in his favor should be for $50 only; but, if he had no reason to know that the rates depended on value, then the verdict should be for $300. On this charge the jury awarded the plaintiff $50, and he now appeals to this court.

At common law, of course, the defendant, being a common carrier, would be responsible for the actual value. The weight of authority in this country is to the effect that, in order to lessen the responsibility of a common carrier, it must appear that the shipper assented to the restriction, and that in general a declaration of limited liability, made by the carrier in a public advertisement or in a receipt handed to the shipper, will not suffice to bind the latter to the limitation so declared. We approve of the views on this subject expressed by Mr. Justice Nelson in New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344, 382, 12 L. Ed. 465, and by Mr. Justice Davis in Railroad Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 16 Wall. 318, 328, 21 L. Ed. 297. It has, however, sometimes been held that an exception to this general rule should exist in regard to the value of the goods shipped; that, because of the comparatively slight means of knowledge as to value possessed by the carrier, the shipper should assume that the carrier has fixed a limit to his liability on this point, unless he is expressly charged with a specified liability; and on this assumption the shipper assents to the limitation in all cases where his dissent is not shown. Such a doctrine is said to be necessary to secure fair dealing. But it is undoubtedly a departure from the rule of the common law, and in both of the Constitutions adopted in this state it was declared that the common law should remain in force until altered by the Legislature. This part of the common law, which relates to the responsibility of the carrier, has always been regarded by our courts as embraced in our system of jurisprudence. Thus, in Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. New Jersey R. R. & T. Co., 27 N. J. Law, 100, this court adjudged that, "where a common carrier undertakes to transport an article in the line of his business, the legal presumption is that he does it subject to his common-law liability, and this presumption remains until it is overcome by positive proof of a special agreement." We are unable to see on what principle this feature of the common law can be abrogated by the judiciary. Where unfair dealing actually appears, the courts may, in harmony with the law, afford an appropriate remedy, but for other cases the suggestion that the law might be improved calls for the intervention of the Legislature alone. The circumstances of the case now in hand disclose no unfair dealing. The nature of the article shipped was known to the carrier, and its value does not appear to have been abnormal. The shipper, therefore, had the right to assume, in the absence of notice to the contrary, that the carrier would form his own judgment as to its value, so far as was necessary for the fixing of his compensation, without attempting to restrict his responsibility under the general law. There was evidence from which the jury might have inferred that the plaintiff knew and assented to the defendant's limitation of value; and, if the matter had been submitted to the jury on that question, a determination against the plaintiff would have been legal. But the question presented by the judge was quite different. It required the jury to find merely knowledge on the part of the plaintiff that the defendant's charges depended on the value of the goods shipped. Every person who thinks intelligently must know so much, for, of course, as the carrier's responsibility varies with the value, so should his compensation. But such knowledge in a shipper by no means justifies an inference that, if he does not declare the value of the goods, he assents to a limitation of value fixed by the carrier.

The exceptions taken by the plaintiff at the trial properly present for review this portion of the charge, and therefore the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remitted to the district court for a new trial.

COHN et al. v. COMMON COUNCIL OF CITY OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 22, 1905.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—WATER COMMISSIONERS—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

The common council of the city of New Brunswick is authorized to remove from office members of the board of water commissioners who fail to comply with the requirements of "An act regulating the receipt and disbursement of money and the passage of ordinances pertaining thereto in any city of this state." P. L. 1904, p. 259.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 559.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Theodore Cohn and others against the common council of the city of New Brunswick to review a removal from office. Affirmed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Robert Adrain, for prosecutors. Theodore B. Booraem, for respondent.

GARRETSON, J. The prosecutors, Theodore Cohn, Henry C. Price, and Thomas Meacham, were removed from their office as water commissioners of New Brunswick by the common council of that city after a hearing upon charges preferred against them. The charges were preferred by the finance committee of the common council February 24, 1905. The committee to investigate the charges met for that purpose March 10, 1905. The investigating committee reported to the common council on March 15, 1905, and on that day the report of the committee recommending the removal of the prosecutors was adopted, and the prosecutors were removed from their office as water commissioners. The charges were: First. That the water commissioners, since the 4th day of July, 1904, and to the 1st day of January, 1905, have failed to comply with the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the state of New Jersey, approved March 28, 1904 (P. L. p. 259), entitled "An act regulating the receipt and disbursement of money and the passage of ordinances pertaining thereto in any city of this state," in this particular, viz., that the said water commissioners as a municipal board and department established in the city of New Brunswick have failed and neglected to pay all moneys received by them from any source to the treasurer of said city, the person charged with the custody of the funds of said city. Second. That the said water commissioners have failed and neglected to hold the regular monthly meetings as required by law. Third. That the said commissioners have unlawfully permitted the estate of John Collier to establish and maintain a nuisance in the shape of a privy on the banks of Lawrence brook, about 200 feet up stream from the intake to the city pump established on said brook, thereby contaminating the water supply of the said city of New Brunswick.

The board of water commissioners of New Brunswick exists by virtue of a further supplement to the act entitled "An act to revise and amend the charter of the city of New Brunswick," approved March 18, 1863, which supplement was approved March 27, 1873 (P. L. p. 450). This act authorizes the purchase of the stock and property of the New Brunswick Water Company and for the establishment of a board of water commissioners for the management thereof. This board is made a body corporate liable to sue and be sued; by section 15 of the act of the common council of the city was authorized to appoint a board to consist of such number of inhabitants of the city as they might think best, who were to determine at the first meeting by lot the terms during which they should hold office, one-third for one year, one-third for two years and one-third for three years. Section 16 (page 456) provided for the appointment by the common council in each year of one-third of the commissioners, who should hold office for three years from the date of the expiration of office of one-third, and for filling vacancies. This section contained a proviso "that any or all of said commissioners may at any time be removed from office and others appointed in their place by the said common council, for good and sufficient cause, shown upon examination and inquiry by a committee of said common council at which said commissioner or commissioners shall have due opportunity to be present and make defense." It seems that the first board of water commissioners consisted of six members, and that the terms of two expired each year. That the four against whom the charges above mentioned were presented were all who held over on January 2, 1905. They were the three prosecutors and Charles M. McCormick. McCormick was not tried, because he was sick and absent at the time of the trial of the prosecutors. Under the language of the act the board was a continuous corporate body, and the members thereof in office might be removed by the common council for any unlawful act committed by them while holding office, without reference to any changes in the personnel of the board.

The first charge is based upon the failure of the board of water commissioners to comply with the provisions of "An act regulating the receipt and disbursement of money and the passage of ordinances pertaining thereto in any city of this state," approved March 28, 1904 (P. L. 1904, p. 259). This act went into effect July 4, 1904. It provides, in the first section: "All moneys received from any source by municipal boards or departments established in cities in this state shall be paid by such boards or departments to the treasurer or other person charged with the custody of the funds of such city." In other sections the mode of disbursing moneys for the uses of the different departments is outlined; payments are to be made by warrant on the treasurer of the city to be signed by certain officers designated or to be designated by ordinance; bills must be approved by the mayor, and, if he disapproves, there are provisions for passing them over his veto. This provides a radical change in the system of disposing of the funds and the payment of claims of many departments and boards in the various city governments of the state. It is a general act applicable to all cities, and all the provisions come within the title. It appears from the testimony taken before the committee of the common council that the board proceeded, as to the receipt and disbursement of moneys after July 4, 1904, in the same manner as they had proceeded before that time. They had a treasurer, they kept a bank account, bills were presented to them and ordered paid and paid by the treasurer out of the funds to the board's credit in the bank, and what was left was turned over to the city treasurer. After the 4th of July, 1904, this method was illegal. The prosecutors allege that they did not know of the passage of that law, and that, in ordering bills paid out of funds which were held by them, they acted in ignorance of the law. But their ignorance of the law will not excuse. They were guilty of a violation of positive law, and that being proved to the satisfaction of the council was sufficient ground to justify their removal from office.

For this reason the action of the common council is affirmed, with costs.

STATE v. DIMANT.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 22, 1905.)

DISORDERLY HOUSE—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Those who maintain a place where usurious rates of interest are taken, and where the statutes prohibiting usurious interest are habitually violated, are indictable for keeping a disorderly house.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari to Court of Quarter Sessions, Camden County.

Jacob N. Dimant was indicted for keeping a disorderly house, and defendant brings certiorari. Motion to quash denied.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Frank T. Lloyd, Prosecutor of the Pleas, for the State. Ferdinand A. Rex, for defendant.

GARRETSON, J. The indictment has been removed into this court for the purpose of allowing the defendant to move to quash it. This motion is now made, and the ground of objection to the indictment is that it does not charge any crime or misdemeanor under the law. The allegations of the indictment are that Jacob N. Dimant and others, at times and a place specified, "unlawfully did keep and maintain a certain common ill-governed and disorderly house, and in the said house, for their own lucre and gain certain persons, then on the said other days and times unlawfully and willingly did cause and procure to frequent and come, and that the said Dimant and others then and there in said house did make loans to said persons of certain sums of money at usurious rates of interest and in excess of the amounts provided by law, to the great damage and common nuisance," etc.

It cannot be disputed that a place where persons gather together to do acts which by law are made crimes or misdemeanors is a disorderly house. State v. Lovell, 39 N. J. Law, 463. It is provided by statute (Gen. St. p. 3704, § 7) "that no person or corporation shall upon contract take, directly or indirectly for a loan of any money, wares, merchandise, goods and chattels above the value of six dollars for the forbearance of one hundred dollars, for a year and after rate for a greater or less sum or for longer or for shorter time," and the penalty for the violation of this statute is found in section 2, Gen. St. p. 3708, and is that in suits to enforce any contracts on which a higher rate of interest shall be reserved than is allowed by the law of the place where the contract was made no interest whatever is recoverable.

In the case of McClellan v. State, 49 N. J. Law, 471, 9 Atl. 681, decided in the Court of Errors, Chancellor Runyon delivered the opinion of the court. McClellan was indicted for keeping a disorderly house. The offense was carried on by him in a box or booth upon the grounds of a society for horse racing, in the business of bookmaking or betting upon horses. The box or booth was frequented during the racing season by numbers of persons who were wont to bet upon the races. The court says: "The defendant there kept a place of public resort for the purpose of betting upon the result of horse races. Under the fifty-sixth section of the act for the punishment of crimes (Revision, p. 237) betting upon horse races was a criminal offense. While the supplement to that act passed in 1880 (P. L. 195) so amended that section as to repeal the provision making such betting a misdemeanor, it did not repeal or affect the provisions of the act to prevent gaming (Revision, p. 458), which declared all wagers, bets, or stakes made to depend upon any race to be unlawful. The place kept by McClean was kept in order that the public might resort thereto and engage in the unlawful practice of betting upon horse races and such practices were habitually carried on. Any place of public resort in which illegal practices are habitually carried on is a public nuisance, and a person who keeps such a place is guilty of an indictable misdemeanor. * * * The mere fact that the Legislature has repealed the enactment by which betting on horse races was made an indictable offense obviously does not render the practice of betting upon horses any the less injurious to public morality than it was before."

In Haring v. State, 51 N. J. Law, 386, 17 Atl. 1079, the defendant was convicted of keeping a disorderly house. The offense consisted of keeping a room in the city of Paterson, for several months in 1887, to which persons commonly resorted for the purpose of betting upon horse racing. The question for decision was whether under the law as it stood in 1887 the defendant was subject to indictment for keeping a disorderly house. Judge Van Syckle in an opinion in that case finds, by reference to the various statutes as to horse racing and betting upon horse races, that in 1887 no statute was in force under which betting upon horse racing was indictable, and he concluded from these statutes and the statute to prevent gaming that while betting upon horse racing was not indictable by force of the Statutes of 1880 (P. L. p. 196, § 1), yet that a pronounced public policy against betting as a vice has found a clear expression. "Betting was no longer indictable and punishable as a crime but it was still interdicted, it was still unlawful and against the declared policy of the law."

The taking of usurious interest is a violation of the positive law of the state, and to maintain a place for such habitual violation or a place where agreements for such habitual violations may be made is a misdemeanor, and everybody concerned in the maintenance of such a place is guilty of a misdemeanor. The other objections to the indictment are not well founded.

The motion to quash is denied.

KING v. ZIERZ.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 22, 1905.)

TRIAL—NONSUIT—WHEN GRANTED.

A nonsuit cannot be granted, upon the ground that plaintiff has failed to prove want of reasonable care, unless the proof in the case is so clear that no other legitimate conclusion can be reached by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Negligence, §§ 282, 283.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court of Newark.

Action by Esther E. King against Frank Zierz. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

William E. Hampson, for plaintiff. George M. Titus, for defendant.

GARRETSON, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover the value of a seal-skin coat left to be repaired, and which was not returned to the plaintiff; the defendant alleging that it had been stolen. The case was tried before a judge and a jury. At the close of the plaintiff's case the court granted a nonsuit.

The judge certified that he found the facts as follows: "The defendant is a furrier having a store in the city of Newark, N. J. The rear window of this store was secured by ordinary locks or window fasteners. There were no iron bars at the rear windows, where there was a yard abutting a stable. The plaintiff was the owner of a sealskin coat, which she took to the defendant's store for the purpose of having it repaired on September 14, 1904. The price for the repairs was to be $15. She called on him on October 22, 1904, and asked for her coat and defendant said: 'Oh, your coat has been stolen; I am so sorry.' On December 9, 1904, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant the sum of $15 in gold, but he refused to deliver the coat to her, again stating that it had been stolen. It appears that on the evening of about October 20th the store had been entered through one of the rear windows and the plaintiff's coat stolen, and that a pane of glass had been broken, and that the window was then unlocked; that the store was not wired against burglars; that the rear windows of some stores in Newark are protected by iron bars; that the rear windows in the store of two furriers, namely, Max Kirschbaum, at 876 Broad street, in Newark, and Charles McClelland, of 17 Academy street, in Newark, were protected by iron bars. It also appeared that the coat had been finished some time before it was stolen, and that the defendant had not explained why it had not been sent home." For these facts the judge certified that he decided that it could not be inferred therefrom that the defendant had failed to use ordinary care in the custody of the fur coat, and therefore directed a nonsuit.

The judge correctly placed the liability of the defendant upon the use of ordinary care in the custody of the fur coat, but erroneously decided that question himself. That question should have been left to the jury. There was evidence from which the jury might have inferred the absence of the care required. The trial judge cannot order a nonsuit unless the proof in the case is so clear that no other reasonable legitimate conclusion can be reached by the jury. Consolidated Traction Co. v. Reeves, 58 N. J. Law, 573, 34 Atl. 128; Day v. Donohue, 62 N. J. Law, 380, 41 Atl. 934; Voorman v. North Jersey Street Railway Company, 70 N. J. Law, 818, 59 Atl. 459.

The judgment of the district court is reversed.

STILES v. CITY OF LAMBERTVILLE.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 27, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CITY COUNCIL—VOTE—RECONSIDERATION.

A deliberative assembly may lawfully reconsider and annul a vote previously taken at the same meeting.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 211.]

2. SAME—MEETINGS.

The session of a deliberative assembly, which is held in pursuance of a special motion, adopted at a regular meeting, to adjourn the meeting to a fixed time, is a continuation of the regular meeting, and at such session the assembly can do anything that it could have done at the earlier session.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 194.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by C. Spangler Stiles against the city of Lambertville. Heard on rule for mandamus. Rule discharged.

Argued November term, 1905, before GARRISON, SWAYZE, and DIXON, JJ.

R. S. Kuhl, for relator. Walter F. Hayhurst, for defendant.

DIXON, J. In pursuance of "An act to establish an excise department in cities of this state," approved April 8, 1902 (P. L. p. 628), an ordinance for that purpose was adopted in the city of Lambertville on March 14, 1903, and under it a board of excise commissioners was duly organized. The fourth section of the ordinance provides that "in case of the * * * resignation * * * of any member of said board * * * the common council shall appoint another person in his stead." At a regular meeting of the council held on August 7, 1905, a member of the board sent in his resignation, to take effect immediately, and the council accepted it. Thereupon, on motion, the relator was appointed by unanimous vote to fill the vacancy. Before these proceedings, the council, having under consideration an appropriation for the fire department, laid it over for one week, and resolved that when the council adjourned it would adjourn to meet on August 14th at 8 o'clock p. m., and subsequently the council so adjourned. When the council reassembled on August 14th, a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the relator had been appointed, and that motion prevailed. On further motion, the matter of appointing a member of the excise board was left open for a month. The act of 1902 requires the excise commissioners to give such bond for the faithful performance of their duties as the council shall fix by ordinance, and the ordinance requires that each person appointed as a member of the board shall, before entering upon the duties of the office, take an oath, etc., and give bond, etc., to be approved by the council. The relator took the required oath on August 8th, but when, on August 14th, he tendered a bond to the council, it was refused because of the reconsideration above stated. The application of the relator is for a mandamus ordering the council to approve his bond and give him a certificate of election.

The proposition that every deliberative assembly may reconsider any vote previously taken at the same meeting was adjudged by this court in State v. Foster, 7 N. J. Law, 101. In other tribunals it has sometimes been denied (State v. Barbour [Conn.] 22 Atl. 686, 55 Am. Rep. 65), and sometimes been admitted (Baker v. Cushman, 127 Mass. 105). In this state it has more than once been affirmed, and should be regarded as settled. Jersey City v. Howeth, 30 N. J. Law, 521, 529; Whitney v. Van Buskirk, 40 N. J. Law, 463, 467. In the present case the general doctrine is expressly supported by a rule of the council, providing that "when a motion or resolution has been once made and carried * * * it shall be in order for any member voting with the majority to move for a reconsideration of the vote at the same meeting."

The next question, therefore, is whether the session of August 14th was the "same meeting" as the session of August 7th. The authorities hold that the session of a deliberative assembly, convened in pursuance of a special motion, adopted at a regular meeting, to adjourn the meeting to a stated time, is a continuation of the regular meeting, and at such session the assembly can do anything that it could have done at the earlier session. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 287 (225); Durant v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. Law, 309, 312; Staates v. Borough of Washington, 44 N. J. Law, 606, 611, 43 Am. Rep. 402; Lantz v. Hightstown, 46 N. J. Law, 102, 107. At the session of August 14th, therefore, the council legally reconsidered the vote appointing the relator, and such reconsideration annulled the appointment.

The rule for a mandamus must be discharged.

KNOWLTON v. PATRONS' ANDROSCOGGIN MUT. FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. FIRE INSURANCE—DWELLING HOUSE—NON-OCCUPANCY.

The legislative enactment of 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 14, c. 18) prescribed a form for a standard policy of insurance, prohibited insurance companies doing business in this state from issuing policies of fire insurance in any other form, and by section 3 (page 19) of the act expressly repealed all provisions of law inconsistent with the terms of the policy thus enacted. This standard policy, by its terms, is declared void, if the premises become vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant, and so remain vacant for more than 30 days, without the assent of the company in writing or in print, irrespective of the question whether such vacancy materially increases the risk or not. This provision is clearly inconsistent with the statute of 1883, declaring that a change in the occupation of the property should not affect the policy unless it materially increased the risk. Held, that the earlier enactment of 1883 was expressly repealed by the terms of section 3, c. 18, p. 19, of the Laws of 1895.

2. SAME—INCREASE OF RISK.

The question of material increase of the risk from vacancy or nonoccupancy is not open, under the provisions of the standard policy itself, as prescribed by chapter 18, p. 14, of the Laws of 1895.

3. SAME—TIME OF NONOCCUPANCY.

Furthermore, in the case at bar these provisions of the standard policy relating to the vacancy of the premises are modified by the separate slip or rider attached to the policy, according to the general authority therefor given by section 4, c. 49, Rev. St. By this modified contract the parties definitely stipulated that the policy should be rendered void for vacancy or nonoccupancy continued for more than 10 days. This is the contract which the parties themselves made, and the court is not authorized to substitute for it another and a different contract which the parties did not make.

4. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In the case at bar the property insured, a set of connected farm buildings situated about one mile from Liberty Village, where the plaintiff resided, was destroyed by fire April 19, 1903. The house was not occupied by the plaintiff himself, but had been occupied by his tenant, Albert Turner, and his family. A stock of cattle, and also some hay and farming tools, the property of the plaintiff, were kept in the barn and cared for by Turner. On the 28th day of March, preceding the fire, Turner hired a tenement in Liberty Village, and removed from the house in question sufficient furniture and goods to furnish it. On the 4th day of April, following, his wife and family moved into this tenement in Liberty Village, but he continued to pay rent for the plaintiff's house up to the time of the fire. He continued to work upon the farm pleasant days, leaving his family in the village in the morning, taking his dinner with him to the farm, and returning to his family in the village at night. Rainy days and Sundays he was not at the farm. On these days the stock was cared for by a neighbor, one Weed. Turner was not at the farm on the day of the fire: Weed caring for the stock on that day. He intended to return to the Knowlton place with his family in about two months.

Held, that upon these facts the plaintiff's buildings, insured by the policy in suit, must be deemed to have become "personally unoccupied," without the consent of the company, for more than 10 days immediately preceding their destruction by fire.

5. SAME—WAIVER.

Subsequent to the date of the fire the defendant company sent to the plaintiff an "assessment card" for the twenty-eighth assessment made by the company, dated July 30, 1903, informing the plaintiff that the assessment on his premium note was $1, and requesting payment of the same. This general assessment covered eight losses that occurred prior to the fire, and ten that occurred after the fire. The plaintiff paid this sum of $1, assessed on his premium note, some time in August, 1903. The plaintiff contended that the acceptance by the defendant company of the plaintiff's proportional part of this assessment operated as a waiver of the forfeiture resulting from such nonoccupancy.

In two previous decisions of this court, questions of waiver were raised precisely analogous to that in the case at bar, and were decided adversely to the plaintiff's contention. In each of these cases the provisions of the charter of the company relating to membership, the obligation of every member to pay his proportion of all losses happening during his connection with the company, and the existence of the lien on the buildings for the security of the deposit note, were in effect precisely identical with the statutory provisions in force at the date of the plaintiff's policy in this suit. These authorities must be deemed decisive of the case at bar.

6. SAME.

On the question of waiver, held, that the forfeiture resulting from the nonoccupancy of the plaintiff's buildings was not waived by the company in accepting payment of an assessment upon the plaintiff's premium note under the circumstances stated.

(Official.)

Report from Supreme Judicial Court, Waldo County.

Action by Willis J. Knowlton against the Patrons' Androscoggin Mutual Fire Insurance Company. Case reported. Judgment for defendant.

Assumpsit upon a policy of fire insurance in the standard form, issued by the defendant company upon the buildings of the plaintiff situated in Montville. Plea, the general issue with the following brief statement: "That the buildings insured by the policy declared upon in the plaintiff's writ had become vacant by the removal of the occupant, and had so remained vacant for more than 10 days prior to their destruction by fire, without the consent in writing of the company, certified on the back of the policy by the president and secretary or by two of the directors, whereby said policy became void."

That the buildings insured by the policy declared upon in the plaintiff's writ had become personally unoccupied, and had so remained personally unoccupied for more than 10 days prior to their destruction by fire, without the consent in writing of the company, certified on the back of the policy by the president and secretary or by two of the directors, whereby said policy became void."

After the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff had been fully taken out the defendant notified the court that it did not propose to offer any evidence, and did not question the facts as proved by the plaintiff. Thereupon it was agreed that the case be reported to the law court "for the law court to pass upon and decide all questions of law involved and all questions of fact, if any, and inferences from facts, if any, involved in the case, and to order such judgment as the law and facts may require."

Argued before WISWELL, C. J., and EMERY, WHITEHOUSE, STROUT, SAVAGE, and PEABODY, JJ.

Arthur Ritchie, for plaintiff. John A. Morrill, for defendant.

WHITEHOUSE, J. This is an action upon a policy of fire insurance in the standard form, dated March 26, 1902, issued by the defendant company upon the buildings of the plaintiff situated in Montville, as follows: On dwelling house and L, $200; on barn, $125; on wood shed, $25; on hen shed, $25; on silo, $25—$400.

All the buildings except the silo, which had not then been constructed, but the lumber for which was then on the premises, were totally destroyed by fire on the night of Sunday, the 19th of April, 1903, between 10 and 11 o'clock.

Attached to the policy was a "rider" or additional paper, containing the following stipulation: "It is also a part of the consideration of this policy, and it is especially agreed that this policy shall be void and the whole amount of premium paid forfeited to the company, if the buildings hereby insured shall become vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant, or shall become personally unoccupied for more than 10 days, without the consent in writing of the company, certified on the back of the policy by the president and secretary or by two of the directors."

Section 20 of chapter 49 of the Revised Statutes of 1883 reads as follows: "A change in the property insured or in its use or occupation or a breach of any of the terms of the policy by the insured, do not affect the policy unless they materially increase the risk."

But the legislative enactment of 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 14, c. 18) prescribed a form for a standard policy of insurance, prohibited insurance companies doing business in this state from issuing policies of fire insurance in any other form, and by section 8 (page 19) of the act expressly repealed all provisions of law inconsistent with the terms of the policy thus enacted. This standard policy, by its terms, is declared void, if the premises become vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant, and so remain vacant for more than 30 days, without the assent in writing or in print of the company, irrespective of the question whether such vacancy materially increases the risk or not. This provision is clearly inconsistent with the statute of 1883 above quoted, declaring that a change in the occupation of the property should not affect the policy unless it materially increased the risk. It is accordingly claimed in behalf of the defendant company that the earlier enactment of 1883 was expressly repealed by the terms of section 8, c. 18, p. 19, of the Laws of 1895.

In accordance with this view, the clause above quoted from section 20, c. 49, of the Revised Statutes of 1883, was omitted from the Revision of 1903.

But it is contended in behalf of the plaintiff that the question of material increase of the risk from vacancy or nonoccupancy is still open, under the provisions of the standard policy itself, as prescribed by chapter 18, p. 14, of the Laws of 1895. It is there provided that the policy shall be void, if, without the assent in writing or in print of the company, "the situation or circumstances affecting the risk shall, by or with the knowledge, advice, agency, or consent of the insured, be so altered as to cause an increase of such risks." It will be seen, however, that this provision relied on by the plaintiff is one of 11 independent clauses in the policy, by each of which the policy is declared to be void upon the conditions therein specified, and it is immediately followed by these two clauses, viz., "or if, without such assent, the said property shall be sold or this policy assigned, or if the premises hereby insured shall become vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant, and so remain vacant for more than 30 days without such assent."

It was impossible for the Legislature to anticipate and specify the infinite variety of changes in the situation and circumstances that might cause an increase of the risk. It, therefore, inserted the comprehensive provision relied upon by the plaintiff. In the light of experience, however, it was practicable to specify 10 conditions or changes in the situation of the property, each of which would render the policy void without opening to actual inquiry the question of the increase of risk. The language of the standard policy is not to be construed to mean that an issue of fact is to be raised upon the question of increase of risk under each of the independent clauses in question. It would not be reasonable to suppose that the Legislature contemplated a judicial inquiry under the clause relating to the keeping of gunpowder or naphtha, or under the clause respecting other insurance on the property, or the clause in regard to the sale of the property and the assignment of the policy without the assent of the company as there specified. With no greater or better reason can it be claimed that the question of increase of risk is open under the clause rendering the policy void for vacancy or nonoccupancy. It is an independent and absolute stipulation that the policy shall be void, if the premises become vacant and remain so for more than 30 days as there specified. It is not qualified by any other clause in the policy.

Furthermore, in the case at bar these provisions of the standard policy relating to the vacancy of the premises are modified by the separate slip or rider attached to the policy according to the general authority therefor given by section 4, c. 49, Rev. St. By this modified contract the parties definitely stipulated that the policy should be rendered void for vacancy or nonoccupancy continued for more than 10 days. This is the contract which the parties themselves made, and the court is not authorized to substitute for it another and a different contract which the parties did not make.

The case comes to this court upon a report of the uncontroverted evidence of the plaintiff, and the question arises in the first place whether, upon the facts thus disclosed, the buildings did become vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant, or did become personally unoccupied and so remain vacant or personally unoccupied for more than 10 days, without the consent in writing of the company. It has been suggested that the two words "vacant" and "unoccupied" are synonymous, and there are, doubtless, conditions of a dwelling house, when either word applied to it, or both words applied to it, will express a like condition of it. But, as stated by the court in Herrman v. Adriatic Fire Insurance Co., 85 N. Y. 162, 39 Am. Rep. 644: "A dwelling house is chiefly designed for the abode of mankind. For the comfort of the dwellers in it, many kinds of chattel property are gathered in it. So that, in the use of it, it is a place of deposit of things inanimate, and a place of resort and tarrying of beings animate. With those animate far away from it, but with those inanimate still in it, it would not be vacant, for it would not be empty and void. And as a possible case, with all inanimate things taken out, but with those animate still remaining in it, it would not be unoccupied, for it would still be used for shelter and repose. And it is because, in our experience of the purpose and use of a dwelling house, we have come to associate our notion of the occupation of it with the habitual presence and continued abode of human beings within it; that that word applied to a dwelling always raises that conception in the mind. Sometimes, indeed, the use of the word 'vacant,' as applied to a dwelling, carries the notion that there is no dweller therein; and we should not be sure always to get or convey the idea of an empty house by the words 'vacant dwelling' applied to it. But, when the phrase 'vacant or unoccupied' is applied to a dwelling house, plainly there is a purpose—an attempt to give a different statement of the condition thereof; by the first word, as an empty house; by the second word, as one in which there is not habitually the presence of human beings." See, also, Sonneborn v. Insurance Co., 44 N. J. Law, 220, 43 Am. Rep. 365.

In the case at bar the property insured was a set of connected farm buildings situated in a farming community in the town of Montville, about one mile from Liberty Village, where the plaintiff resided. The nearest house was from 500 to 700 feet distant. The house was not occupied by the plaintiff himself, but had been occupied by his tenant, Albert Turner, and his family, consisting of a wife and three children. A stock of cattle, and also some hay and farming tools, the property of the plaintiff, were kept in the barn and cared for by Turner. On the 28th day of March, preceding the fire, Turner hired a tenement in Liberty Village, and removed from the house in question sufficient furniture and goods to furnish it. On the 4th day of April, following, his wife and family moved into this tenement in Liberty Village, but he continued to pay rent for the plaintiff's house up to the time of the fire. He continued to work upon the farm pleasant days, leaving his family in the village in the morning, taking his dinner with him to the farm, eating it in the house there, and lying on the couch while the horses were feeding. At night he returned to his family in the village. Rainy days and Sundays he was not at the farm. On these days the stock was cared for by a neighbor, one Weed. Turner was not at the farm on the day of the fire; Weed caring for the stock on that day. The removal to Liberty Village was occasioned by the approaching confinement of his wife, and he intended to return to the Knowlton place after his wife became able to do so. Her confinement occurred on the 22d day of May, following the fire. A few articles in the house belonged to Turner's mother, and he had made arrangements for their removal, because, as he says, he was afraid some might be stolen.

Upon these facts it is contended in behalf of the defendant company that the premises had become vacant or personally unoccupied by the removal of Turner, and remained so for more than 10 days prior to their destruction by fire, without the consent of the company in writing, and that the policy, by the terms on the rider attached to it, had therefore become void.

In Corrigan v. Conn. Fire Ins. Co., 122 Mass. 298, a policy of insurance upon a house provided that the policy "shall be void, if the house shall remain vacant or unoccupied for the space of 10 days, without written notice to and the consent of the company," and it was held that, if the house had not been used as a dwelling place by some one within 10 days of the loss, the policy would be void; and that if the former occupant had moved with his family into another house, where they slept and took their meals, the fact that some of his furniture remained in the house, and the key had not been surrendered to the landlord until within the 10 days, would not constitute an occupancy of the premises. The fact that the plaintiff left a dwelling house furnished and in charge of his farmer, who kept the farmhouse near by, and whose wife visited and aired the dwelling every few days, will not satisfy the condition of occupancy. For a dwelling house to be occupied, it must be used by human beings as their customary place of abode. Herrman v. Insurance Co., 85 N. Y. 162, 39 Am. Rep. 644.

In Hanscom v. Insurance Company, 90 Me. 338, 38 Atl. 325, the court say: "The fact that the furniture remained in the house, and that the plaintiff's hired man made a frequent inspection of the household goods and had a general oversight of the buildings during the day, is not a full equivalent for the constant supervision involved in the occupancy of the premises as a customary place of abode, and the actual presence in the building of those who are living in it and using it as a dwelling house day and night." Ashworth v. Builders' Ins. Co., 112 Mass. 422, 17 Am. Rep. 117; Herrman v. Adriatic Ins. Co., 85 N. Y. 162, 39 Am. Rep. 644; Bonefant v. Insurance Co., 76 Mich. 654, 43 N. W. 682; May on Insurance, 249a; Wood on Insurance, p. 180. A purpose to move into a house, though partly executed by filling it with furniture, will not aid the insured, unless the purpose is rendered complete by actual occupancy. If the premises became unoccupied and remained so up to and at the time of the fire, the condition is broken. 1 May on Insurance, 502. The mere presence of goods in the house, and a supervision over it, is not "occupancy." That requires "living" in it. Moore v. Insurance Co., 64 N. H. 140, 6 Atl. 27, 10 Am. St. Rep. 384; Sonneborn v. Insurance Co., 44 N. J. Law, 220, 43 Am. Rep. 365. A house in which no one lives, but in which a former occupant had left some trifling articles of furniture, not of such character as to be valuable for use elsewhere, is "vacant and unoccupied," within the meaning of those terms as used in a fire insurance policy. Moore v. Phoenix Ins. Company, 64 N. H. 140, 6 Atl. 27, 10 Am. St. Rep. 384.

In Sleeper v. Insurance Company, 56 N. H. 401, the policy provided: "If the premises hereby insured become vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant without immediate notice to the company and consent indorsed hereon, * * * this policy shall be void." The tenant paid for rent up to May, 1872. He left in April, 1871, and went to Laconia; his family having left a short time previous. The wearing apparel of himself and family had all been taken away, and a portion of what little furniture they possessed. He intended to return the next spring, or earlier, if business should be dull in Laconia. No person lived in the buildings after he left. The buildings were totally destroyed by fire October 30, 1871, up to which time he had not decided to return at any definite period. Neither plaintiffs nor defendants had any notice that the tenant had vacated the premises until after the fire.

Held, that the premises were vacant. The court says: "I think when the occupant of a dwelling house moves out with his family, taking part of his furniture and all the wearing apparel of the family, and makes his place of abode in another town, although he may have an intention of returning in eight or ten months, such dwelling house, while thus deserted, must be regarded as unoccupied; that is, vacated according to the natural and ordinarily received import of those terms." Where the occupant moved out, leaving only a bedstead and strip of carpet, and one of his sons slept in the house for a month after, but afterwards the house was entirely abandoned for six or seven weeks before the fire, the court held the premises unoccupied and the policy void, not only as to the house, but also as to all farm buildings insured; since the condition as to vacancy of the premises belonged to all the subjects of the contract and is a potent influence on the assumption of the entire risk. Hartshorne v. Insurance Co., 50 N. J. Law, 427-429, 14 Atl. 615. See, also, Sonneborn v. Insurance Co., 44 N. J. Law, 220, 43 Am. Rep. 365.

The plaintiff's buildings, insured by the policy in suit, must therefore be deemed to have become "personally unoccupied," without the consent of the company, for more than 10 days immediately preceding their destruction by fire.

It is finally contended in behalf of the plaintiff, however, that the acceptance of the company of the plaintiff's proportional part of the assessment of July 30, 1903, operated as a waiver of the forfeiture resulting from such nonoccupancy.

It is not in controversy that a representative of the company had an interview with the plaintiff four or five days after the fire, and was then fully informed of the situation and circumstances connected with the loss of the buildings. Subsequently on the 20th day of July, 1903, the secretary of the company addressed to the plaintiff the following letter, which was received in due course of mail, viz:

"Dear Sir: The directors of this company to a man would be glad to include your loss with our assessment, but our attorney, after being made acquainted with the facts as stated by you, says to do so would invalidate our whole assessment, which, of course, we cannot do. He cited us to May on Insurance, page 502, which seems to fit your case, and, when in some attorney's office, I wish you would have them refer to it, so you can see for yourself.

"I am very sorry to have to write this letter, for I had hoped we might pay you."

It appears from the plaintiff's testimony that he understood this to be a letter "denying the risk."

Subsequently the treasurer of the company sent to the plaintiff an "assessment card" for the twenty-eighth assessment made by the company, dated July 30, 1903, informing him that the assessment on his premium note was $1, and requesting payment of the same. This general assessment of the company covered eight losses that occurred prior to April 19, 1903, and ten that occurred after that time. The plaintiff paid this sum of $1, assessed on his premium note, some time in August, 1903.

The following provisions are found in chapter 49 of the Revised Statutes of 1883, relating to mutual fire insurance companies, viz.: "Sec. 25. Every person insured by such company, or its legal representatives or assigns continuing to be insured therein, is a member of the company during the term specified in his policy and no longer.

"Sec. 26 [as amended by chapter 95, p. 93, of the Laws of 1895]. The insured before receiving his policy, shall deposit his note for the sum determined by the directors, which shall not be less than five per cent. of the amount insured, and such part of it as the by-laws require, shall be immediately paid and indorsed thereon; and the remainder in such installments as the directors from time to time require for the payment of losses and other expenses, to be assessed on all who are members when such losses or expenses happen, in proportion to the amounts of their notes. * * *

"Sec. 28. The company shall have a lien against the assured on the buildings insured and the land appurtenant thereto, for the amount at any time due on said note, to commence from the time of the recording of the same, as hereinafter provided, and to continue sixty days after the expiration of the policy on which the note was given. * * *

These statutory provisions were in force at the date of the policy in suit, and are retained in chapter 49 of the Revised Statutes of 1903, in sections 26, 27, and 31, respectively.

In Philbrook v. N. E. Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 37 Me. 137, a question of waiver was raised precisely analogous to that in the case at bar, and was decided adversely to the plaintiff's contention. In that case there was a forfeiture of the policy, resulting from the act of the plaintiff in obtaining other insurance without the consent of the company in violation of the provisions of the charter; and the plaintiff contended that the collection of an assessment on the plaintiff's premium note, ordered by the company within the life of the policy, but after the fire, operated as a waiver of the forfeiture. All the losses covered by the assessment in that case occurred after the forfeiture, and a part of them after the fire and after the denial of liability. The provisions of the charter of that company relating to membership, the obligation of every member to pay his proportion of all losses happening during his connection with the company, and the existence of the lien on the buildings for the security of the deposit note, were in effect precisely identical with the statutory provisions above quoted in force at the date of the plaintiff's policy in suit. In the opinion the court say: "No provisions in the act of incorporation exonerate a member from his obligations, or put an end to his connection with the company by a rejection of his claim for a loss which may occur; neither does it provide that, when a policy is made void by the holder's voluntary act, he is excused from the payment of assessments made afterwards. If it were so, it would be in the power of the party assured to relieve himself of his obligations at pleasure, if he should choose to give up the benefit of his insurance by conduct of his own. The most satisfactory reasons may exist for a rejection of a claim by the directors. Paragraph 1, of the act refers to such, and is it to be supposed that, by the refusal to pay for a loss not covered by the policy, the premium note of the person who sustained the loss is thereby canceled? A waiver, in such a case, is quite unlike a waiver of strict compliance with the charter and by-laws in certain preliminary steps, in order to make a valid policy available. Here the foundation of the claim is an insurance followed by a loss, and the defense is upon the ground that the insurance ceased utterly before the loss, and consequently, if it be so, the claim is baseless. Heath et al. v. Franklin Insurance Company, 1 Cush. 257. The evidence in this case fails to satisfy us that the directors designed to exercise the power not possessed by them, and gave their consent to a second insurance, or that they did anything which gave validity to a policy which had become void by the plaintiff's acts and omissions."

This decision was affirmed in Gardiner v. Piscataquis Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 38 Me. 439. In that case a forfeiture had resulted from the plaintiff's failure to give notice of a material increase in the risk, happening after the receipt of his policy, and it was contended that by making and collecting an assessment upon the plaintiff after the fire, covering losses which occurred after the forfeiture, the defendant company was "estopped from treating the policy as void." But the court said: "The making of such assessments by the defendants for subsequent losses would not revive the policy; nor was it inconsistent with the legal right of the company to treat it as void. Neely v. Onondaga M. Ins. Co., 7 Hill, 49; Smith v. M. F. Ins. Co., 3 Hill, 508; Philbrook v. N. E. M. F. Ins. Co., 37 Me. 137."

In Neely v. Onondaga Mutual Ins. Co., supra, the court say: "Although the plaintiff's policy became void by the alienation of the property insured, it does not follow that his deposit note was also void. On the contrary, until he surrendered his policy and paid his proportion of all losses which accrued 'prior to such surrender,' the deposited note remained obligatory upon him. He does not pretend that he surrendered his policy previous to the assessment mentioned in the replication, and he was therefore liable to pay his proportion of the losses for which that assessment was made. The replication shows that the defendants have enforced this liability; but their acts, instead of evincing an intention to affirm the existence of the policy, are perfectly consistent with their right to treat it as void."

These authorities must be deemed decisive of the case at bar. The cases cited by the defendant are clearly distinguishable from it.

It is accordingly the opinion of the court that the forfeiture resulting from the non-occupancy of the plaintiff's buildings was not waived by the company in accepting payment of an assessment upon the plaintiff's premium note under the circumstances stated, and that the entry must be:

Judgment for defendant.

BOYD v. CLOUD.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Kent. Oct. 30, 1905.)

CONTINUANCE—ISSUES—ABSENT WITNESSES—AFFIDAVIT.

Where issues from the register of wills had been regularly placed on the trial list under the court rules, requiring cases at issue 20 days before the convening of the court to be placed on the trial list, an affidavit for a continuance thereof at the first term, alleging the absence of a material witness, was not defective for failure to disclose his name or state what was proposed to be proved by him.

Issue from the register of wills in and for Kent county between John L. Boyd, an insane person, by William Boyd, his trustee by appointment, and Mary H. Cloud. On application for continuance. Granted.

Affidavit filed in regular form alleging the absence from the state of a material witness, upon which counsel for plaintiff asked for a continuance to the next term of court.

Mr. Hughes, for defendants, contended that inasmuch as under the statute the first term was the trial term for issues from the register of wills, whilst the second term was the trial term for other cases, and therefore such issues were in the same position at the first term as other case at the second term, and the rule of court requiring that an affidavit for continuance at the second term should disclose the name of the witness, and what is proposed to be proved by said witness should apply to issues from the register of wills at the first term; that the affidavit upon which the motion for continuance was made in the above case did not disclose the name of the witness or what was proposed to be proved by him, and therefore the affidavit was defective on that ground, and the motion should be refused.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Henry Ridgely and William M. Hope, for plaintiff. James H. Hughes and William L. Gooding, for defendant.

LORE, C. J. There is no distinction between issues and other cases in that regard. This has been regularly placed upon the trial list, under the rules of court requiring that cases at issue 20 days before the convening of the court shall be placed upon the trial list, and we think the affidavit discloses all that is necessary.

Let the case be continued until the April term.

BOYD v. CLOUD.

SAME v. CLOUD et al.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Kent. Oct. 31, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—RECORD—FAILURE TO CERTIFY—DISMISSAL.

Appeals from orders of the register of wills removing an administrator and appointing another will not be dismissed because the register failed to certify the record, but the papers will be remanded to the register for the required certificates.

2. SAME—SEPARATE APPEALS—TRANSCRIPT.

Where two appeals were prosecuted from two orders of the register of wills, one removing an administrator, and the other appointing another as administrator in his stead, such appeals will not be dismissed for failure to file separate transcripts, under Rev. Code 1893, p. 673, c. 89, § 15, authorizing an appeal to the Superior Court from the register exercising jurisdiction touching the grant or revocation of letters and the removal of an executor or administrator.

3. ADMINISTRATORS—RIGHT TO APPOINTMENT—TRUSTEE OF INSANE PERSON.

The trustee of an insane person is entitled to administer on an estate to the residue of which such insane person is entitled, the same as the insane person would be if capable.

Petition by Mary H. Cloud for revocation of letters of administration issued to William Boyd. From an order of the register of wills removing Boyd from his office as administrator of Joshua Boyd, deceased, and from an order of the register of wills removing Boyd as administrator and appointing James Francis Wilds as administrator for said decedent, said Boyd appeals. Reversed.

Joshua Boyd died in the early part of June, 1905. He left to survive him as his only heir at law, a brother, John L. Boyd, who some years previous had been declared a lunatic upon a commission duly issued for that purpose. William Boyd, his son, was trustee by appointment of the chancellor of the said John L. Boyd. Shortly after Joshua Boyd's decease, William Boyd applied to be and was appointed the administrator of Joshua Boyd by the register of wills in and for Kent county. At the same time a paper writing purporting to be the last will and testament of the said Joshua Boyd was filed in the office of the said register. Immediately, and before any proof was made of the will, a caveat was filed by the said William Boyd, acting as trustee for John L. Boyd, and issue was prayed for and granted by the register, which issue is now pending. The paper writing, purporting to be the will of Joshua Boyd, devised a lot and house to his stepdaughter, Mary H. Cloud, and she was also made the legatee therein of certain personal property. The paper writing named no executor, disposed of no other property than as stated, and mentioned no other beneficiary. Joshua Boyd owned other real estate, and left other personal property not referred to in the will.

Shortly after the grant of letters of administration to William Boyd, Mary H. Cloud, the stepdaughter of the deceased, and the devisee and legatee named in the paper writing, filed her petition with the register of wills praying for the revocation of the letters to William Boyd, and his removal as administrator. The grounds stated in the petition were confined to allegations that Mary H. Cloud was preferred to the office of administrator because William Boyd was not an heir at law of the deceased, nor entitled to share in the residue of his personal estate; that the said Mary H. Cloud was a legatee named in the will of the deceased, and was also a creditor of the estate. Joshua Boyd had, upon commission duly issued, been declared a lunatic about one year prior to his decease, and William Boyd had been appointed trustee, also, by the chancellor. Shortly before Joshua Boyd's decease, Mary H. Cloud had brought suit against the former, claiming that he was indebted to her for board and maintenance. After a hearing upon the petition of Mary H. Cloud, the register of wills in the latter part of June, 1906, made an order revoking the letters theretofore granted to William Boyd and removing him from his post as administrator. William Boyd thereupon took an appeal to the Superior Court. In September of the same year the register appointed J. Frank Wilds administrator c. t. a. in the place of William Boyd. William Boyd thereupon took an appeal from this last order.

The above facts appeared in the petitions, affidavits, and other papers sent up by the register. There was no certificate of the register accompanying the said papers.

The appellant assigned the following causes of appeal: "First. That the register erred in removing the said William Boyd as administrator of Joshua Boyd, deceased, without allegation or proof that he was incapable of performing or was neglecting the duties of such administration. Second. That the register erred in removing the said William Boyd from the administration aforesaid, on the petition of Mary H. Cloud, when in fact the said Mary H. Cloud had consented to the appointment of the said William Boyd at the time of his appointment. Third. That the register erred in the removal aforesaid upon the application of Mary H. Cloud, who was neither entitled to share in the residue of the personal estate of the deceased, nor was a bona fide creditor of said deceased nor of his estate. Fourth. That the register erred in the removal aforesaid, because the application for such removal was made by Mary H. Cloud on the sole ground that she was a creditor of the estate of said deceased, whereas in fact the said estate did not and does not owe the said Mary H. Cloud anything. Fifth. That the register erred in removing the said William Boyd as administrator as aforesaid, because said removal was made upon the sole application of Mary H. Cloud, claiming to be a creditor of said estate, whereas in fact the said Mary H. Cloud was not a bona fide creditor of said estate, and the only claim she held against it was a pretended one, which was contested in the lifetime of said deceased, and for which suit is now pending in this court. Sixth. That the register erred in the removal aforesaid, because the said William Boyd was the trustee and legal representative of John L. Boyd, who was the only person entitled to the residue of the personal estate of said deceased. Seventh. That the register erred in the removal aforesaid, because there was no person capable of the administration who was by law preferred to the said William Boyd; there being no allegation or proof that the said William Boyd was neglecting his duties as administrator. Eighth. That the order of the register was against the law. Ninth. That the order of the register was against the evidence. Tenth. That the order of the register was against the law and the evidence."

The causes of appeal in the second case were identical with the above, except that the following additional cause was added, viz.: "That the register erred in appointing James Francis Wilds administrator of said estate in place of William Boyd, because the said James Francis Wilds was not entitled to the residue of the personal estate of said deceased and was not a creditor of the said deceased or of his estate."

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Henry Ridgely and William M. Hope, for appellant. James H. Hughes and William L. Gooding, for respondents.

Counsel for the respondent moved to dismiss the appeal in the first case on the following grounds: "First. There is no record or transcript of a record on file in this court. Second. The papers filed have no certificate of the register or anything else to indicate what they relate to. Third. The papers filed do not contain any depositions of the witnesses examined or show any evidence in the cause."

Motion was also made by counsel for respondent to dismiss the appeal in the second case for the above reasons, and for the additional reason that "there was no such judgment of the register as is stated in the appeal."

LORE, C. J. We remand the papers to the register of wills, and order him to send up such certificates as will satisfy us that the record is before us. We do not know of any statutory provision to the effect that an appeal from the register of wills will abate because of lack of certificate. It is not like a certificate of a justice of the peace. The motion to dismiss the appeals on that ground is refused.

The register thereupon appended his certificates to said papers, stating that the annexed papers were a true and correct copy of all his record entries in the above-stated causes and of all papers filed or produced in said causes.

Counsel for respondent argued further, in support of their motion to dismiss the appeals on the other grounds above stated, as follows: The statute (section 15, c. 89, Rev. Code 1893, p. 673) provides that "there shall be an appeal to the Superior Court from the register exercising jurisdiction, touching the grant or revocation of letters, the ordering of further bond or removal of an executor or administrator." The record sent up in this case shows no such judgment as that appealed from. The record shows two distinct judgments of the register in relation to the administration of the estate of the said Joshua Boyd. The first judgment dated June 29, 1905, revoked the letters of administration granted on the estate of Joshua Boyd deceased to William Boyd, bearing date June 7, 1905, and removed the said William Boyd from the office of administrator. The other judgment of the register of wills, dated the 25th day of September, A. D. 1905, granted letters of administration c. t. a. upon the estate of Joshua Boyd unto J. Frank Wilds. There seem to be no reported cases in this state on the subject of appeals from registers of wills touching the granting of letters of administration, nor is there any statute or rule other than the statute before recited touching the subject; so that we are left to the general principles of law touching appeals. In 2 American & English Encyclopedia of Pleading & Practice, under the title of "Appeals," on page 282, we find it laid down, where different appeals were taken from separate and distinct judgments, each appeal must be based on a separate transcript. These two judgments of the register are separate and distinct, and were in no sense contemporaneous. The first judgment was rendered in June. The second one in September.

LORE, C. J. We decline to dismiss the appeals, or either of them, on the grounds stated and argued.

Argument upon the appeals was then begun; the appellant submitting the following brief:

"First. The appointment by the register in the first instance of William Boyd as administrator was an exercise of the judicial function, binding upon the register and upon the whole world. That officer could not thereafter review or rescind his action arbitrarily or capriciously. It is true that our statute (Rev. Code 1893, p. 670, c. 89, § 12) confers upon the register of wills the power of removing an administrator, but that statute expressly enumerates the causes for such a removal. It is manifest, therefore, that the statutory causes are exclusive of all others not specified therein, and that the register cannot remove, except upon one of the specified grounds. So far as the present case is concerned, the only cause enumerated in the statute which could possibly apply is that of neglect of duty by reason of absence or inability. The proceedings disclose, however, that the register did not act upon this ground. There was absolutely no allegation, and there was no scintilla of evidence before him, even hinting at neglect on the part of William Boyd. The register, therefore, acted without the statute and of necessity without warrant of law.

"Second. The register makes no statement of the grounds upon which he acted in revoking the letters of administration theretofore issued to William Boyd. He was, however, proceeding upon a petition for such revocation filed by Mary H. Cloud. No evidence was heard by him in support of the revocation, except as contained in said petition. It would seem a proper assumption, therefore, that he based his determination upon the allegations contained in said petition. When, however, we examine these allegations, we find the only one in point to be that Mary H. Cloud is a creditor of the estate of the deceased, and that William Boyd is neither a creditor nor a person entitled to the residue of the personal estate. The petition, then, raised the sole issue before the register whether William Boyd or Mary H. Cloud should be the personal representative of the deceased. We repeat there was no allegation and no evidence on any other head. Nevertheless the register arbitrarily removed William Boyd, and appointed James Francis Wilds, who was not a creditor nor a person in any wise interested in the estate. The register, therefore, utterly failed to determine the one question raised by the petition, namely, whether Mary H. Cloud was the person preferred by law to administer.

"Third. The register made two orders in the proceedings. One, the removal of Boyd; the other, the appointment of Wilds. If his first order had been based upon any of the statutory causes for removal, then it might be considered as separate and distinct from his second order. This, however, was not the case; for as we have stated, the only allegation and proof heard by him was on the single point that Mary H. Cloud was preferred by law over William Boyd. It follows, therefore, that the order of removal and the order of appointment constituted a single act or decree. The arbitrary division of his finding by the register cannot vary the fact that the removal of Boyd and the appointment of Wilds together formed one and only one determination of the proceeding. The question then before the court is not simply whether the register had the right to remove Boyd, but is, had the register the right to remove Boyd in order to appoint Wilds? We submit that there was absolutely no allegation for evidence before him authorizing such action.

"Fourth. We have attempted to show that there is no issue before the court between William Boyd and Mary H. Cloud, but only between Boyd and Wilds. If, however, we assume for the sake of argument that the court may consider whether Mrs. Cloud or Boyd was the proper person to be appointed administrator we think our position is not weakened. The proceeding now before the court is of course an appeal from an order of the register removing an administrator theretofore appointed. If, however, this were not the case, and Mary H. Cloud and William Boyd had both applied to the register for appointment, and the register having preferred the latter, and appeal had been taken, we believe that even then the court would decide that William Boyd was the proper person for such appointment. The law gives the preference of the administration to the person entitled to the residue of the personal estate of the deceased. The only person so entitled in the present instance is John L. Boyd. It is true that he is incapable, because he has been found to be a lunatic, but William Boyd is his trustee by appointment of the chancellor, and is therefore his legal representative. As such trustee, William Boyd stands in the shoes of John L. Boyd. Any proceeding taken against the latter or any proceeding instituted in his favor must be in the name of William Boyd. We contend, therefore, that William Boyd was the natural and logical person to be appointed by the register. We submit that a rational conclusion of our statute giving preferences in the right of administration warrants the appointment of a trustee of a person so preferred when there is none other in that class capable of administering. On this head we would call the attention of the court to the case of Ex parte Ostendorf, 17 S. C. 22.

"Fifth. If we again assume (what is not the case) that this appeal came up upon the contest in the first instance between Mary H. Cloud and William Boyd as to which had the right to administer, we submit that the court would decide in favor of Boyd. We contend that Mary H. Cloud is not a proper person to be interested with the administration of this estate. The sole ground upon which she bases her claim to administer is that she is a creditor of the estate. This contention is good only if she substantiates her allegation of creditorship. We would respectfully insist that she has utterly failed to do this. In the first place, we have affidavits denying absolutely and entirely that the deceased and his estate owes her anything. In the second place, the claim which she pretends to hold is one now mooted in an action pending before this court, and which was instituted in the lifetime of the deceased. Whether Mary H. Cloud is or is not a creditor of the estate cannot be determined, until the termination of the action which she brought before this court in the lifetime of Joshua Boyd, the deceased. We submit the court will not anticipate the final determination of that suit by now holding that Mary H. Cloud is a creditor, and yet, if the court does not hold her to be a creditor, she certainly is not preferred over William Boyd in the administration of the estate in question. It is true our statute gives the preference in the grant of letters (after persons entitled to the residue of the personal estate) to creditors, but it is obvious that the statute contemplated only those whose claims had either been adjudicated, or were not in dispute. Any other conclusion would be manifestly irrational. If we are right in this, then William Boyd, not having been shown to have neglected his duties, cannot be removed to give way to a person not by law preferred over him.

"Sixth. Assuming again (for the sake of the argument) that the question is between William Boyd and Mary H. Cloud, we submit that Mary H. Cloud is an improper person for the appointment. The office of an administrator is an important one; its object is the preservation of the estate. Any person not likely to accomplish this object is manifestly unfit. Our Delaware statute gives the preference first of all to persons entitled to the residue of the personal estate. The reason is obvious. He who is entitled to share in the residue would be the most likely person to conserve the estate, because, in so doing, he would be working for his own interest. The next preference is given by the statute to creditors. Here again the reason is plain. If the person entitled to the residue is incapable or neglects to administer the class of persons, then next most likely to preserve the estate would be those holding claims against it, since the payment of their claims might depend upon the amounts of assets which were secured to the estate. There is, however, a wide distinction between the persons entitled to the residue and creditors. The latter may be interested only to the amount of their claims, whereas the former are interested in the whole. This is why creditors are subordinated in preference to those entitled to the residue. If, however, the person seeking to administer is neither entitled to the residue, nor holds a claim against the estate which has been adjudicated or is not disputed, but is merely one claiming or pretending to claim a right of action against the estate which is contested, by the residuary beneficiary, it is patent that the estate cannot derive any benefit from his appointment. Mary H. Cloud stands in precisely this same position. She and her husband have brought suits in this court against the deceased. These were instituted in the lifetime of the latter. Suppose she is now appointed the administrator, what will be the result? Either she will exercise her powers by voluntarily paying hers and her husband's out of the estate to full amount of the contested claims, or else she will be driven to make herself as such administrator a party defendant to the suit which she as an individual is party plaintiff. In the latter event can it reasonably be expected that the litigation will be more than merely formal and the defense anything except of the most perfunctory character? It may be answered that redress can be had by a proceeding upon her bond. We submit that it would be most unfair to force us to such action; at the best a dilatory and expensive redress. We think the authorities are abundant to the effect that courts have universally declined to appoint as administrator any one one having a claim or interest adverse to the estate. Even if Mary H. Cloud were entitled to share in the residue of the personal estate, we believe that the books support the proposition that she would still be an unfit person to administer, because she holds a contested claim against said estate. Ex parte Ostendorf, 17 S. C. 22; Pickering v. Pendexter, 46 N. H. 69; In re Bieber's Appeal, 11 Pa. 157; Owings v. Bates, 9 Gill (Md.) 463; In re Mills, 22 Or. 210, 29 Pac. 443.

"Apart from the sufficiency of any of the preceding points of argument, however, we submit that the action of the register in removing Boyd, and in appointing Wilds is clearly error, for the reason that Mary H. Cloud had notice and knowledge of the application in the first instance of Boyd to the register to be appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased and that she expressly consented to said appointment. She is therefore estopped from now calling it into question. We submit that this is decisive of the whole case, because the action of the register was based upon the petition of Mary H. Cloud, and if Mary H. Cloud had no right to petition for the removal of Boyd then the register had no power to act in the premises. We are confident that our position on this head is unassailable."

Counsel for respondent submitted in reply the following brief:

"The grounds of appeal as appear from the exceptions and cause of appeal filed are briefly: First. Error in removing administrator without allegation or proof that he was incapable of performing or was neglecting the duties of his office. Second. That the petitioner for such removal consented to the appointment at the time it was made. Third. That the petitioner or applicant for removal was not entitled to share in the residue of the personal estate of deceased and was not a bona fide creditor. Fourth. That the estate does not owe the petitioner anything. Fifth. That the petitioner was not a creditor only having a pretended claim which was contested in the lifetime of the deceased. Sixth. That William Boyd was the trustee and legal representative of John L. Boyd, and was the only person entitled to the residue of the personal estate. Seventh. That there was no person capable of the administration, who was by law preferred to William Boyd and allegation that William Boyd was neglecting his duties as administrator. Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth. That the order was against the law and evidence.

"The record as sent up discloses a petition of Mary H. Cloud, stating the appointment of the said William Boyd as administrator, and that he is not one of the persons entitled to the residue of the personal estate of the deceased, and that the only person who is so entitled is incapable of administering on said estate. That she is a creditor of said estate, and a legatee under the last will and testament of Joshua Boyd, deceased, and, as such, is entitled to administer on said estate in preference to said William Boyd. In reply to this, is an answer in the shape of an affidavit, signed by persons claiming to be the children of John L. Boyd, and denying the part of said petition in which Mary H. Cloud claims to be a creditor, but admitting that there are cases pending in court in which the said Mary H. Cloud is plaintiff for the recovery of alleged claims against said estate, but setting up other facts in relation to the matter. The order of the register states that a decree is made after a full hearing on both sides.

"The Constitution of Delaware (section 22 of article 6) provides that the register of wills of the several counties shall respectively hold the registers' court in each county upon the litigation of the cause, and the depositions of the witnesses examined shall be taken at large in writing, and made a part of the proceedings in the cause. The record in this appeal does not contain depositions of the witnesses or show any evidence in the said cause. The only thing that the record presents to the court is what in effect constitutes the pleadings in the said cause. It is submitted that appeals from the decision of the register are not new trials, but like appeals from the orphans' court, or an examination of the decision below on precisely the same facts as were presented to that court. This ruling in relation to appeals from the orphans' court is to be found in Crawford v. Short, 1 Har. 355, 360. In the same case the court holds that appeals from the orphans' court cannot be heard without a statement of the points decided, and that it is the right of the party appealing to apply for such a statement unless the record shows the points so decided.

"It is submitted that the record in this case does not show the points decided. The allegation in the petition for removal of William Boyd states that he is not one of the persons entitled to the residue of the personal estate, and that the person who is so entitled is incapable of administering. This, under the statute on page 670 of the Revised Code of 1893, c. 89, § 9, makes the next class of persons entitled to administration the creditors, and the petitioner claims to be such creditor. The statute also provides that in case of administration with the will annexed as in this case, a legatee shall be preferred to creditors. The petition states that the petitioner is also a legatee, and the record as sent up discloses this fact. The only claim which William Boyd makes to a right to administer is that he is the trustee of John L. Boyd, an insane person, who is the heir or person entitled to the residue of the personal estate of the deceased. This fact appears in the affidavit or answer filed in the said proceeding, but does not appear from any evidence filed with the said record. If William L. Boyd is such trustee of his father, it is submitted that a trustee of an insane person appointed by the Chancellor has charge of such insane person and the management of his property; that such trustee has no title to the property of his ward, and can neither sell nor dispose of the same without authority from the Chancellor; that such trustee is merely an officer of the Court of Chancery acting under the Chancellor's authority for the care of the person and property of his ward. That the letters granted to William Boyd were granted to him in his individual capacity, and not as trustee of John L. Boyd, as is disclosed by that part of the record sent up in this case showing such appointment. There is no provision in the statute providing for the appointment of such trustee or preferring him in any way. On the contrary, the statute provides that if the person entitled to the residue of the personal estate be not capable, then letters shall be granted to the creditors. The person claiming to be entitled in this case was John L. Boyd, and he was an insane person. The appointment of the said William Boyd was therefore without statutory right or authority, and was contrary to the preference provided for in said suit. Such statute is mandatory, and the appointment of the said William Boyd contrary to its provisions was a mistake on the part of the said register of wills.

"A trustee is not entitled to administer by virtue of his office. Matter of Thompson's Estate, 83 Barb. 334; Glenn, Trustee,

v. Reid, 74 Md. 239, 24 Atl. 155. The trustee of a lunatic under our statute is appointed 'to take charge of them and manage their estates.' Rev. Code 1893, p. 381, c. 49, § 1. At the time of Boyd's appointment, the record discloses no application for his appointment, on the ground that he was trustee of John L. Boyd. He appears to have been appointed as any other stranger. There were no notices or citations to others interested. There appears no renunciation of persons entitled to preference. The appointment was therefore void and the register had a right to revoke letters. 1 Am. Law of Ad. § 243. That the said register of wills had the right to remove William Boyd from the office of administrator, we think there can be no doubt. If it be contended that such removal is statutory, and that it is confined to the provisions of section 12 of the statute on page 670 of the Revised Code of 1893, we submit that the Constitution provides for a register's court in each county and such a court has, by necessity, the incidental powers, and is not confined to those prescribed by the statute. In the case of Rash v. Furnel, 2 Har. 451, it is held that 'the register is a judge and the sentence of his court is the judgment of a tribunal of exclusive and peculiar jurisdiction on the subject-matter before him.' The question is very ably discussed in the case of Morgan v. Dodge, 44 N. H. 255, 82 Am. Dec. 213, which was an appeal from a decree of the probate court declaring void the appointment of an executrix, and revoking her letters. On page 258 of 44 N. H. (82 Am. Dec. 213), the court says that probate courts 'exercise many powers solely by virtue of the provisions of our statutes, but they have a very exclusive jurisdiction, not conferred by statute, but by a general reference to the existing law of the land; that is, to that branch of the common law known and acted upon for ages, the probate or ecclesiastical law.' And, further, 'it is settled by the authorities that at common law the grant of letters testamentary and of letters of administration may be revoked,' and 'there are many cases where the courts of probate may remove such executors or administrators beside those enumerated in the statute.' In South Carolina, in Thompson v. Hockett, 2 Hill, 347, 348, the same principles are upheld.

"The power to revoke letters of administration is necessarily inherent in the register's court, and is a part of the essence of the power delegated to it of granting administration. Pew et al. v. Hastings, Ex., 1 Barb. Ch. 452; Proctor v. Wanmaker, 1 Barb. Ch. 302; Slipperly v. Baucus, 24 N. Y. 46; In re Ex. of Verplanck, 91 N. Y. 439; Williams' App., 7 Pa. 259; McCaffrey's Estate, 38 Pa. 331; Neidig's Estate, 183 Pa. 492, 38 Atl. 1033."

LORE, C. J. The court order that the judgment of the register of wills in each of the above-stated cases be reversed. The matter is decided on the one point, viz., whether the trustee of an insane person is entitled to administer on an estate to which such insane person is entitled to the residue, and therefore entitled under the statute to administer. The court hold that such trustee is entitled the same as the insane person would be if capable.

In No. 96 the court rendered the following judgment: And now, to wit, this 31st day of October, A. D. 1905, it is ordered by the court that the order of the register of wills in and for Kent county and state of Delaware, bearing date the 29th day of June, A. D. 1905, revoking the letters of administration granted on the estate of Joshua Boyd, deceased, to William Boyd, and bearing date June the 7th, A. D. 1905, and removing the said William Boyd from his office of administrator of the goods and chattels, rights and credits of the said Joshua Boyd, deceased, be reversed, and that all the papers sent up in this cause be remanded to the register with this order: that the costs of this appeal be taxed against Mary H. Cloud, the respondent.

In No. 97 the court rendered the following judgment: And now, to wit, this 31st day of October, A. D. 1905, it is ordered by the court that the order of the register of wills in and for Kent county, bearing date the 25th day of September, A. D. 1905, granting letters of administration c. t. a. upon the estate of Joshua Boyd, late of East Dover hundred, unto J. Frank Wilds, be reversed, and that all the papers in this proceeding be remanded to the register with this order.

DASEY v. STATE ex rel. FARLOW.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Sussex. Oct. 11, 1905.)

1. FINES—COLLECTION—EXECUTION.

Appeal from judgment of a justice in a summary proceeding, under Rev. Code 1893, c. 128, § 21, for trespass declared to be a nuisance, being allowable only where defendant claims ownership, execution cannot be issued where such claim is not made, but the fine must be collected in accordance with such section, providing that if it be not paid the justice shall commit the offender to prison.

2. SAME—JUDGMENT OF JUSTICE.

The fine imposed in a summary proceeding before a justice, under Rev. Code 1893, c. 128, for trespass declared to be a nuisance, constitutes a judgment.

Action under Rev. Code 1893, c. 128, § 21, by the state, by complaint of Elijah J. Farlow, against Elijah Dasey. Defendant brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Charles F. Richards and Charles S. Richards, for plaintiff in error. Woodburn Martin, for defendant in error.

The record of the justice was as follows:

"State of Delaware, Sussex County—sa.:

"To Any Constable in Said County—Greeting: Whereas, Elijah J. Farlow, of Baltimore hundred, Sussex county, state of Delaware, has upon oath before me, a justice of the peace of said county, declared that on the 5th day of July, 1904, in Baltimore hundred aforesaid, one Elijah W. Dasey, late of the county and state aforesaid, did then and there willfully enter into, upon, and trespass upon the ways, lands, and premises of the said Elijah J. Farlow, situate in Baltimore hundred, county and state aforesaid, and was then and there and thereby guilty of a nuisance, under section 21, chapter 128, of the Revised Code, and that he, the said Elijah J. Farlow, has just cause to suspect and does suspect the said Elijah W. Dasey of Baltimore hundred, of committing the said offense: You are therefore commanded to take the said Elijah W. Dasey and bring him before me, or some other justice of the peace of the county, forthwith to answer said charge. Witness the hand and seal of the said justice the 8th day of July, 1904.

"[Seal.] William S. Long, J. P.

returnable at my office in Frankford forthwith.

"And now, to wit, this the 9th day of July, 1904, warrant returned cepi corpus, says James Long, Const., and upon arraignment Elijah W. Dasey, the said defendant, says not guilty, and after hearing the proofs and allegations on the part of both the complainant and the defendant, and duly considering the same, I do find, adjudge, and decree the said Elijah W. Dasey guilty of having willfully committed the nuisance alleged, and do fine him five dollars and the costs of this suit.

"William S. Long, J. P.

"On the 9th day of July, 1904, Elijah W. Dasey appeals, and John M. Rogers becomes surety in the sum of twenty dollars that the said appeal shall be prosecuted with effect; also any judgment which shall be rendered against the said Elijah W. Dasey, or his executors or administrators, upon said appeal shall be satisfied.

E. W. Dasey.

"J. M. Rogers."

This appeal was never entered in the superior court, which justice ascertained from prothonotary before issuing executions.

Exceptions: "Elijah Dasey, the plaintiff in the above certiorari, by Charles F. Richards & Son, his attorneys, files the following exceptions why the judgment of state of Delaware, by complaint of Elijah J. Farlow, against Elijah Dasey, should now be set aside and vacated: First, for that the said justice rendered said judgment without warrant or authority of law; second, for that the said record does not show or state the amount for which judgment was rendered; third, for that the judgment rendered by the said justice is void and of no effect, in this: that he had no jurisdiction or authority to render judgment for any amount; fourth, for that the execution issued upon the said judgment was void and without authority of law; fifth, for that the execution issued by the said justice was void and of no effect in this: that the requirements of the statute under which the proceedings were instituted were not complied with; sixth, that the said execution was and is void and of no effect in this: that the record shows an appeal had been taken, and the said justice issued an execution without any certificate that said appeal had been dismissed, or had not been duly entered."

THE COURT held that an appeal could be allowed only when the party charged with committing the trespass claimed the ownership of the premises: that, as the appeal was improperly allowed, execution could not be issued, but the fine should be collected as provided by section 21; that the fine was a judgment.

Judgment affirmed. Execution set aside.

MOTT v. STATE.

(Superior Court of Delaware. Kent. Oct. 27, 1905.)

SUNDAY—LABOR—INFORMATION.

Rev. Code 1893, p. 953, c. 181, § 4, provides that, if any person shall perform any worldly employment, labor, or business on the Sabbath day (works of necessity and charity excepted), he shall be fined four dollars, etc. Held, that an affidavit of complaint alleging that defendant did perform worldly business on a certain Sabbath day, etc., but failing to negative the exceptions of the state, was fatally defective.

Certiorari to review a conviction of James R. Mott before a justice of the peace for the alleged breaking of the Sunday law. Judgment reversed.

The affidavit of complaint of William A. Stokesbury alleged the following: "That on the 6th day of August, 1905, at Duck Creek hundred, Kent county, and state of Delaware, James R. Mott did perform worldly business, said 6th day of August, 1905, being the Sabbath day, commonly called Sunday, and that he had cause to suspect and doth suspect James R. Mott, of Duck Creek hundred, of committing the said offense," etc.

The record of the justice stated the offense for which the plaintiff in error was tried and convicted, as follows: "Affidavit, August 22nd, 1905, on oath of William A. Stokesbury, that at Duck Creek hundred, Kent county, and state of Delaware, August 6th, 1905, James R. Mott did perform worldly business, said August 6th, 1905, being the Sabbath day, commonly called Sunday," etc.

The prosecution was instituted before the said justice under chapter 181, § 4, Rev. Code 1893, p. 953, which is as follows: "Sec. 4. If any person shall perform any worldly employment, labor, or business, on the Sabbath day (works of necessity and charity excepted), he shall be fined four dollars, and on failure to pay such fine and costs, shall be imprisoned not exceeding twenty-four hours."

The following exceptions were filed to the record of the justice, namely: "(1) That the affidavit of complaint on which the warrant was issued was not such as was required by the statute. (2) That it does not appear from the affidavit of complaint that the defendant was not engaged in a work of necessity and charity. (3) That the affidavit of complaint does not allege that the defendant was not engaged in works of necessity or charity. (4) That it does not appear from the record that the defendant was not engaged in works of necessity and charity. (5) That the case was not within the jurisdiction of the justice, because it does not affirmatively appear, both in the affidavit of complaint on which the justice acted and in the adjudication or conviction itself, that the defendant was not engaged in works of necessity and charity."

Attorney General Richards: "After examining the case of Socum v. State, 1 Houst: 204, which is decisive of this case, and also numerous decisions outside of our own state to the same effect, I feel that it is hardly necessary to take up the time of the court with an argument."

Argued before LORE, C. J., and GRUBB and PENNEWILL, JJ.

Horace G. Eastburn, for plaintiff in error. Robert H. Richards, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LORE, C. J. We reverse the judgment upon the ground that neither the complaint nor the record negatives the exceptions contained in the statute.

Judgment below reversed.

RICARDO et al. v. NEWS PUB. CO.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 29, 1905.)

ACTION—JOINDER OF CAUSES.

A declaration which joins in one count a cause of action by a married woman for the publication of a false and malicious statement concerning her separate real estate with a count for damages to both husband and wife by reason of a publication of a false and malicious statement as to the wife personally is bad on demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Action by Abbie L. Ricardo and Norton C. Ricardo, her husband, against the News Publishing Company. Judgment for defendant on demurrer to declaration.

argued November term, 1904, before GUM-MERE, C. J., and GARRISON, GARRETSON, and REED, JJ.

Peter J. McGinnis, for plaintiffs. John B. Humphreys, for defendant.

GARRETSON, J. This is a demurrer to a declaration containing two counts. In the first count it is alleged that Abbie L. Ricardo, wife of Norton C. Ricardo, was the owner in fee of certain real estate consisting of a plot of land with a building erected thereon, which building was used for tenement purposes, and was divided into separate apartments to be rented or let to persons desiring to dwell therein, or which had been rented or let for that purpose, which building was known as the "Ricardo Flats"; that the defendant, contriving, and wrongfully and maliciously intending, to injure the plaintiff, and to induce those who had already rented or let the said building or apartments not to continue to rent or let the same, and not to pay rent for them, and to induce those who desired or intended to rent or let the said building or apartments not to do so, and to bring said building and apartments into infamy and disgrace, and thereby deprive the said plaintiff of all profits, etc., from said premises, building and apartments, "did falsely and maliciously print and publish, and cause to be printed and published, in a certain daily newspaper commonly called the 'Passaic Daily News,' owned and published by the defendant, and having an extensive and wide circulation, the false, wicked, malicious, and defamatory libel, containing false, scandalous, and libelous matter concerning the said premises, building, and apartments, and the appurtenances thereto of and belonging to the plaintiff, that is to say, in large headlines, 'Here Sanitary Dangers Lie,' thereby meaning that in and throughout the said premises, building, and apartments there existed sanitary dangers which exposed to risk and danger the lives of those dwelling in the building or apartments aforesaid, and that a nuisance existed and was allowed to exist therein"—and going on to set out innuendoes the article in question. Immediately following is a denial of the truth of the article, and then the allegation of damages, that by means of the committing of the several grievances by the defendant divers persons who were then and there about to rent or let, or who had let and rented, the said premises, building and apartments, and who would have otherwise rented and occupied the same, were then and there deterred from so doing, and from thence hitherto have respectively wholly declined to rent, let, or occupy the same, and thereby the said plaintiff was then and there hindered and prevented from renting or letting the said premises, building, and apartments, or any part thereof, and has thereby lost and been deprived of all the advantages, emoluments, rentals, and rewards which she might and would have derived and acquired from the letting or renting thereof, and by means of committing the said grievances divers persons who had been renting or letting the premises or apartments, or a part thereof, have declined and refused to continue to rent, let, or occupy the same, whereby the plaintiff has lost rentals which she would have derived from the continuing of the renting and letting, and by means of the committing of the said grievances the reputation and character of her said premises, building, and apartments have been ruined and injured and brought into infamy, so that divers persons who were about to or had rented and let the said premises and apartments did believe and still believe that the imputations, assertions, and libelous matters were true; and the count concludes with the allegation wherefore the said plaintiffs, Abbie L. Ricardo and Norton C. Ricardo, her husband, say they have been injured and sustain damage to the amount of $5,000.

The second count sets forth that the defendant is a corporation of New Jersey; that the plaintiff Abbie L. Ricardo, wife of Norton C. Ricardo, was and is a good, true, honest, and faithful citizen and resident of New Jersey, and conducted herself as, and was always esteemed to be, a person of good name, fame, and credit; that the plaintiff was known to be the owner of the Ricardo Flats used for tenement purposes, which she had or intended or desired to let to tenants, and for which she received or desired to receive rentals, and that she was owner, managed and controlled the same, and always kept them in a clean, healthful, and sanitary condition and manner and in orderly proper and legal manner and condition; that the plaintiff had never been guilty of or suspected of being guilty of offenses and misconduct mentioned to have been charged against and imputed to the said plaintiff, or of any other offense or misconduct; that the defendant owned a daily newspaper called the "Passaic Daily News," published at Passaic, having an extensive circulation, and composed and published, and caused to be printed and published, of and concerning the plaintiff, a certain false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel setting out the article at length with innuendoes, and alleging that by means of the grievances set forth the plaintiff is and has been greatly injured in her name, fame, and credit, and has been held up to public ridicule and disgrace, and has been brought into public scandal and infamy among her neighbors and others, so that divers of these neighbors and others have suspected and still do suspect the plaintiff to have been guilty of the misconduct and improper actions published as aforesaid, and have refused to have any transactions with the plaintiff, to the plaintiff's damage of $5,000.

The first count in the declaration sets forth the publication of a false and malicious statement concerning the separate real estate of the plaintiff Abbie L. Ricardo. The second count sets out the publication of an article alleged to be a libel upon the same plaintiff personally. The plaintiff demurred to the first count in the declaration that it was improper to join the husband with the plaintiff in an action for damage to her separate real estate. Notice of misjoinder of the plaintiff was given as required by the practice act of 1903, Laws 1903, p. 544, § 36.

The defendant's first ground of demurrer to the first count is that the husband is not a proper party to the action therein set forth. In an action for damages to a married woman with respect to her separate property, it is not proper to join her husband with her in the action. Gen. St. p. 2014, § 11; Lehman v. Hauk, 42 N. J. Law, 206. But this defect is one of form and not of substance, and should be taken advantage of by motion to strike out, and not by demurrer. Van Horne v. Central R. R. Co., 38 N. J. Law, 133. It is also alleged as a ground of demurrer to the whole declaration that it contains two separate and distinct causes of action; one vested solely in the plaintiff Abbie L. Ricardo, and the other in the plaintiffs jointly.

The second count is for a tort to the wife, and in this count the husband is properly a party, but it is joined to the first count, to which the husband is not a proper party; and so the declaration contains two distinct causes of action; one vested solely in the female plaintiff, and the other in the plaintiffs jointly. This renders the whole declaration bad. Misjoinder of counts will support a demurrer to the whole declaration. Topf v. Westshore & Ont. Terminal Co., 46 N. J. Law, 34.

This conclusion renders unnecessary a consideration of the other grounds of demurrer specified.

There will be judgment for the defendant on demurrer.

MEACHEM v. COMMON COUNCIL OF CITY OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 22, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—COMMON COUNCIL—QUALIFICATION OF MEMBERS.

The common council of the city of New Brunswick, in declaring vacant a seat of one of its members under the provision of the charter that the common council shall be the sole judge of election, return, and qualification of its own members, is subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of this court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 36, Cent. Dig. Municipal Corporations, § 180.]

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

The proceedings set aside; it appearing that the action of the common council was not justified by any evidence whatever.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Certiorari by Thomas Meachem to review the action of the common council of the city of New Brunswick in setting aside an election for membership therein. Proceeding set aside.

Argued June term, 1905, before GARRISON and GARRETSON, JJ.

Robert Adrain, for prosecutor. Theodore B. Booraem, for defendant.

GARRETSON, J. This writ brings up the proceedings of the common council of the city of New Brunswick as to the investigation of the right of the prosecutor to a seat in that body, and the action of the common council declaring that seat vacant.

At the meeting of January 2, 1905, a protest dated on that day, signed by one Lewis A. Board, who seems to have been the opposing candidate at the election, was presented against the seating of the prosecutor as a member, for the reason that he had not been duly elected. It further sets forth that on November 8, 1904 (election day), when it was claimed that said Meachem was elected for the Sixth Ward, no election was in fact held in the First election district of that ward, and the majority of 24 votes found by the county canvassers to have been received at said election by Meachem over the petitioner was the result only of the election held in the Second election district of that ward, and represents the choice of the voters of only about one-half of said ward; the voters of the First election district of that ward being prevented from voting by the failure to hold any election in said district. The protest further sets forth that, if an election had been duly held in said First election district on said day, the normal majority at that poll in favor of the Republican ticket, on which the protestant was a candidate, which normal majority was much increased at said election throughout the city and in the county generally, would have more than overcome the majority of said Meachem at said Second poll, and would have elected the protestant, instead of Meachem, to the office of alderman. Upon the protest being filed a resolution was adopted "that this board investigate and inquire into the alleged election of said Thomas Meachem to the office of alderman in and for the Sixth Ward and his right to be a member of the board, and determine the same, and that Monday, the 9th day of January, instant, at 8 o'clock in the evening, at the common council chamber, is hereby fixed as the time and place when said board will proceed with said investigation and inquiry and determination; and the said Thomas Meachem is hereby notified to attend at said time and place and show cause why he should not be excluded from membership in this board and his seat declared vacant." Upon the 9th of January the investigation proceeded according to the return as follows: Counsel "for the protestant said the investigation was a sort of judicial inquiry, and he would present his case as if before a court. He first offered in evidence a copy of the county board of canvassers' statement, filed with the city clerk and produced at his request by the clerk, which showed that Thomas Meachem had been declared elected in the Sixth Ward, and that the county board has certified that no votes were cast in the First poll of the Sixth Ward. The statements showed that in the Second poll 224 votes were cast for Lewis M. Board and 248 for Thomas Meachem, giving Meachem a majority of 24 in that poll." Protestant's counsel "then asked if William Rastall was in the room. Mr. Rastall came forward and was called as a witness by protestant's counsel. He was sworn by the city attorney at the request of President Groves." Mr. Rastall was questioned by the protestant's counsel as follows: "Were you a member of the election board of the First poll in the Sixth Ward—one of the clerks at the last election?" "I was," was the answer. "Was there any election held at that poll on election day, November 8th?" "No, sir." "Were you there all that day?" "I was there until 2 o'clock in the afternoon." "That is all," said the lawyer. "No questions?" said incumbent's counsel. Protestant's counsel said he had nothing further to present. Incumbent's counsel "asked if he did not intend to open up the whole matter." Protestant's counsel said "he had nothing else," and incumbent's counsel "said he had nothing then to offer." "I move," said Alderman Owens, "that the seat of Mr. Thomas Meachem be declared vacant." "I second the motion," said Alderman Orpen. "The roll call was ordered and was as follows: Ayes: Blue, Collins, Groves, Hendricks, Hope, Mailler, Orpen, Owens—8. Nays: Oliver, Puerschner, Zaker—3." "The name of Alderman Meachem was called, but he did not vote. The president declared the motion carried, and the seat of Alderman Meachem vacant. The board then adjourned."

There was nothing in any of the evidence above adduced that could satisfy a judicial mind that the prosecutor was not entitled to his seat. The only legal, pertinent testimony, the return of the board of canvassers, went to prove his title. Whether the council be regarded as a board of canvassers or as a quasi judicial tribunal, there was nothing in the testimony thus before it that would justify its action. For the only canvass of the votes that was made showed that the prosecutor was elected, and the only other fact adduced was that no other votes than those canvassed had been cast. Upon this latter point it will be observed that there was no testimony that any persons who desired to vote had been prevented from doing so, or that such persons would have voted against the prosecutor, or that the number of those so desiring was sufficient to overcome the certified majority of the prosecutor. There was, therefore, no evidence that justified the council in its nullification of the election of its duly certified member, unless the bare fact that no ballots were returned from a given polling place was of itself a legal and sufficient ground for such a decision. That this is not so is conclusively shown by Judge McCrary in his Work on Elections (4th Ed.) p. 380, § 522. The further consideration that under such a rule the failure of a single voting machine to operate would nullify an entire election for state or county officers is of itself sufficient to make us pause before giving our assent to such a doctrine.

The action of the common council is claimed to be justified upon the ground that, by the charter of the city of New Brunswick (P. L. 1863, p. 347), it is provided in section 26 (page 356) "that the common council shall * * * be the sole judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members." The common council, by the section above quoted, is made a judge, and it must exercise its judgment and not its arbitrary will upon these matters. And that judgment is subject to the regularly organized judicial tribunals. The provisions in the state and federal Constitutions that each house of the legislative bodies shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members stands upon quite a different footing from the like provision in the charter of the defendant. The federal and state Legislatures are creatures of the federal and state Constitutions, and constitute one of the three branches of government provided for by those instruments, which also contain distinct provisions against interference by each branch with the other. The provision in the city charter is a grant by the Legislature of one right and power, together with many others, all of which are under the superintending jurisdiction of the courts of law. A clause in the charter of a municipal corporation that the city council "shall be the judges of the election, return and qualifications of their own members and of all other officers of the corporation" was held by the Supreme Court of Delaware not to oust the Supreme Court of the state (invested with the usual powers of the King's Bench) of its superintending jurisdiction over corporations, and it was declared that, if the council should erroneously decide that a person duly elected by the people to any office was not qualified to hold it, a mandamus might issue commanding them to admit him to office. State v. Wilmington, 3 Har. (Del.) 294; 1 Dill on Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 203.

It is urged, however, that, even if the action of the common council be without legal support or justification, it is not within the power of this court to review it upon certiorari. This contention, however, loses sight of the constitutional and prerogative power of the Supreme Court of this state to review the proceedings of all special statutory tribunals, and ignores the established doctrine of our courts that the Legislature is powerless to take away or to abridge such prerogative. East Orange v. Hussey, 70 N. J. Law, 244, 57 Atl. 1066, and cases there cited. The common council, when sitting in judgment upon the election of one of its own members, does so by virtue of the grant of legislative authority contained in its charter. It is, in fine, a special statutory tribunal for that purpose, and as such is subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of this court, regardless of the language in which such special authority has been conferred upon it. The remarks of general text writers upon this subject to the contrary simply ignore the provisions of our Constitution, and disregard our doctrine touching the inviolability of such prerogative powers as are perpetuated by it.

This jurisdiction was exercised by this court in the case of Kendall v. Camden, 47 N. J. Law, 64, 54 Am. Rep. 117. This was a certiorari to the city council of Camden to review the proceedings concerning the trial for removal of the prosecutor from his office as councilman. The prosecutor having been returned elected in March, 1883, and having been sworn in, a petition and notice of contest was presented, which was referred to a committee of five, who investigated and made a report to the council. This report was adopted, and the prosecutor retained his seat. In March, 1884, the same contestant filed a notice of contest, and a committee of five was appointed to investigate that claim. This action was reviewed by certiorari. Justice Scudder, in the opinion, cites the provision of the Camden city charter, which is identical with that in the New Brunswick charter, and goes on to say: "But this council, like all other special statutory tribunals, is subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of this court when it departs from or exceeds the express terms of the power given in the charter. It was a mistake made in the argument of counsel when he claimed the same exclusive authority for a city council having a charter like this as that exercised by Congress or the Legislatures of our states. They are co-ordinate branches of the government under the Constitution, and cannot be controlled by the judiciary in the discharge of their appropriate functions. The Constitution has divided the powers of government into distinct departments, and cautiously provided for their independent exercise. It has expressly forbidden any person belonging to or constituting one of these departments from exercising any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except as expressly provided in the Constitution itself. But municipal bodies have only such powers as are given them by the Legislature, and in the exercise of these have not the independent authority to act without control by the court, which belongs to the legislative branch of state government. How far they will be controlled in the exercise of this particular power given to a common council to judge of the election and qualification of its members, it is said, depends on the exact language in which the provision is couched, viewed in the light of the general laws of the state on the subject of contested elections and quo warranto. But, whatever may be the extent or limitations of the authority given, it is the province of this court to see that no arbitrary act is done, under the guise of legislative sanction, to deprive citizens of their right of representation, or to unseat a candidate who, by the proper and final tribunal, has been adjudged to be elected.

There was no evidence to justify the action of the common council, and the proceedings are set aside, with costs.

KERANS v. KERANS.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. 28, 1905.)

1. EQUITY—BILL OF REVIEW—DECREE—VACATION—FRAUD—LEAVE OF COURT—DEMURRER.

A bill, indorsed "bill of review," was filed to set aside a divorce decree recovered by defendant. It alleged that defendant falsely represented his residence in the original suit, and falsely alleged that complainant had deserted him, and that, though defendant had knowledge of complainant's residence when he brought the suit for divorce, he fraudulently procured the same to be conducted as against an absent defendant, whose whereabouts could not be ascertained, and that therefore complainant had no opportunity to appear and defend, though she had a good defense. Held, that the bill was not an original bill to set aside the divorce decree for fraud, but was a bill of review, and was therefore subject to demurrer for failure to allege that it was filed by leave of court.

2. DIVORCE—DECREE—VACATION—FRAUD—PETITION.

Where complainant alleged that defendant obtained a divorce from her by fraudulently and falsely alleging his residence, that complainant had deserted him, and that he had no knowledge of her whereabouts, whereby he acquired his decree ex parte, and that she had no notice whatsoever thereof, she was entitled to have the decree set aside by petition in the cause, and was not required to resort to a bill of review.

3. SAME—APPLICATION TO FILE—DISCRETION.

On an application to file a petition to set aside a divorce decree for fraud in the cause in which the decree was entered, the court is entitled to exercise the same discretion in granting or refusing the filing thereof as on applications to file a bill of review.

Suit by Catherine Kerans against William F. Kerans. On demurrer to a bill of review. Sustained.

Frank P. McDermott, for complainant.
Henry W. Runyon, for defendant.

STEVENSON, V. C. One of the causes of demurrer specified is that the bill which is indorsed "bill of review" does not allege that it was filed with leave of the court. It is conceded by counsel for the complainant that if the bill is in fact a bill of review, as the solicitor for the complainant evidently thought it was when he filed it, the point taken is fatal on demurrer. Story's Eq. Pl. (7th Ed.) § 421b; 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 1578, 1579. In order to avoid the objection above set forth, counsel for complainant endeavors to make it appear that even though the bill was intended as a bill of review, and even though leave to file the same as such might in fact have been obtained, an examination of the bill itself shows that it is not a bill of that character, but is an original bill to impeach a decree for fraud which may be filed without leave from the court. Story's Eq. Pl. (7th Ed.) § 426. I do not think that this view of the bill is tenable. It attacks the decree on some grounds which may properly be presented to the court upon a bill of review, but in my judgment cannot be presented to the court in any original bill filed without leave. Bills of review frequently are based upon, or necessarily involves, charges of perjury, forgery, and other fraud. The distinction between bills of review alleging fraud from original bills to impeach a decree on account of fraud, has not always been sharply drawn. Leaving the decrees of foreign courts out of view, the former class of bills seems to include the latter. See discussion of the nature of the fraud necessary to sustain a bill to impeach a judgment or decree on account thereof by Vice Chancellor Van Fleet, in Dringer v. Receiver of Erie Ry. Co., 42 N. J. Eq. 578-582, 8 Atl. 811. Also opinions of Lords Justices James and Baggallay, in Flower v. Lloyd, 10 Ch. Div. pp. 333, 334; 2 Freeman on Judgments, § 489.

In the present case there seem to be three charges of fraud contained in the bill. Two of these charges, which may be considered together, are in effect that the defendant in his original suit falsely represented that he had been a resident of New Jersey for two years, when in fact he was a resident of New York, and that the defendant also falsely alleged that the complainant had deserted him, whereas in fact the defendant had deserted the complainant by driving her away from their place of abode. These charges of fraud it must be conceded are not distinctly made. The bill does not allege that the complainant was sworn in the cause, and falsely testified to these things. A close examination of this bill illustrates the propriety of the rule which requires the party desiring to file a bill of review to submit his case to the court on petition, and obtain an order permitting the bill to be filed, which order is to a large extent within the discretion of the court, and is based upon the finding of the court that a meritorious case for a rehearing has been made out prima facie. I shall, however, in view of the form of the demurrer and the argument of counsel for the defendant, assume that the bill sufficiently charges that the defendant in his original suit, his divorce suit, imposed on the court by fraudulently making it appear that he was a resident in New Jersey when in fact he was a resident in New York, and by further making it appear that his wife had deserted him when in fact, as he well knew, he had deserted his wife. With this understanding of the gravamen of this bill I think that it is clearly a bill of review. The residence of the complainant was one of the matters presented by the defendant's petition for divorce and actually tried in that case. The question whether the complainant had or had not deserted the defendant was also an issue—the main issue—in the suit. This bill in effect charges that the court came to an erroneous conclusion upon these issues relying upon false and fraudulent testimony. Whether in any case a party who has suffered defeat in a litigation can, without leave of the court, file a bill to have the judgment or decree of which he complains set aside, on the ground that it was based upon perjured testimony or evidence otherwise fraudulent, and, if so, in what cases and under what limitations, such an equitable action will lie, are far broader questions than any which need be discussed for the disposition of this case. I think that there are very few, if any, such cases which cannot be presented to the court upon a bill of review, and, if they can be so presented, then plainly they ought to be so presented, and ought not to be presented by original bills. If this is not a sound conclusion, then there would seem to be no escape from the evils pointed out by Lord Justice James in Flower v. Lloyd, supra.

The bill also charges that the defendant knew that the complainant was a resident of the state of New Jersey when he brought his suit for divorce, and could readily have ascertained her address, and it is the evident intention of the framer of the bill to make it appear that the defendant fraudulently procured the divorce suit to be conducted as against an absent defendant whose whereabouts could not be ascertained, whereby a decree was obtained without giving the complainant a chance to appear and defend. Admitting that the bill sufficiently alleges this sort of a fraud, and that this sort of a fraud, being collateral to the litigation in which the decree complained of was obtained and not being one of the matters at issue in that cause and decided therein, presents a sufficient basis for an original bill to impeach the decree for fraud, it still remains that this ground for attack on the decree is combined with these other grounds and that all of the grounds may be presented, investigated, and disposed of upon a bill of review. In this state of the case the election of the complainant to file a bill of review is an important consideration. The allegations of matters which properly may be considered on a bill of review, but which cannot be properly considered on an original bill to impeach a decree for fraud, certainly cannot be rejected as surplusage in determining the character of the bill. Complainant by his bill presents all these grounds, and he frames and indorses his bill so as to invoke the jurisdiction of the court in such a way that all his grounds of complaint may be considered.

There is another reason in my opinion why the complainant's bill should be deemed strictly a bill of review. The complainant had no notice of the divorce suit which the defendant brought against her. She had no opportunity to be heard. The cause was tried ex parte. She now comes forward alleging her surprise, her lack of opportunity to present her case, and offers proofs that fraud was practiced and injustice done which would not have occurred if she had had an opportunity to present her defense. In this sort of a case no bill of review is necessary, even though the decree has been enrolled. Brinkerhoff v. Franklyn, 21 N. J. Eq. 334; Cawley v. Leonard (1877) 28 N. J. Eq. 467; Day v. Allaire (1879) 31 N. J. Eq. 303, 315; Richardson v. Richardson (N. J. Ch. 1904) 58 Atl. 820. The last-cited case is very nearly on all fours with the present one, although the defendant therein, the wife, had notice of the suit. She was, however, deprived of her opportunity to make her defense by a mistake on the part of her solicitor. An order was made in the cause upon petition, after notice to the husband who had obtained the decree, vacating the enrollment, setting aside the decree, and giving the petitioner time to file an answer. In Clayton v. Clayton, 59 N. J. Eq. 310, 44 Atl. 840, and Watkinson v. Watkinson (N. J. Ch.) 58 Atl. 384, Vice Chancellor Pitney deals with the general rule requiring a bill of review where the party aggrieved by a decree makes his complaint after the enrollment. The learned Vice Chancellor was not dealing with the exception to this rule, illustrated in the cases above cited and in this case, where the decree has been obtained ex parte, and the party aggrieved by it has had no opportunity to make the defense which otherwise he would have put in. In both of the last-cited cases the complainant had full notice of the suit in which the decree was made of which she complained.

Of course, upon applications by petition the court can exercise the same discretion as upon applications to file a bill of review, and in the same way recognize and protect all new interests. Where the party aggrieved by a fraudulent or unjust decree is able to obtain full relief upon a petition for the vacation of the enrollment and the opening of the decree, it seems to me that in many, if not all, cases an application for leave to file a bill of review ought to be denied. If this bill should be regarded as an original bill to impeach a decree for fraud, the court would lose this wholesome control over the case. In my opinion the application by petition in the cause to vacate the enrollment and open the decree is to be encouraged, if not exclusively prescribed, in all cases where such procedure will accomplish justice. I am also of opinion that the bill of review is to be preferred to the original bill filed as of right without leave, and this last-named bill should be left to that comparatively small class of cases, perhaps not as yet fully defined, in which the remedy by an application in the cause for a rehearing or a new trial, and the remedy by a bill of review, are inapplicable or inadequate.

It should be observed that we are not dealing with foreign judgments, which are open to impeachment on the ground of fraud either by the complainant or the defendant in a suit in this court. Foreign judgments, in respect of the jurisdiction of this court to impeach judgments and decrees on the ground of fraud, to some extent constitute a class by themselves. To compel the party injured by a fraudulent judgment of a foreign court to seek redress in the cause, or in the court in which the judgment was rendered, would be to compel such defrauded party, although a citizen of New Jersey, to go to a foreign state for justice. In the case of judgments and decrees of our own courts the present policy of the law in accordance with considerations of simplicity, cheapness, and common sense, should be, I think, to require the party alleging that the judgment or decree is tainted by fraud to seek his remedy in the action at law or suit in equity in which the judgment or decree was rendered, when that remedy is adequate, rather than to commence an independent, original, and expensive suit in this court. This policy is illustrated by the withdrawal of the exercise of jurisdiction by this court on bills for new trials. As fast as the power of the courts of common law has been extended, so as to permit those courts to set aside judgments and grant new trials on the ground of fraud, mistake, or newly discovered evidence, the exercise of jurisdiction by this court has been renounced and curtailed. Hayes v. U. S. Phon. Co. (1903) 65 N. J. Eq. 5, 55 Atl. 84; Wolcott v. Jackson, 52 N. J. Eq. 387, 28 Atl. 1045; Hannon v. Maxwell, 31 N. J. Eq. 318.

My conclusion is that this bill must be deemed a bill of review, and cannot be deemed an original bill filed as of right to impeach a decree for fraud. If the complainant in fact has obtained leave to file this bill as a bill of review, upon notice to the defendant, an amendment may be made alleging such fact. If no leave in fact has been obtained, then upon application for such leave the court will not only look into the merits of the case, but also determine whether if the complainant's case calls for an investigation by this court, such investigation should be made on petition in the original cause to vacate the enrollment and open the decree, or by a bill of review.

I shall advise an order that the demurrer be sustained.

CUNNINGHAM v. MUTUAL LOAN & BUILDING ASS'N OF CITY OF PASSAIC.

(Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. Nov. 27, 1905.)

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS—MATURITY OF STOCK.

When a building loan association, incorporated under the act entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of mutual loan, home-stead and building associations," approved April 9, 1875 (Rev. St. 1875, p. 64), has issued shares of stock in different series, as permitted by the supplement to that act, approved March 29, 1887 (P. L. 1887, p. 62), it may designate by its constitution and by-laws the manner in which such series shall mature and determine. If maturity is thereby to be declared by the directors, the holder of shares in a series thus declared to have matured ceases to be a member, and becomes a creditor of the association, entitled to maintain an action at law for the declared value of the matured shares.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Supreme Court.

Action by Annie Cunningham against the Mutual Loan & Building Association of the City of Passaic. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Thomas M. Moore, for plaintiff in error.
Hugh B. Reed, for defendant in error.

MAGIE, Ch. The judgment brought before us by this writ of error was entered in an action brought by Annie Cunningham, the plaintiff below, against the Mutual Loan & Building Association of the City of Passaic, incorporated under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to encourage the establishment of mutual loan, homestead and building associations," approved April 9, 1875 (Rev. St. 1875, p. 64), the defendant below, to recover money claimed to be due her from that association. The Chief Justice, before whom the issue was tried, refused a motion to nonsuit, and at the close of the evidence directed a verdict for the plaintiff below. Exceptions were duly taken and allowed, and the assignments of error present the question of the propriety of these rulings of the trial judge.

It is first contended that the proofs before the court showed that the plaintiff below was not entitled to maintain an action at law against the association for the recovery of the money she claimed. If the plaintiff below was a member of the association claiming to receive the amount of money due on matured shares upon a claim which required an accounting to determine whether the shares had matured, it seems obvious that her remedy would be in the court of chancery. In the case of Campbell, Receiver, v. Perth Amboy Loan Association, 67 N. J. Law, 71, 50 Atl. 444, a declaration at law averred that by the constitution of one such association, it was provided that each member should receive $200 for his share when the board of directors of the association should have ascertained that the actual value amounted to that sum, and that on a certain day, the board of directors did ascertain the actual value to be that sum. This declaration was demurred to, and the Supreme Court held that the averment that the constitution provided for an ascertainment of value by the board of directors, and upon such ascertainment allowed the member to make claim, was opposed to the provisions of the act above referred to, under which such associations were formed, the first section of which, among other things, declares the purpose of the association thus: "For the further purpose of accumulating a fund to be returned to its members who did not obtain advances, when the funds of such association shall amount to a certain sum per share, to be specified in the articles." This was construed as making the maturity of shares depend, not upon the declaration of the board of directors, but upon the fact of the fund amounting to a specified sum per share. Whether this correctly represents the status of the shareholder in what has been called by the text writers a "terminating society"; that is, a society which ceases to maintain its existence when the shares of stock have attained to the value of the sum fixed by the articles of the association, need not be decided. For the plaintiff below was a shareholder of an association issuing its shares in successive series, and the question is whether such associations have not enlarged privileges in respect to the maturity of successive series, and whether they are limited by the language of the first section of the act, which formed the basis of the conclusion of the Supreme Court in the case above cited. The power to issue shares of stock in series was granted by a supplement to the original act, approved March 29, 1887 (P. L. 1887, p. 62), the first section of which is in these words: "That any association which now is or hereafter may become incorporated under the provisions of the act to which this is a further supplement, may issue shares of stock in different series, to mature and determine in such manner as may be designated in and by the constitution and by-laws of such association or any amendment lawfully made thereto. By a further supplement, approved February 14, 1888 (P. L. 1888, p. 36), the preamble to which recited that doubts had arisen as to the right to issue new shares or series of shares under their original acts of incorporation, and that to remove all doubts and authorize the forming of such new series, it was provided that such series as had previously been issued, and series which might thereafter be issued, should be valid and effective, although they increased the number of shares of the association beyond the limit fixed in the certificate of incorporation. By this supplement it was further provided that the relative value of the shares of successive series should be kept separate and distinct, and the value thereof reported in an annual statement to the shareholders. A comparison of the first section of the supplement of 1887 with the first section of the original act, clearly indicates a legislative intent to make the maturity and termination of series of shares depend upon the scheme designated in the constitution and by-laws of the association.

The constitution of this association was put in evidence. By section 4 of article 2, it provided for a new series of shares to be issued at each annual meeting of the association, unless such shareholder should otherwise determine. Section 6, of the same article, provides that at each monthly meeting of the board of directors, the approximate value of each share shall be declared, for the convenience of all concerned, estimated upon the profits actually made. By section 4 of article 3 it was provided that each shareholder should pay $1 per month per share until, by the payments so made and the profits accumulated thereon, the said share should be declared to have attained a par value of $200, when that sum should be payable in cash or its equivalent, in the manner set forth in section 8 of article 2. Section 8 of article 2 provides that when the shares in a particular series shall have attained a par value of $200 each, one-half of the receipts of the association should be appropriated and set aside by the board of directors, exclusively, for the refunding and repayment thereof, and priority in such payments should be given to that shareholder willing to allow the highest premium; but one-half of 1 per cent. a month should be allowed on all such money from the time such share is declared at par, until the whole of such payment is made. The change of scheme indicated by the difference between the language of the first section of the original act and the first section of the supplement of 1887, was within legislative competency, and need not be vindicated by the court. I think, however, that the legislative change of scheme was upon the ground of material difference in the cases. A terminating society, whose existence ceased with the maturity of all its stock, stood upon a different footing from a continuing society, or serial company, issuing series of stock and dealing with the respective profits arising from respective payments. In regard to those successively maturing series of shares, the association continued to maintain its corporate existence, and a reason existed for providing how the maturity of shares should be determined. The legislative scheme was to permit that to be fixed by the association, and if the association has fixed a scheme, the shareholders must be held bound thereby. That this association had fixed a scheme, seems to be clear. By the extracts from the constitution above referred to, it thereby committed to the board of directors the power to declare when a series had reached maturity. When that declaration has been made, a shareholder in that series is in a changed relation to the association. He is no longer a member, but has become a creditor, to whom the association is liable for the amount of his matured shares, payable according to the provisions of the constitution.

The proofs showed that the plaintiff below became a member of the association in 1880, taking five shares in the fifth series, and that, in 1889, she took five more shares in the same series; that she paid all dues and charges on her 10 shares until July or August, 1897, when William Malcolm, who had been the secretary of the association from the time she became a member, and who continued to hold that office, for some time after, told her that the fifth series had matured; that the book in which her payments and credits were entered, showed entries by Malcolm, indicating credits to her of $2,007.50, in August, 1897; that the minutes of the board of directors showed that, at a meeting on July 12, 1897, a vote was had, declaring the actual value of the various series of shares from the fifth to the twenty-fourth, inclusive, and that the value of the fifth series was thus declared to be $200.75. Under the provisions of section 140 of the practice act (P. L. 1903, p. 575), interrogatories were served on the association, the defendant below, and written answers thereto under the oath of its president were served on the plaintiff below. They were filed and received in evidence. The following are pertinent: "Interrogatory 1. Upon what date did the fifth series of stock in the defendant association mature? Answer. July 12, 1897. * * * Interrogatory 18. Has one-half of the revenue of the association been sufficient since the maturity of the fifth series of stock to pay the maturity value of all the shareholders in said series? Answer. The defendant believes that it has." Plaintiff below further testified that about a month after the secretary had told her that the fifth series had matured, she called on him for the money due on her shares, and was asked by him to leave it in the association, and was told that it would draw interest. She demanded and received from him $300. While she declares that he persuaded her to leave the balance, she also declares that she left it because she could not get it. Her book shows a payment of $300 at that time, and that since that time she had been paid interest by the association on the shares left undrawn, so that in May, 1900, there was $1,700 yet undrawn. There were produced by the association at the trial, two drafts, which plaintiff below put in evidence. They were dated August 11, 1897, and drawn by the proper officers of the association to the order of Annie Cunningham, one for $1,007.50, and one for $1,000. Each was expressed to be for "account of withdrawal of book 471," which was the book of plaintiff below. Although plaintiff below could neither read nor write, each draft purported to have her signature indorsed thereon. Both were stamped paid, but there was no claim that Annie Cunningham received the money thereon.

Upon this evidence, it seems clear that the maturity of these shares had been declared in the manner prescribed by the scheme of the constitution, and that it had been recognized by the association by its officers. Thereafter the plaintiff below became a creditor of the association, entitled to receive her money, provided the funds arising from the appropriation of one-half of the receipts of the association should be sufficient for her payment. Under such circumstances, her remedy could be had by an action at law. The learned trial judge was justified in declaring that she had become a creditor of the association. On the part of the association it was, however, further insisted that it was erroneous to direct a verdict for the whole amount of the claim of the plaintiff below as indicated by her book. The evidence on its part disclosed that Malcolm, the secretary of the association, had been a defaulter, and that the funds of the association, to a large amount, had disappeared so that, in 1902, there was a deficiency of $118,000. The contention is that the plaintiff below should submit to bear her share of the loss thus disclosed. If she were a member holding shares in a nonmatured series, such, undoubtedly, would be the case, and an accounting, which she might demand in equity must recognize her liability to share the losses of the association. But such is not her position. From the declaration of the directors in July 1897, or at least, from the period in August when her book disclosed the maturity of her shares, she was not a member, but a creditor of the association. It is said that there is proof that some of the embezzlements of Malcolm antedated the declaration of the maturity of the fifth series, so that it would, or might affect the maturity and the declaration of the directors. The evidence was entirely insufficient to disclose any embezzlement prior to the date in question. If such prior defalcation had been disclosed, and it had been proved that it, in fact, affected the fifth series, it would not have disturbed the conclusion above reached. If the declaration of the directors, made within the scheme of the constitution, was erroneous and mistaken, the right of the other shareholders and the directors representing them was to have their declaration reviewed and set aside. They could not defeat the holder of matured shares in an action at law, except by avoiding the declaration which formed the foundation of the shareholder's claim.

There is no contention made that the fund out of which the shares of plaintiff below may be paid, has not amounted to sufficient to serve that purpose and to be applicable thereto. This appears from the answers to the interrogatories served upon the association, and the proofs. There was therefore nothing to submit to a jury. The Chief Justice correctly held that plaintiff below was a creditor of the association, entitled to sue at law, and he was justified in directing a verdict.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

WILSON v. TERRY et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 2, 1905.)

1. MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEED—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a suit to have a deed from a husband to his wife, through a third person, declared a mortgage, held insufficient to authorize finding for complainant, in view of the rule that complainant's proof must be clear and convincing, and the rule that a conveyance from husband to wife, so far as not based on consideration, is presumed to be intended as a gift.

2. WITNESSES—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTION WITH DECEDENT.

Where complainant, in an action to have his deed to decedent declared a mortgage and for an accounting, in which action he is also a party as administrator of decedent, is called generally as a witness, his testimony of transactions with decedent to show the deed was a mortgage is in his own behalf, and not in his behalf as administrator, and so is inadmissible under Evidence Act (P. L. 1900, p. 363) § 4.

3. EVIDENCE—ADMISSION—EFFECT.

Evidence of statements of the grantee in a deed, made after its execution, in the nature of admissions that it was intended as a mortgage, to overcome, after her death, the effect of the previous conduct of the parties and the written admissions of the grantee, must be very clear and convincing.

Suit by Frederick F. Wilson against Georgiana B. Terry and others. Heard on bill, amended bill, answer, replication, and proofs. Decree for defendants.

Frank Durand and David Harvey, Jr., for complainant. James D. Carton and Gilbert Collins, for defendants.

EMERY, V. C. The complainant's bill is filed by him in his individual capacity and as administrator of his deceased wife against the two defendants, Mrs. Terry and Mrs. Smith, the sisters and heirs at law of his wife. The general object of the bill is to have the absolute deed under which the wife at her death held the title to a hotel property at Asbury Park, called the "Laurel House," declared to be only a mortgage given to secure the wife for the advances made, or liabilities assumed, by her in the payment of debts incurred by her husband, in the purchase and improvement of the property. The money for the payment of these debts of the husband, amounting to about $6,000, was procured from the Long Branch Banking Company, upon the individual note of the wife for that amount, on the transfer of the property to her by the husband, and it is claimed by the bill that the object of the conveyance to the wife was to secure her for the liability assumed on the note, and that the note was subsequently paid out of the rents of the property. The entire indebtedness is alleged to be paid, and a decree is asked declaring and directing a conveyance from the heirs to the complainant. The bill was originally filed by the complainant alone; but, being in effect also a bill to redeem, including an account of the amount due on the mortgage, the administrator of the alleged mortgagee was thought to be a necessary party, and at the hearing the bill was amended by consent making complainant a party in that capacity. No claim, however, is made for rents received beyond the payment of the mortgage, and it is alleged by the bill that complainant, as well as his wife, had control of the rents after the execution of the deed. The circumstances under which the deed to the wife was executed were as follows:

The complainant in July or August, 1883, agreed to purchase of Rev. George Clarke the land in question, which was then unimproved, for $8,000, and paid $200 on account of the purchase money. In the fall of 1883 complainant, before securing title, commenced the erection of a large hotel building on the premises, which was ready for renting by May, 1884, and was then rented to a Mrs. Pemberton for three years at $1,600 a year, besides $225 per year for the rent of two stores in the building, altogether $1,825, all of which was paid to complainant before the delivery of the deed in December following. Complainant had not sufficient means to pay for the building erected, but had from his own property made payments on account to the extent, as he claims, of about $4,000, including the amounts received from rent. One thousand seven hundred dollars was paid to the mason, of which $1,300 was paid by conveying to the mason a property owned by complainant and taken at that value, and complainant claims to have paid besides about $600 to Martin, a carpenter, on account of his bill, between $200 and $300 to the painter, and other payments to the slater and men working on the building, the amounts of which are not specified. He also paid Barber, Towner & Fielder about $2,000 on account of their bill of $4,000, borrowing for this purpose the note of a Mrs. Harrison, which was indorsed over by him to this firm. There is no sufficient reason to doubt that the complainant before the passing of the title, about December 15, 1884, had expended from his own funds (including the rents of the property) about $5,000 (including the $2,000 note) towards the purchase and improvement of the property. There still remained debts to the amount of about $6,000, and complainant's means, as well as his credit, were exhausted. Complainant had previously arranged for a loan of $9,000 on the property from the executors of a Robert Patterson, but beyond this does not seem to have been able to borrow from outsiders money on the property. Mrs. Wilson had considerable property in land and securities, but had not in cash sufficient means to pay the balance due on the property. The builders were pressing for payment, and threatening suits and liens, and at least one suit was commenced against Wilson, on which judgment was obtained.

In this situation Wilson applied to his wife, who agreed to take over the property and pay the outstanding debts. The arrangement by which this agreement was carried out was as follows:

On December 15, 1884, Mr. Clarke, the vendor, together with Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, Mr. David Harvey, Jr., counsel for Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Hawkins, counsel representing building creditors, and Mr. Johnson, the cashier of the Long Branch Banking Company, met at Freehold. Mr. Clarke delivered his deed for the property, made out to the complainant, dated October 21, 1884, and acknowledged November 28, 1884, by Mr. Clarke and his wife, before an officer of Westchester county, N. Y., where they then resided. Complainant executed and delivered to Clarke his own bond (bearing the same date as the deed) for $8,000, the entire purchase money, payable in three years, which was secured by a mortgage on the premises executed by Mr. and Mrs. Wilson to Clarke, dated October 21, 1884, but acknowledged on December 15, 1884. Wilson delivered, also, his bond for $1,000 to the executors of Robert Patterson, also payable three years after its date, and Mr. and Mrs. Wilson also executed a mortgage on the property to secure this bond. The bond and mortgage were both dated October 21, 1884, but this mortgage was executed and acknowledged December 15, 1884, the first day of the meeting at Freehold, but because of the omission to have checks certified the deliveries were not made on that day. On the following day the Patterson executors paid to Clarke $8,072 (being the principal sum, with interest from the date of the mortgage), taking an assignment of his mortgage, and the $1,000 loaned on the mortgage was, according to Mr. Harvey, paid to the complainant, but was probably used to pay the expenses of obtaining the loan and the interest due Mr. Clarke. On the 16th of December Wilson and his wife executed to Edward M. Fielder a general warranty deed for the premises, subject only to the $9,000 mortgages, for the nominal consideration of $1. This deed to Fielder was made for the purpose of conveying the title to Mrs. Wilson, and Fielder did not assume the payment of the mortgages. The deed from Fielder and his wife, drawn and dated on the 15th of December, was acknowledged and delivered on the 19th. This was a bargain and sale deed, conveying the premises to Mrs. Wilson for the nominal consideration of $1, subject to the $9,000 mortgages, the payment of which was assumed by Mrs. Wilson. Whether Fielder was present on the 16th does not clearly appear, but his wife was not there, and the delay of three days in conveying the property to Mrs. Wilson was probably due to the necessity of having her join in the deed. On December 15, 1884, and before the conveyance to her of the hotel property, Mrs. Wilson and her husband executed to the Long Branch Banking Company a mortgage upon other property in Asbury Park belonging to Mrs. Wilson to secure the sum of $6,000. This sum is declared to be payable according to the condition of a certain bond in the penal sum of $12,000, but the bond has not been produced. This mortgage was recorded on the date of its execution, and before any of the deeds or mortgages on the hotel property were delivered, and before the mortgages were executed. Mrs. Wilson also assigned to the bank, as further security for the loan, mortgages on property in Cincinnati, held by her as her own property. On the same day, December 15, 1884, Mrs. Wilson gave her individual note to the bank for $6,000, payable three months after date, and the amount of this note, less the discount $93, was placed to her credit in the bank on December 17th.

By checks on this account, all dated December 16, 1884, amounting to $5,809.50, Mrs. Wilson paid all the bills outstanding against the property. This included $180 insurance and $82.50 taxes on the property. The $1,000 received from the Patterson executors was probably taken for the payment of the commission and expenses of the loan, about $400, Mr. Wilson says, and the interest due to Mr. Clarke. A memorandum in Mrs. Wilson's diary, under date of December 16th, states that Clarke received $8,478.53. On this transfer of title no evidence of debt from Mr. Wilson to his wife was given, nor was any written agreement or other paper executed either at the time or afterwards to further explain or qualify the transaction as between Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, nor does Mrs. Wilson seem to have been specially represented by counsel. The value of the property at the time of the transfer has been estimated at from $15,000 to $20,000. None of the defendants' witnesses fix the value at less than $15,000 in 1884, which figure is also fixed by one of the complainant's witnesses. The estimates of value, given after this length of time and only from general knowledge and recollection of the values of property at that time, are, of course, to be considered with some caution. Complainant and Mr. Clarke, estimating the values rather from the basis of the cost of the land and buildings, fix, respectively, about $19,000 and $20,000 as the value, in which latter estimate Mr. Winsor, another witness for complainant, concurs. He was in 1884 secretary of a building loan association, which made loans in Asbury Park, and also owns property in the neighborhood and has bought and sold property in that locality. The property was in a good location, and a fair value at the time, had the question been one between seller and purchaser dealing at arms length, would probably not have been as low as $15,000; neither, on the other hand, as between borrower and lender, dealing on the same basis, would a sum as large as $15,000 have been loaned on the property. Mr. Johnson, for the bank, had declined to loan $3,500 on the property subject to the $9,000 mortgage.

It is clear, I think, that in this transaction, and in order to determine whether by the agreement between the parties made at the time, the absolute title was to be conveyed to Mrs. Wilson, or whether, as complainant claims, she took the title only to secure her against the liabilities she assumed on the note and mortgages, due weight must be given to the fact that the transaction was between husband and wife, and that the husband was dealing with the wife's money for his benefit in relieving him of obligations he had incurred. The relations then existing between husband and wife were not only amicable, but it appears, also, the wife was devoting her own income to the support of herself and husband, as for personal reasons she did not wish him to continue active work in his profession of minister. The complainant, Mr. Clarke, the vendor, and Mr. Harvey, the attorney for Mr. Wilson, are the only survivors of the persons attending the meeting at Freehold, and their evidence is strongly relied on to support complainant's claim. Mr. Clarke, whose testimony impressed me as entirely truthful, says frankly that it is difficult after the lapse of 20 years to recall the conversation; but it was the general subject of conversation in the room that Mr. Wilson was to transfer the property to his wife for this loan from the Long Branch Bank. He says it was understood that after he conveyed the title to Mr. Wilson he conveyed it to Mr. Fielder, and Mr. Fielder to Mrs. Wilson, as security for a loan, but that he cannot after this lapse of time swear that it was stated by any one there in Mrs. Wilson's presence that the property was to be conveyed to her as security. His impression, moreover, is that the conversation he speaks of in relation to the loan was between him and Mr. Johnson, the cashier of the bank, with which Mr. Clarke also kept his own account.

Mr. Harvey's account is somewhat more definite. He attended as representing Mr. Wilson in procuring the loan of $9,000 from the Patterson estate. He says that there was talk about an additional amount of $6,000, which was to be raised to pay claims against the property incurred by Mr. Wilson, over and above the amount he was borrowing, and it was stated that Mrs. Wilson was to raise the money from the Long Branch Banking Company on her securities, and that to secure her Mr. Wilson was to convey the Laurel House property. Mr. Harvey was called on to prepare the deeds at that time, and did so. As he thinks, an application had been made to the bank for a loan on Wilson's note, indorsed by his wife, and he recalls distinctly the statement of Mr. Johnson (the cashier of the bank) on that day that he could not loan on that kind of security, because Mrs. Wilson was a married woman, and that he thinks this was what suggested the conveyance to Mrs. Wilson, so that she could become the principal. The deeds from Wilson to Fielder and from Fielder to Mrs. Wilson were prepared at Mr. Wilson's direction, and Mrs. Wilson was present the first day when the talk occurred, but whether on the second or not Mr. Harvey is not sure. On cross-examination he says that his recollection is that it took a little persuasion to get Mrs. Wilson to go into the deal. So far as this witness can now recall in detail the conversation about the deed, between the parties who were there, including Mrs. Wilson, they finally agreed that Mrs. Wilson was to execute a note to the bank, and the amount of $6,000 was agreed upon, and the property was to be conveyed by Mr. Wilson to his wife, through Mr. Fielder, and it was stated that it was taken to make Mrs. Wilson safe for her liability. The exact words witness cannot give, and he thinks nothing was said about giving Mr. Wilson anything to show that it was for security only. He did not understand from the conversation that Mrs. Wilson was to own the property, but the impression he got was that she took title as security for her liability, but he does not know that word was used. As he recalls, when the matter first came up, Mrs. Wilson didn't care to have anything to do with it. She was opposed at first to giving her note. She took the position that the property would not secure her, and he thinks they persuaded her that it would. Mr. Harvey was Mr. Wilson's counsel, and Mrs. Wilson had no counsel in the transaction. As to Mrs. Wilson's assuming payment of the mortgages for $9,000 as part of the consideration of the conveyance, Mr. Harvey, who drew the deed, says that the assumption was omitted purposely from Fielder's deed, because he wished to relieve him from any responsibility; that he does not recall any suggestion to him that he should or should not put the clause in Mrs. Wilson's deed; that he did it of his own accord, simply because she was the grantee, and it was his custom when making conveyances from husband to wife through third persons, where the intention is to vest the title in the wife; that he followed his custom of drawing papers, and probably didn't give any consideration at all to its not being a natural thing to do if the wife was going to hold the deed as a mortgage.

Mr. Wilson's own account of the circumstances of giving the deed is substantially this: That after arranging for the $9,000 loan from the Patterson estate he applied to Mr. Johnson for a $3,500 loan on his note, with a second mortgage on the property, but Mr. Johnson did not think the security was quite sufficient. He then asked Mrs. Wilson if she would not raise the money. Mr. Johnson said, if Mrs. Wilson would put up certain securities, he would loan $6,000. Mrs. Wilson said she would, but she would like to be secured. "As I had nothing better, I said to her, 'Take title to secure you for the papers you put up.'" And this was agreed upon. This seems to be an account of a conversation between the witness and his wife alone, before the meeting at Freehold, and complainant's account of the interview at Freehold is confined to a statement of the papers which were then executed to carry out the agreement between him and his wife. Complainant's evidence as to transaction with the wife was admitted subject to objection, and leave reserved to move to strike out the evidence at the argument. My impression at the hearing was that under the ruling in Smith v. Burnet (Err. & App. 1882) 35 N. J. Eq. 314, and Adoue v. Spencer (Err. & App. 1900) 62 N. J. Eq. 782, 794, 49 Atl. 10, 56 L. R. A. 817, 90 Am. St. Rep. 484, the evidence was inadmissible, under the evidence act (Revision of 1900, P. L. p. 363, § 4), excluding "testimony to be given by any party to the action as to any transaction with or statement by any testator or intestate represented in said action, unless the representative offers himself as a witness on his own behalf, and testifies to any transaction with or statement by his testator or intestate, in which event the other party may be a witness on his own behalf, as to all transactions with or statements by such testator or intestate, which are pertinent to the issue." The administrator being a necessary party in the suit, the rule considered by me in McKinley v. Coe (1904) 66 N. J. Eq. 70, 57 Atl. 1030, to be settled in this court, that the evidence was admissible in suits against heirs or devisees, to which the administrator was not a party, does not apply.

Counsel for complainant urge that the evidence is admissible as evidence given by the administrator on his own behalf under the statute. The complainant was, however, called generally and the evidence was given on his behalf individually, and not specially on his behalf as administrator. On a bill to have a deed declared a mortgage the interest of the mortgagor and of the personal representative is perhaps the same, so far as it involves the conversion of real estate into a personal security, upon which the personal representative is entitled to receive the amount due, but it is essentially an adverse interest, in that it seeks to impose on the personal representative a contract of the testator under which the representative is bound to account under the mortgage. Regularly, therefore, the representative would be a party defendant in such suit, not a party complainant, and the fact that complainant is himself the representative, and must therefore be complainant in that character, does not make the evidence given by complainant, tending to establish his claim against the personal estate, evidence given by the representative on his own behalf; i. e., on behalf of the estate. Excluding the evidence of complainant as to the circumstances under which the deed was originally given, I do not think the evidence of Mr. Clarke and Mr. Harvey, the only other witnesses as to the facts transpiring at the time of execution of the deed, warrants the conclusion that the title was intended to be conveyed to the wife by way of mortgage only, and not absolutely. Their evidence must be taken in connection with the things actually done, and their statements as to the wife taking title go no further than to show that the property was supposed to be the wife's security for the liabilities she was personally incurring, and which she was expected to pay, and was able to pay. This would be the case whether the title was absolute or by way of mortgage, for the wife undoubtedly supposed she was running some risk in raising the money, and had nothing to show for it but the property. The documents executed are all consistent with the intention, as between husband and wife, that the title then taken should be absolute in the wife. Her assumption of the mortgages for $9,000 is not to be explained in any other view, nor is the absence of any writing or document, showing either that any debt from the husband to his wife existed or that the husband held any right in the property, consistent with the view that the title was not absolute. The wife was acting without counsel, and it was a situation in which no counsel would probably have advised her that the transaction was a safe or prudent loan. She should, therefore, not be deprived of any right or advantage given to her by the transfer, unless it clearly appears that it would be inequitable for her to retain it. Nor should she be deprived of the title she received, except upon very clear and satisfactory evidence that she then understood that the title was not absolute in her, but was then intended merely as a mortgage, and that her husband had the right to call for a reconveyance. The general rule in all cases where absolute deeds are claimed to be mortgages is that the burden of proof is upon the grantor, and his proof must be clear and convincing, and the present case is within the application of the additional rule or presumption relating to conveyances of property from the husband to the wife, viz., that the conveyances, so far as they are not based on consideration, are presumed to be intended as gifts of the husband's property to the wife.

In this case the husband and wife were not bargaining with each other at arm's length, but the wife, at the husband's instance, was undertaking to relieve him of the liabilities then pressing him for the purchase and improvement of the property, and to save the amount he had already expended. The amount which Mrs. Wilson assumed and advanced was much more than would be advanced as a mere loan on the property, and was nearly, if not quite, the full value of it. The husband's entire property was exhausted, and beyond the amounts paid by Mrs. Wilson he was liable on the $2,000 note of Mrs. Harrison, borrowed for his benefit and indorsed over to Towner for debts incurred in building the hotel. Mrs. Wilson did not assume this or any other indebtedness or obligations beyond the $15,000 for debts which were chargeable on the property itself. It is probable that Wilson's financial situation at the time was a motive, at least on his part, and probably on the part of both husband and wife, for having the absolute title of the property in his wife, and for passing the title in such manner as to clearly show a purchase on her part for the fair value of the property. All documents indicated a purchase, and none were executed which indicated a loan to the husband or a mortgage of his interest in the land, and this view that Wilson's financial position and prospects was one reason for making the transaction an absolute sale to the wife, rather than a mortgage, derives additional probability from Wilson's subsequent conduct. Several judgments were obtained against him in the years 1887 and 1888, amounting altogether to about $1,000, and in 1898 one for $800 was obtained by the bank, of which Mr. Johnson was still the cashier. Two of the judgments recovered in 1887, amounting to about $330, and which were recovered against complainant and his brother, were satisfied by defendant's brother in 1901, and the other judgments remained outstanding until about the same time, and the judgment held by the bank, on which over $1,000 was due, was settled with Mr. Johnson for $250. In explaining Johnson's willingness to make this settlement for the bank after the $6,000 note given by Mrs. Wilson had long been paid, complainant says that Johnson was a good man, that he offered to take in settlement this $250, which came out of property complainant owned, and that he (complainant) didn't then claim this hotel as his individual property. But, in view of Johnson's participation in the transaction at Freehold, it would seem probable that no agreement was made in his presence that the title to Mrs. Wilson was taken only as security for her liability on the note.

The view that Wilson's financial condition received some consideration at the time, if the transfer may be fairly inferred from Wilson's own statement at the hearing of his evidence is to be considered. He says that in 1891 and 1892, after the notes and mortgages were paid (for the most part by Mrs. Wilson's own money), he talked to his wife about reconveying the property, and she said "that, as I hadn't been able to keep it in the first place, perhaps it had better remain where it was at present." He seems to have acquiesced in this as long as Mrs. Wilson lived, without making any further claim on her for the property. And in October, 1897, in letters hereafter referred to, he assures her that the property is hers, and the only claim then made against her was that she had said when the Laurel House was out of debt she would make him a monthly allowance. This conclusion that the transfer papers as executed contained the whole agreement between the parties, and that Mrs. Wilson intended to buy the property, is corroborated by the only other direct evidence bearing on the intention of the parties prior to the execution of the deed, being the testimony of Mr. Smith, the husband of the defendant Mrs. Smith, a sister of Mrs. Wilson. He was in business at Asbury Park, and for some years before 1884 had been Mrs. Wilson's agent in many transactions, collecting rents, procuring insurance, etc. He says that in the summer of 1884 Mrs. Wilson came to him in relation to the purchase of the hotel, and he ascertained for her the amounts against the property, which were approximately $15,000, including the purchase of the land. After this ascertainment, and in the latter part of September or early part of October, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, together with witness and his wife, met at the office of Mr. Hawkins, who represented most of the claimants. The question of Mrs. Wilson's purchasing the property came up, and Smith's advice was asked as to whether it would be advisable for her to purchase or not, and Smith said to her that it would be a good purchase, a good property to own at that price. She was reluctant to purchase, but finally consented to purchase, if, on further investigation, there were no other claims against the property, and said that she would pay them off and buy the property as an investment. When she consented to do this, Wilson said to his wife: "Frank, that is the best bargain you ever made in your life." After this interview, and in October, the witness, on Mrs. Wilson's behalf, went to see Mr. Johnson (in whose bank witness was also a depositor) about placing a loan on Mrs. Wilson's property in Asbury Park to secure a loan of $6,000, and told Johnson that Mrs. Wilson wanted to purchase the hotel property, that she had not the money, but had mortgages on Cincinnati property which she was about to turn into money, and wanted to borrow this money temporarily until she could cash the mortgages. After going over the security she could give, Mr. Johnson agreed to loan the $6,000 to her, taking the Asbury Park property and the further security of the Cincinnati mortgages. Smith reported this agreement to Mrs. Wilson, and this was the plan actually carried out in December. The delay of over two months occurred because, as Mr. Smith says, it was subsequently ascertained that there was an additional charge on the property, and this was more than Mrs. Wilson wanted to pay, but finally she consented to go ahead and pay the extra amount and take the property. A memorandum made by Mrs. Wilson in her diary for October 22, 1884, indicates that the amount of her note was then to be $5,000, but one of December 13, 1884, states that she and her husband went to Long Branch to see about getting the $6,000 mortgage. Mrs. Smith corroborates her husband as to the interview in Mr. Hawkins' office, but her evidence of statements in the presence of testatrix is, by stipulation, to be stricken out, if Mr. Wilson's evidence is not competent, and I therefore do not consider it. Smith's evidence, if true, is very important, for the arrangement of purchase proposed in his presence and acquiesced in by complainant was the one actually carried out, and agrees with all the written evidence of the transaction.

Complainant's counsel suggest that the arrangement for purchase may have been subsequently changed, but clear proof of this is necessary, as the change was one against Mrs. Wilson's interest, rather than in her favor, and the proofs offered in relation to the interview at Freehold are not sufficient to establish such an entire change in the original plan. Wilson's own evidence, if competent, does not prove or suggest that there ever was any change in the plan agreed on between himself and his wife, and, if his evidence is considered, it must be noted that he did not contradict this evidence of Smith and his wife as to the interview in Mr. Hawkins' office and his declaration to his wife that this was the best bargain she had ever made. In support of the contention that this plan of purchase, if originally made, was afterwards changed, it is urged that the execution of the deed from Clarke to Wilson, and the subsequent transfer to Mrs. Wilson, show that Wilson, and not Mrs. Wilson, was to purchase. But a more probable reason for the transaction in this form is that Clarke, the vendor, having agreed to sell to Wilson, had the deed, signed by himself and wife, made out to Wilson in October and acknowledged in November in New York state, where Clarke resided, and on his attending in December without his wife it was necessary, in order to avoid delay, that the sale should be carried out in the form actually adopted by a deed to Wilson and then through an intermediary to Mrs. Wilson. Looking alone at the whole evidence relating to the circumstances up to the time of the execution of the deed, I find that this evidence is not sufficient to establish that the deed was not an absolute deed, but a mortgage. And the further question is whether the evidence relating to the action, conduct, or declarations of the parties, and especially of Mrs. Wilson, subsequent to the deed, either alone or taken in connection with the other evidence in the case, is sufficient to establish that the deed was originally intended as a mortgage. The intention of the parties at the time of the execution is the vital question, and the evidence of subsequent transactions is generally important only as authorizing inferences in relation to the intention at the time. Frink v. Adams, 38 N. J. Eq. 485 (Van Fleet, V. C.; 1883), affirmed on appeal 38 N. J. Eq. 287. But, in relation to their subsequent conduct, the relation of the parties has also an important bearing; for, even if the original transaction was only for securing the wife's obligation on the note, as the bill alleges, the subsequent investment in the property of the wife's money, with the consent and acquiescence of the husband, while the title stood in her name, might, under the usual presumption as to husband and wife, be considered as indicating a gift on the husband's part of his entire interest in the property.

The evidence relating to the dealings of the parties, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, with the hotel property subsequent to the delivery of the deed, including the evidence offered as to their declarations in regard to it, is substantially as follows: At the time of the transfer of title the hotel was under lease to a Mrs. Pemberton, for a term expiring in 1887, at an annual rental of $1,600, payable March 1st, June 1st, and August 1st, as appears by an entry in Mrs. Wilson's diary under date of December 16, 1884. This tenant continued the occupation until the termination of her lease; her payments of rent, when made in cash, being, as Mr. Wilson says, by checks payable to the order of Mrs. Wilson, and indorsed by her and deposited to the credit of her bank account with the Long Branch Banking Company. For the rent of the year 1885 the tenant, as appears by Mrs. Wilson's entry in her diary of April 18, 1885, was allowed on account of the rent of the year $384.23 for ranges and gas fixtures put in the property. On August 12, 1885, a payment of $500 was made on account of the $6,000 note. Mrs. Wilson appears to have paid the interest charges on the whole amount ($15,000) carried on mortgage, besides insurance and taxes. These annual charges amounted to about $1,200 in 1885. In 1886 payments were also made on the $6,000 note; three payments of $500 each being credited on the dates May 6th, August 4th, and August 20th. Three payments of $500 each were also made in 1887, on April 12th, July 7th, and August 8th, and in 1888, on April 11th, May 8th, and August 8th, leaving due on the note $1,000, which was paid on May 15, 1889. Mr. Wilson says that these payments were all made out of the rents of the hotel property, except the last payment of $1,000, which was paid in part out of the rents of other property owned by Mrs. Wilson. As to some of the payments, those of May 6, 1886, the three payments in 1887, and the payments of April 11 and May 8, 1888, his statement as to the source of the money is corroborated by the bank account of Mrs. Wilson, which shows deposits to her credit on or shortly after the dates when the rent came due, and charges against her account for substantially these amounts. The bank accounts, however, seem to have been the general bank accounts of Mrs. Wilson, and the rents deposited (if these were the rents) comprised only about one-half of the deposits. The deposits for the year 1887, for instance (which is the only year for which complete accounts have been produced), show a total credit of $2,964, and the account of 1888, up to October 4th, of about $3,000. Mrs. Wilson drew generally against this account, especially for the payment of the semiannual interest due on the Patterson mortgages ($270), which, together with the other charges on the property, including repairs, were paid from this account. Mr. Wilson's statement, therefore, as to the note being paid from the rents can, in view of these accounts, only be taken to mean that amounts equivalent to the rent were annually paid on the note from the bank accounts in which the rents were deposited. These payments of $1,500 yearly from the rents, if specially applied on the note, left Mrs. Wilson to make up from other funds the entire annual charges on the property; and, while these payments on the note may show that Mrs. Wilson was desirous of paying off this liability as soon as possible from all her resources, including the rents of the hotel, they do not show that the payments were so made from the rents of the hotel as to justify the inference that these were specially applied to the payment of the note, in pursuance of any prior agreement that the transfer of title was made only to secure against liability on the note. Manifestly the net rents only (after deducting all charges) would be applicable under such an agreement, and the entire absence of anything like an account against this property or against Mr. Wilson for payments on account of it, in connection with this confusion of the rents and the note payments with all her other receipts and payments in her bank account, indicates to my mind that as between Mr. and Mrs. Wilson the rents from this property belonged to her as much as the rents of her other property. No bank accounts after 1888 of either Mr. or Mrs. Wilson have been produced. In reference to the Patterson mortgages, it appears by a receipt on the bond for $8,000 that on October 22d, 1889, Mrs. Wilson paid $2,500 of the principal of this mortgage. On October 21, 1890, Mrs. Wilson, as appears by a separate receipt, made another payment of $2,000, reducing it to $4,500; the source of the money not appearing. But in 1891 Mrs. Wilson received $4,500 from the payment of a mortgage on her Cincinnati property, and this money was used, as Mr. Wilson says, to pay the balance due on the Patterson mortgage, and on February 6, 1891, the last payment of $1,079.50 was made on this mortgage, and it was canceled of record. The large payments in 1889 and 1890 could not have been made from the clear net rents of the hotel property, and must have been made largely from Mrs. Wilson's other resources. No account as between Mr. and Mrs. Wilson was ever kept as to any of these payments, and the fact that the mortgages were, with Mr. Wilson's knowledge, paid off mainly by money not derived from the property, and were canceled of record, goes very far, in my judgment, to establish the fact that, whatever may have been the original understanding, the property was then considered to belong absolutely to Mrs. Wilson, and that she did not hold it as mortgagee to secure merely her liability on the note or debts from her husband. The subsequent dealing between husband and wife, bearing upon the title to the property, point to the same conclusion. In December, 1895, Mrs. Wilson sold for $450 a small strip of the property, for which she received the consideration money; her husband joining in the deed. The unincumbered title being in Mrs. Wilson from 1891, she and her husband in June, 1898, executed a mortgage on the property for a loan of $2,500, which was used by Mrs. Wilson for her own purposes. On November 11, 1903, another mortgage was executed by them for $5,000, to take up the previous mortgage, and an additional loan of $2,500, used also by Mrs. Wilson for her own purposes, part of it for the living expenses of herself and husband. This mortgage is still a lien on the property, and no subsequent charges affecting the title were made up to Mrs. Wilson's death, December 29, 1903.

Outside of the testimony of Mr. Wilson himself, the principal evidence of communications after the transfer between the husband and wife, relating to the ownership of the property, are letters of complainant written to his wife in October, 1897. At that time Mrs. Wilson was at the house of her sister Mrs. Smith, in Asbury Park, having gone there in consequence of some quarrel or misunderstanding with her husband. Mr. Smith, the brother-in-law, says that one cause of the difference between them was Wilson's refusal to give Mrs. Wilson the deed for the property now in question. Wilson came to Smith's house to see his wife, and in the interview between them Mrs. Wilson accused her husband of having the deed and of always claiming the hotel wasn't hers, to which Wilson said: "I don't claim the house. I have got no interest in the house. It is your property, and it all belongs to you." Wilson wrote several letters to his wife while she was at Smith's house, urging her to return to their home, and in these letters her ownership of this property, and not his, is also asserted by Wilson, apparently for the purpose of reassuring her against his claims. One of October 8th is especially important as giving a statement of a bargain in reference to the Laurel House. He asks her to come home and talk things over, and says that it is "annoying for Mrs. Smith to tell you you had no property. It is all yours, and a very fine property. You said, after the Laurel House was out of debt, you were going to let me have so much a month; but, after being here so many years, I have nothing yet." In another letter he tells her that her property is increasing, and after stating he had heard Mrs. Smith had said $2,000 or $3,000 were gone, and that he had bought lots with it, he says this was untrue, that the property had been well managed, that he had bought nothing with it except the Allenhurst property, which was in her name, and adds: "The property is all yours, and we have made several thousand. Come home and enjoy it. * * * Mrs. Smith knows she tells what is not so, when she tells you you have no property. No one believes her, and any goose knows better. All yours and all straight." These letters, written at the time when the question seems to have been directly raised between the husband and wife as to the ownership of this property and his alleged claims on it, cannot be reconciled with the view that both the parties intended the title to be taken only as security for debts or obligations, and it must require very clear and decisive evidence to the contrary to outweigh these admissions of the complainant, advisedly made, and made for the purpose of procuring her return. Had complainant's present claim been then set up, Mrs. Wilson would have had the opportunity to defend her ownership, and the husband's direct and unreserved admission of his wife's ownership at that time has an important bearing on his right to contest it after his wife's death and at this lapse of time. Mrs. Wilson returned to her home shortly after these letters were written, and lived with her husband up to the time of her death. After her return Mr. Wilson seems to have again taken charge of the hotel, leasing it, and collecting the rents, and attending to the repairs and management of the property. One of the tenants, Mrs. Kemp, paid the rents by checks to his order, and these were indorsed by him and deposited, as he says, to Mrs. Wilson's account in the bank where Mrs. Wilson kept her account. In all of the other tenancies the checks were made either to Mrs. Wilson alone or jointly to both, and all checks went ultimately to Mrs. Wilson's credit. Mr. Wilson does not appear to have kept any separate bank account after the transfer of title, nor to have had resources of his own. It appears, also, that the expenses for the support of the family were paid from Mrs. Wilson's income, including that received from the hotel, and I think Mr. Wilson's management of the hotel, under these circumstances, is to be considered rather as a management of his wife's property than the continued possession and control of the property by a mortgagor, as is now claimed on his behalf.

In addition to the evidence above referred to, complainant relies on oral declarations proved to have been made by Mrs. Wilson subsequent to 1898, when she returned home. In some courts it is held that evidence of subsequent oral admissions by a grantee that an absolute deed was intended as a mortgage is not sufficient without corroborating circumstances to establish this fact. 1 Jones, Mortg. (5th Ed.) p. 241, § 335, and cases cited note 4. And certainly evidence of this character, in order to divest the title to lands and to overcome the effect of the previous conduct of the parties and written admissions of the husband, must be scrutinized with great caution after the death of Mrs. Wilson, and be very clear and convincing. In none of these conversations does it appear clearly that the attention of the wife was distinctly drawn to, or fixed on, the question whether this deed was only a mortgage or whether she had the right to hold the title to the property, if she chose to do so, and many of the declarations are such as may fairly be considered expressions indicating nothing further than that this hotel was an enterprise of Mr. Wilson's, and not of her own, and that she had taken hold of it to save the money he had put in it, and that Wilson was managing the hotel. Harry Looker, a nephew by marriage of Mr. Wilson, says that in 1898, at a visit he made to them in Asbury Park, Mr. Wilson was going over to the hotel, and Mrs. Wilson asked him if he did not wish to go with him and see the hotel. She said: "Uncle Fred takes a great interest in his hotel." This reference to the hotel as Fred's hotel would be just as applicable to a hotel he was thus managing as to one he owned.

Up to the time of Boyce's tenancy the hotel was unfurnished. He occupied it for eight years after Mrs. Pemberton, not having been put in by Wilson, as he says in his letters. After Boyce's dispossession by Mrs. Wilson herself for nonpayment of rent the hotel was afterwards furnished (apparently at Mrs. Wilson's expense), and on the subsequent purchase of furniture in New York Mrs. Wilson, in this witness' presence, spoke of the furniture her husband put in "his hotel," and that he could do as he pleased about it. At a later conversation (in 1902) Mrs. Wilson, talking to witness about a new house she expected to build and the different pieces of property, mentioned the hotel, and said she wished she had never gone into it; she only did it to help Fred out. She said he found he could not meet his payments, and she had taken it as security to help him out. But on cross-examination the witness says that in this conversation she put it in this way: "She thought she could put her money to a better advantage than she put it there. She told me the property was in her name, that she had taken a deed as security for

Mr. Wilson. She would rather have invested the money. She could have made more money in other property." This conversation is entirely consistent with the view that Mrs. Wilson owned the property, and that the money made by the investment was hers. Mrs. Looker, the witness' wife, present at this conversation in 1902, says that Mrs. Wilson, speaking of the hotel, said she had bother enough without that; that "that was Uncle Fred's" and she only took it to secure it for him; that she always spoke of it as "your uncle's hotel." Mrs. Vincent, a niece of Mr. Wilson, says that in 1899 she visited Mr. and Mrs. Wilson at Asbury Park, and in a talk with Mrs. Wilson about the property she said she "had advanced Uncle Fred this security to save his hotel at the time he needed it, and had taken the hotel as security. I asked her if she had had her money back, and she said 'Yes,' and I said, 'From rents of the hotel?' and she said, 'Yes.' She said she took the title as security for the money she advanced, or the security she put up. She told me it was $6,000."

The evidence which is most strongly relied on in complainant's favor is that of a Mr. Sexton, a disinterested witness. He swears to a reference to the hotel by Mrs. Wilson in a general conversation with him, in which she said that what money she had put in the hotel she put in for Mr. Wilson's benefit, as she wanted him to have something in his old age, and to a special conversation with her in February, 1902, at the funeral of Mr. Wilson's brother, which witness had charge of as undertaker. Mrs. Wilson asked the witness how much Mr. Wilson owed him. He told her, and she said that would be all right, that she was going to help him. "I said: 'What about the hotel down there? Does Mr. Wilson own that, or do you own it?' She said: 'That is Mr. Wilson's. What money I put in that I put in for his benefit.' That what she had put in the hotel, she put in to help Mr. Wilson out, as she wanted him to have something in his old age." Mrs. Kemp, a tenant of the property from 1898 to 1902, who rented the property of Mr. Wilson, under a lease signed by Mrs. Wilson, and paid him the rents by checks to his order, says that "at one time, when, Mr. Wilson not being inclined to make some repairs, I supposed Mrs. Wilson owned the property, she said: 'I have nothing to do with it. I merely took it to save the property.' And I went without the repairs." On a leading question put to her, "Did she say who owned it?" this witness answered, "Oh, yes; she always said Mr. Wilson." Mrs. Regan, who worked for Mrs. Wilson for 12 years from 1890, and was at her house three or four times a week, says that Mrs. Wilson told her a number of times that she paid off the debts on the hotel to save it for Mr. Wilson, and took the hotel as security for her money.

On the assumption that these conversations give in all respects Mrs. Wilson's exact words, and giving them all fair effect, they are not sufficient, in my judgment, to outweigh the evidence as to the nature of the original transaction which is supplied by the documents themselves, and the conduct and admissions of the parties under them, up to at least the year 1898. Mrs. Wilson's account or explanation of any of them cannot now be heard, and bearing this in mind, in considering the weight to be given to them on the question now to be solved, viz., the agreement at the time of the transfer of title or at the time of Mrs. Wilson's subsequent investment of her money in the property (1) by the payment and cancellation of the Patterson mortgages, and otherwise, I think that, outside of the conversations sworn to by Mr. Sexton and Mrs. Kemp, the scope of statements cannot clearly be held to go further than to give what was then (in 1898 or later) Mrs. Wilson's statement as to her motive in taking the property and an explanation of her investment. The direct statement made to Mr. Sexton that "the property is Mr. Wilson's; what money I have put in it, I have put in for his benefit"—was a statement, not that she had lent money to Wilson which he was to pay back or account for, but that she had put her money in the hotel to help him out, as she wanted him to have something in his old age, and imports rather a gift to Wilson of the money she put in. This may well have, then, been her intention as to the ultimate disposition of the property, but, so long as she held the title in her own name, this gift was still unexecuted and under her own control, and in none of these conversations is there any sufficiently clear indication on her part that the title to the property was not then her own, or that she had no right as between herself and Wilson to hold the title as her own. These conversations all occurred after the reconciliation in 1897, after a separation, during which she was reassured about her title to this very property, and her subsequent declarations as to her husband having this property or the benefit of it are very probably due to a subsequent change in her disposition toward her husband, while living amicably with him, and having the benefit of his management of the property. And, while they may possibly be taken to indicate her intentions in reference to the property, they are not sufficient to divest her title after her death.

Upon the whole evidence I conclude that complainant has failed to make out a case for relief; and the bill must be dismissed.

CAMPBELL v. PERTH AMBOY SHIPBUILDING & ENGINEERING CO. et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 3, 1905.)

1. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—PAYMENT.

In a suit to foreclose certain mortgages given to a bank, evidence held insufficient to establish an agreement between the mortgagor and the bank that certain notes deposited as collateral for the secured debt should be taken by the bank and credited in payment thereof.

2. CORPORATIONS—ACTION—ESTOPPEL TO DENY CORPORATE EXISTENCE.

Where a bank, prior to its failure, had taken steps to extend its corporate existence under Gen. St. p. 972, § 302, authorizing the extension of the life of corporations, and had thereafter operated and been treated as a banking association legally organized, both by the public and the state government, a borrower was estopped, in an action by the bank's receiver to foreclose certain mortgages securing the debt, to allege that at the time the loans were made the bank had no legal corporate existence.

3. MORTGAGES—DEBTS SECURED—DESCRIPTION.

Where certain mortgages given to a bank recited that the bank was about to loan certain sums of money to the mortgagor, in an amount not to exceed in the whole a specified sum, by discounting his notes payable in three months, such mortgages secured demand notes discounted by the bank for the mortgagor, which referred to the mortgage and were treated by both parties as secured thereby.

4. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—MORTGAGES.

Parol evidence is admissible to show the real object of a mortgage, and that it was given for a purpose not disclosed in the condition.

5. SUBROGATION—VENDOR'S LIEN.

Where an administratrix sold certain mortgaged premises to pay the mortgage debt, and the purchasers paid nothing to the administratrix, but bought for the benefit of a corporation formed by them to operate the property, the administratrix had a vendor's lien on the premises to the extent of the purchase price, to which the creditor for whose benefit the land was sold was entitled to be subrogated.

Suit by Edward S. Campbell, as receiver of the Middlesex County Bank, against the Perth Amboy Shipbuilding & Engineering Company and others. On final hearing. Decree for complainant.

Sherrerd Depue, for complainant. Allan H. Strong, for defendants Sarah J. Ramsay, Nautical Preparatory School, and Newhall. Adrian Lyon, for defendants Perth Amboy Shipbuilding & Engineering Company and Voorhees. Abel I. Smith, for defendant United States Wood Preserving Company. Joseph E. Stricker, for defendants Orin Hooper & Sons. Charles C. Hommann, for defendants city of Perth Amboy and Perth Amboy Trust Company. George L. Record, for defendant Oliver W. Ramsay.

PITNEY, V. C. This is a bill to foreclose three mortgages given by Hugh Ramsay, since deceased, and his wife, upon certain premises in the city of Perth Amboy to the Middlesex County Bank, which, upon the insolvency of that institution in 1899, came into the hands of the complainant Edward S. Campbell, as its receiver. Certain of the defendants, who have various and conflicting interests among themselves, the nature and character of which need not now be stated, join in disputing and defending the complainant's claim on three grounds: First. That the whole transaction on which complainant's right rests is void and unenforceable because in violation of an act of the Legislature with regard to the conduct of the business of banking. Second. That the mortgages, produced by the complainant, do not, by their terms, cover and secure the indebtedness relied upon by the complainant; in other words, that nothing is due on them. Third. That a large portion, quite one-half of the debt claimed, was paid by Hugh Ramsay in his lifetime in the manner set out in the defendants' answers.

The most important of these defenses is the last, viz., that relating to the amount of complainant's claim, and will be first considered. I say "most important" because Ramsay died seised of the premises covered by the mortgages, besides other property, and almost his entire indebtedness was to the complainant, and his property was ample to pay all his debts, including the complainant's claim at its full amount. Letters of administration on his estate were taken out by his widow. The complainant prepared and verified and presented to the administratrix a sworn claim for the amount he claimed to be due. The administratrix did not dispute it, but applied to the orphans' court of Middlesex county for leave to sell the real estate covered by complainant's mortgages to pay that debt, and actually sold it to the defendant the shipbuilding and engineering company for a sum of money sufficient to pay the claim, upon conditions and under circumstances which will be more minutely referred to later on. Complainant's claim consists of the aggregate of nine several promissory notes made by Hugh Ramsay to the bank, and upon which the undisputed evidence is that the money was advanced to Ramsay at about their several dates, and upon which the interest was paid by Ramsay from time to time up to a short time before the failure of the bank and the appointment of the receiver, which occurred in July, 1899.

The several promissory notes are as follows, all payable on demand:

[Signed] Hugh Ramsay.

The collaterals mentioned in this note were six debt certificates or promissory notes of various sums aggregating $19,500, made by a corporation known as the Mining & Dredging Power Company, dated in August, 1895, and payable on the 1st day of September 1896, with interest, being part of a series of $45,000, secured by a mortgage executed by the Mining & Dredging Company to the State Trust Company in the city of New York, which covered a steam floating dredge, which had been built by Mr. Ramsay, who was a shipbuilder. These debt certificates, with one other for $5,000, had been taken by Mr. Ramsay as part payment for the balance due him for the dredge. The other $5,000 note at some time was pledged by Mr. Ramsay to the law firm of Sullivan & Cromwell as security for a less amount due them either for professional services or money loaned. The dredging company was a failure and passed into the hands of a receiver, and the dredge in question was subjected to maritime liens, and under them came into the hands of the United States marshal of New Jersey, and early in 1897 was brought to a sale under foreclosure of the mortgage. It was also sold by the receiver in insolvency, and by the United States marshal for New Jersey in enforcement of the maritime liens.

The allegation of the several defendants in support of the claim of part payment is that some time prior to the month of April, 1897, a verbal contract was entered into between Hugh Ramsay and the bank, by which it was agreed that the six notes aggregating $19,600, held by the bank as collateral to Ramsay's note of that amount, together with the $5,000 note of the dredging company held by Sullivan & Cromwell, aggregating $24,500, should be taken and accepted by the bank as an absolute payment of $25,000 (being $400 more than the face value, without counting interest) on account of Ramsay's indebtedness to the bank. The avowed object of this transaction was to enable the bank to purchase the dredge at public sale, and use these notes in payment therefor so far as the dividends declared thereon by the receiver would be sufficient therefor. At the time of this alleged agreement the six dredging notes held by the bank had been sent to New York, where they were payable, for collection, and had presumably been presented to the receiver for the purpose of the dividend thereon. This verbal contract is attempted to be proven by the evidence of Mr. Valentine, the cashier of the bank.

and by Oliver W. Ramsay, the son and clerk of Hugh Ramsay. It is alleged to have been made between Hugh Ramsay, on the one part, and U. B. Watson, president of the bank, and Valentine, its cashier, on the other, at two or three interviews at the banking house. Watson denies the making of any such agreement. Each of the directors of the bank swear that they never heard of it. The books of the bank show not the least trace of any such transaction. Neither the $19,600 note nor either of the smaller notes held by the bank were given up to Mr. Ramsay. Interest on the whole $49,600 was charged to, and paid by, Ramsay on the 1st day of July, 1897, following the alleged contract, and again on the 1st day of January, 1898. After that date, Valentine, without the knowledge or consent of the president, Watson, or of any director, reduced the interest charges against Ramsay by the amount accruing on $25,000. Later on, and before the failure of the bank, Watson discovered that Ramsay was not paying interest on his whole indebtedness and swears that he spoke to Ramsay about it, who answered that Valentine, who had become the owner of the dredge, had promised to pay one-half of the interest due by him to the bank. This answer by Hugh Ramsay to Watson is of great importance, as will appear further on.

The complainant, shortly after he was appointed receiver, finding among the valuable assets of the bank the nine notes of Ramsay above set forth, made up a statement of the amount due thereon and mailed it to Hugh Ramsay and urged payment, and had quite a voluminous correspondence with him about it, and one or more interviews with him, in which he urged payment of the whole or part of the indebtedness, and at no time did Ramsay dispute the amount due for principal, but did allege some errors in the amount of interest. Ramsay died the 15th day of April, 1900 (about nine months after the appointment of the receiver) intestate, and on the 4th of May, following, letters of administration were granted to his widow, the defendant Sarah J. L. Ramsay. He left a family of eight children, one of whom is an infant. The complainant made out a sworn claim against the estate, based on the nine promissory notes above mentioned, with interest thereon, amounting to $52,240.28, and duly served the same on the administratrix. No objection has ever been made to that claim by her, nor has complainant been called upon under the statute to bring an action at law. Four of the heirs at law were sons, most, if not all, of whom lived in Perth Amboy, near or with their mother. All the proceedings by the administratrix in settling the estate were taken by and with the advice of her sons and her and their counsel, Judge Lyon. They were all fully aware of the alleged contract by which a credit of $25,000 should be made on complainant's claim, but never made it known to the complainant. In fact, it was studiously concealed from him. He was continually urging payment or arrangement of the claim, and threatening foreclosure. The sons were as continually asking for time. There seems to have been some undefined, supposed defect in the title to some part of the mortgaged premises, which they were taking measures to have removed or cured, and these measures were set up as a reason for delay in foreclosure.

The only debt of the estate besides the complainant's was a large arrearage of taxes due the city of Perth Amboy. Some part of the premises were under a lease to the defendant the Wood Preserving Company, which was bringing in rents which were applied, I believe, in the reduction of the taxes. Finally, the adult sons whom I have mentioned, and who, of course, with all the children are parties defendant, conceived the idea of forming a corporation to conduct the business of shipbuilding on a part of the mortgaged premises, which were well adapted for that purpose, and had been used for that purpose by Hugh Ramsay in his lifetime, and on the 12th of September, 1901, they incorporated a company by the name of the Standard Shipbuilding Company, which name, afterwards, on February 24, 1902, was changed to the Perth Amboy Engineering & Shipbuilding Company, one of the defendants herein. On the 2d of March, 1901, Mrs. Ramsay presented to the orphans' court of Middlesex county a petition praying for the aid of the court and for an order to sell lands. The petition contains a list of all the real estate of which Ramsay died seised, including the mortgaged premises (the value of which latter is stated at $225,000), and is verified by her affidavit. Annexed to it is a sworn statement of debts and personal assets, of the same date, the substance of which is as follows: The amount of the inventory, $25,359.18. The debts stated were taxes due, $7,982. Then follows "claim by Edward S. Campbell, receiver of Middlesex County Bank, with interest to March 1, 1901, $54,560." Then follows several small items of money actually paid by the administratrix for expenses in care for the property. On that petition the ordinary order to show cause was made on the 16th of April and duly published, and on the 18th of June a decree was made, which, after reciting that the order had been duly published and that the court had determined on full examination that the personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts to the extent of $41,161.53, ordered that the administratrix should sell the whole of the lands of the decedent. The report of assets and liabilities just mentioned shows conclusively that the deficiency of $41,161.53 found by the court could not have been arrived at without counting the complainant's claim at its full face.

On the 25th of November, 1901, Mrs. Ramsay made a report to the court under oath that she had sold at private sale, to the Standard Shipbuilding Company, the part of the mortgaged premises used for a shipbuilding plant, for the sum of $52,410.28 (which is the amount of the complainant's sworn claim against the estate) "upon the condition that the Standard Shipbuilding Company will assume and pay a mortgage held by Edward S. Campbell, receiver of the Middlesex County Bank, upon the said above-described property, being all the land described as tract No. 1 in said petition, upon which mortgage, with interest, there is claimed to be due by said receiver the sum of $52,410.28, which assumption and payment of said mortgage shall be considered as the payment for the consideration money for the said tract so sold as aforesaid to the Standard Shipbuilding Company." On that report, the court, on the 29th of November, made an order confirming the sale, inserting in the order that part of the petition above quoted, and directed a deed to be made. The administratrix made her deed dated the 27th of November, 1901, to the Standard Shipbuilding Company for that portion of the mortgaged premises, in consideration of $52,410.28, which contained a clause of assumption precisely the same as that above quoted. That deed was recorded on the same day, viz., November 29, 1901, in the Middlesex county clerk's office. In February, 1902, the name of the Standard Shipbuilding Company was changed to the Perth Amboy Engineering & Shipbuilding Company, and on the 25th of February the administratrix made a deed to the Perth Amboy Engineering & Shipbuilding Company for all of the mortgaged premises except the shipyard plant, previously conveyed; the consideration named being $75,000, which deed purported to be based on the same order of the orphans' court made on the 18th of June, 1901. That deed was duly recorded on the 18th of March in the Middlesex county clerk's office. It is here to be observed that the previous sale of November 29th more than paid all the deficiency shown by the statement of debts and credits contained in the administratrix's application to the orphans' court, so that there was no occasion for this conveyance. Moreover, the administratrix valued the mortgaged premises, as we have seen, at $225,000, and yet she induced the orphans' court to approve these two conveyances which aggregated nearly $100,000 less than she valued the premises. The fact is that these conveyances were a part of a family arrangement, and the whole object of the proceedings was to cut off the title of one of the heirs who was under age. On the 14th of March the administratrix executed another deed to the Perth Amboy Engineering & Shipbuilding Company, based on the same order of June 18th, in consideration of $52,410.28 for the same portion of the mortgaged premises conveyed by the deed of November 27, 1901, and that deed (as well as the other two deeds) contained an acknowledgment of the payment of the consideration money, and, after the description, contains this clause, "this conveyance is made subject to a mortgage held by Edward S. Campbell, receiver of the Middlesex County Bank, upon the above-described property, together with other tracts." In point of fact not a dollar of cash was paid for any of these conveyances to the administratrix. Shares of stock in the corporation were allotted to each of the heirs and to the widow, according to their several interests. No other stock was at any time issued to any other person.

It is proper here to state that the reason given by the defendants at the hearing why the deed of November 27, 1901, was, so to speak, abandoned and ignored, was that a New York counselor who was advising the parties objected to it. As no stock was issued outside of the family, and as the parties interested were attempting to float an issue of bonds, I can imagine that counsel who was consulted with regard to that issue may have raised some question as to whether the title which was made to the original Standard Shipbuilding Company would be vested in the same company after its name was changed to the Perth Amboy Engineering & Shipbuilding Company. I said that no stock was issued outside of the Ramsay family. There may have been some shares transferred to other persons for corporate purposes. There were, besides the mortgaged premises, quite a number of building lots, some of which were sold by virtue of the same order. After the title was vested in the shipbuilding company negotiations took place between the directors, who were the sons of the mortgagor and the complainant, with a view to the issue of corporate bonds on the mortgaged premises and the satisfaction of the complainant's mortgage by a portion of these bonds, but the complainant naturally declined and insisted upon the payment of his money, with the result that this bill was filed November 30, 1903. In answer thereto this alleged payment was for the first time set up. Now, without asserting that the failure by Hugh Ramsay and his sons for so long a time to set up the defense in question, the tacit acknowledgment from time to time of the justice of the complainant's claim, the treating it as valid for its full amount in the proceedings in the orphans' court, the insertion of its assumption at its full face in the first conveyance, work an estoppel against these defendants, especially the infant, yet the circumstances stated do amount to an explicit admission on the part of the adult defendants, all of whom were thoroughly familiar with the facts and circumstances, that the whole amount of the complainant's claim was due.

But let us return to the month of April, 1897, and trace the history of the transaction in connection with the dredge from that time. It is quite clear from the evidence of Oliver Ramsay, who is the only reliable witness on defendants' part to this contract, as well as that of Valentine, that nobody supposed that the notes of the dredging company were worth anything, unless the dredge itself could be either bought in cheaply at the sale, or a purchaser hunted up for it and in that way the notes looked after and protected. Oliver Ramsay swears that it cost over $100,000, and Valentine swears that he had found two gentlemen, whom he named—Messrs. Hussy and Fenton—who were willing to purchase it at $75,000, and the plan, which seems to have been devised between him and Hugh Ramsay, was that the dredge should be bought in as cheaply as possible, and, as there were some other assets in the hands of the receiver, that the dividends to be declared by the receiver on the $24,600 of notes owned by Ramsay, including those pledged to the bank, should be used as far as possible in paying for the dredge, and then that it should be sold to the two willing purchasers for the $75,000, or such other sum as would pay Ramsay in full and enable him to reduce his debt to the bank. But in order to carry out that plan several thousand dollars in cash were necessary in order to pay off the marshal's lien and other expenses. To accomplish all this it was necessary to obtain the consent of the president of the bank (1) for the use of its collateral notes for that purpose, and (2) to induce it to advance the cash necessary to carry the transaction through. This was done. Hugh Ramsay and his son Oliver called on Watson and Valentine at the bank, and laid before Watson the plan which Ramsay and Valentine had devised, and obtained his consent thereto; and it is at the interview in which that consent was obtained that it is alleged that the contract set up by the defendants was agreed to and consummated. Valentine, by the consent of Watson, took some $6,000 out of the bank, leaving a mere memorandum in its place, and subsequently certified his own check on his account in the bank for about as much more (which was one of his modes of embezzling money) and obtained title to the dredge. This is all that Watson ever consented to, namely, to let Ramsay take away his collateral for the purposes just mentioned, and to allow Valentine to take the money out of the bank (which was really a loan to Ramsay), for temporary use in carrying through the project, and no doubt Watson did consent that the temporary title to the dredge should be taken in Valentine's name. In fact, in order to properly protect the bank's interest in the collateral and to secure the return of the $6,000 taken, as we have seen, by Valentine, it was entirely proper and simply good business that the title should have been taken in Valentine's name until it could be realized on and the money returned.

I listened with great care and have since read with care the evidence of Oliver Ramsay, and I find nothing in it inconsistent with the transaction as I have just stated it. He was examined and cross-examined at great length, and at first failed to remember that

Mr. Watson, the president of the bank, had ever agreed to make an absolute credit for the collateral. Finally, being pressed by his own counsel, he brought himself to swear that he did so promise. His language was that it was agreed at the interview between Watson, Valentine, his father, and himself: "The substance of it was that it would be right for the bank to protect its interest by purchasing that dredge. I think I have told you all I remember of the conversation. That is the gist of it—was the determination on the part of the bank that it should protect its interest by purchasing the dredge, by buying it in at the marshal's sale." Again, questioned by his own counsel: "Q. Well, what, if anything, was said in reference to these notes, $19,600 held by the bank as collateral and the other note of $5,000? A. My father said that all he cared for in the transaction—that undoubtedly there was money in the dredge—and that all he cared for was to be protected to the amount of those notes. Q. Well, what was said on behalf of the bank, that is by Watson and Valentine as to any arrangement with your father as respecting these notes? A. I can't remember, except that their word was the law, and their promise was too, and that was distinctly understood between us." And again, on cross-examination: "Q. Will you give us in a connected way as near as you can what took place at the first of these interviews? A. Simply that the subject was broached that the dredge was about to be sold. Those notes were due. The dredge was worth a very considerable amount of money. That by having the money to purchase this dredge and buy her in, those notes could be protected." Then pressed to give the language: "Q. But give us the conversation as near as you can that took place at the first interview. A. We outlined to them how this dredge was worth a considerable amount of money, and the dredge could be sold, as I stated to you before, and the machinery dismantled and sold for considerable more than the amount of the notes." By "we" he said he meant his father and himself. Further on he says that "Mr. Valentine agreed to purchase the dredge." Thus he repeats again that he and his father stated to Watson and Valentine "what we considered the value in the dredge. They saw it, and Mr. Valentine agreed to purchase the dredge, which he did."

The conclusion I arrive at is that there never was any agreement that the notes should be then and there at once credited against Ramsay's debt. Such a contract was so extremely foolish as to render it on that account highly improbable. Mr. Watson knew the value of the real estate upon which the bank held mortgages. He felt perfectly safe as to Ramsay's debt, and there was no occasion for making such a bargain. Moreover, the collateral given up, as it really was, for the accommodation of Ramsay, was of so little value in Watson's judgment that it appears that he was entirely indifferent about it, and was perfectly willing that Ramsay should have the use of it, and to assist him in realizing on the notes by lending some more money to enable Ramsay to carry the transaction through, provided the affair could be kept so far under the control of the bank as to make it reasonably secure. Not only was it highly improbable that Watson, or any other officer of the bank not secretly interested personally in the transaction, agreed to give an absolute credit for past due promissory notes of little or no value, held by it as collateral merely, but it reaches the absurd to suppose that he or they would give an additional credit for $5,000 for a note of the same character held by a third party as collateral for a sum of money which must be paid before the note could be obtained and used by the bank. The result of the transaction in equity was that at the time the title to the dredge was vested in Valentine in April, 1897, he held it as mortgagee, first, to secure the amount of cash furnished by the bank voluntarily and involuntarily to perfect the title, and second, to secure the $19,600 of notes belonging to Ramsay, but held by the bank as collateral, and as to the balance he held it in trust for Ramsay, and this is the view of the affair most favorable to the defendants.

But here comes in an element entirely unknown to Watson or to any director of the bank. Valentine had other schemes in his mind entirely unknown to anybody, unless it be Ramsay. He swears that the two gentlemen above named, who had agreed to purchase the dredge for $75,000 finally declined so to do. What the real truth of the situation was is not easily known, as I place little reliance on Valentine's evidence, but it is quite clear that about this time he was informed that a contract was to be let by the United States government to do some dredging in the harbor of Portland, Me., and he took measures and bid on the contract and obtained it and took Mr. Oliver Ramsay in with him as a partner with the two other persons who had declined, as he swears, to buy the dredge for $75,000, and preceded to execute the contract, and therein spent a great deal of money embezzled from the bank, and entirely failed in the job, and the dredge was sold to pay the debts. The effort of the defendants was to show that this whole affair was the enterprise of the bank. I cannot adopt that theory. In the first place, it was one which the bank had no power to engage in. In the second place, the president and every officer of the bank absolutely deny having anything whatever to do with it and are sustained by an absence of any documentary proof to the contrary. On the other hand, Oliver Ramsay had an interest in the contract which he distinguishes from an interest in the dredge. His father must have known what was going on. In fact his knowledge of it was not denied, and it may be that Valentine, somewhere in the history of the affair, told the father that he should have credit on the debt to the bank, not only for the $19,600 of notes pledged to the bank, but also for the $5,000 which had been pledged with Sullivan & Cromwell, and in reliance upon that promise of Valentine's Ramsay may have tacitly consented to Valentine's going on with the dredging enterprise in Portland Harbor. Certainly it seems to me, under the circumstances of the case, that Ramsay must be held to have consented to and acquiesced in Valentine's dealing with the dredge. It clearly appears from the evidence of President Watson that he understood that Valentine was to buy in the dredge as cheaply as possible and immediately sell it at an advance for the benefit of Ramsay, and that the bank advanced the necessary cash to finance the transaction as an accommodation to Ramsay (who with his son had presented the plan to Watson in plausible terms, as the evidence shows), with the full expectation that the dredge would be promptly resold at a large advance, out of which the bank would be promptly repaid the cash presently advanced, and the additional profits would go to Ramsay and enable him to make a payment on his debt to the bank. Watson had not the least idea that the bank was farther complicated in the affair than the advance of the few thousand dollars necessary to finance the transaction, and he had no notice or suspicion that Valentine intended to retain the title to the dredge and put it to practical use.

And here comes in a matter much relied upon by the defendants, namely, the reduction in the amount of interest charged by the bank to Ramsay. The bank had printed blanks on which statements of the amount of interest due from debtors having demand loans from the bank were made out and sent to the debtors, and several of these were put in evidence by the defendant. One dated June 14, 1897, filled up in the handwriting of Valentine and addressed to H. Ramsay, states that the interest on his demand loan, amounting to $1,813, will be due July 1, 1897, and prompt payment of the same was requested. Now, $1,813 was the amount for six months interest on the whole of Ramsay's debt at that time, about $55,000, without giving any credit for the $25,000, which, according to defendant's theory, should have been credited in April, 1897. This paper is significant, in that it is entirely inconsistent with Valentine's evidence that there was a contract for the credit for $25,000 in or before April, 1897. But it is quite consistent with the theory which I have formed of the true facts of the case. The amount of this notice was charged up against Ramsay's account, and a like amount in January, 1898. His son swears that, although the notice was received by Ramsay and produced by defendants at the hearing, yet that Ramsay did not discover the overcharge of interest until his book was written up and his vouchers returned some time in 1898, and the son further swears that Valentine was spoken to about it and promised to have Ramsay's account credited with the overcharge of interest, but in fact never did have it so credited. But in January, 1898, Valentine commenced, and from thenceforward continued, to make out the semiannual statements of interest for a reduced amount, namely, $738, being the amount due for six notes on something less than $25,000 ($5,000 in cash had been paid by Ramsay in the meantime on his indebtedness to the bank). One of these statements was produced with the receipt for the amount signed "paid" by Watson. Being examined on that subject, Watson stated that he had no personal recollection of that particular payment, but swore in substance that he might have signed it without knowing what it was for or what length of time the interest stated in it covered. When examined especially on the question of his knowledge that the semiannual interest charges were reduced, he swears that he did not know it until very late, meaning shortly before the bank failed, and then he spoke to Valentine about it, and he understood that the whole amount was to be collected. He was then asked by counsel for the defendants if he ever said anything to Ramsay to the effect that the amount of interest he was paying was not right, and he said he did, some time before the failure. He said he met him on the street and said something to him to the effect that the interest was not paid on the right amount, and Ramsay said he had some agreement with Mr. Valentine about it, and he (Watson) said "we, the bank, had no agreement with Valentine. Q. What agreement did he [Ramsay] say he had with Valentine? A. Some agreement in regard to payment of half of it, something of that kind." From this evidence it appears clearly enough that Ramsay knew, both from the fact that after the alleged contract for credit interest was made out and charged up to him on the whole amount of his indebtedness, and from this conversation with Watson, that the bank held and claimed to hold all of his notes without any credit on account of the dredging company's notes, and in the face of that knowledge he refrained from making any demand or taking any other measures to enforce his claim for a credit. Another circumstance is worthy of notice. The bank held a demand note against Ramsay for $7,500 dated March 30, 1895. This note was paid by Ramsay on January 25, 1898, after he had learned that interest was being demanded from him on over $50,000. If he at that time understood that he had paid not only $19,600, but $25,000 on the account, of his indebtedness, it seems to me that it was a good opportunity to have had the payment actually applied and the note handed up to him. I think this defense wholly fails.

The next defense which I will notice is that the bank had no legislative right to act as a bank, and hence all its transactions as such were void, and no cause of action accrued to it by reason of the loans made to Ramsay or any other borrower. The Middlesex County Bank was incorporated by an act of the Legislature, approved February 1, 1872, with the privilege to continue as such for 20 years. It went immediately into business, performed all the functions of a bank, until the time it failed in July, 1899. In January, 1892, it took proceedings to extend its corporate existence for 50 years, under the act of April 21, 1876 (Gen. St. p. 972, § 302). It is argued that the act cited does not apply to banks, and that proceedings for extension were void, and that the whole proceeding was in violation of section 57, p. 132, of the banking act, which forbids unincorporated persons from conducting a banking business. I shall not consider or discuss these arguments in detail, because I am of the opinion that the defendants are estopped from setting up this defense. It will be observed that section 57 of the banking act does not declare contracts for the loan of money made by a banking company, acting without legal authority, to be void. It simply prescribes a penalty upon the bank's officers. In point of fact, this bank, up to the time of its failure, was recognized by the state government authorities as a lawful institution, and was periodically visited as such by the inspectors of the banking department. Its right to exist and do business as a bank was never challenged by any state officer. No proceedings were ever instituted against it by the Attorney General. It was kept open as a bank, and received deposits from a great number of individuals, and thereby became indebted to them. It loaned those moneys out to a great number of other individuals, including Ramsay. The object of the present proceeding is to recover back from Ramsay that portion of those deposits which he borrowed and never repaid, for the purpose of distributing it, as far as it will go, among these creditors of the bank, and it is known to the court that there will be a deficiency for that object. In short, complainant is to be considered in equity as the official trustee and agent of the depositing creditors of the bank to recover the moneys which the bank, as a trustee for its creditors, loaned to its debtors. The bank as an entity, then, may be left out of view here. In my view it would be a reproach to the administration of justice, if the illegality of the bank's corporate existence could be set up in the defense of this action. I think it does not lie in the mouth of a man who borrows money from a de facto bank to set up, in defense to an action to recover that money, that the bank has no right to exist. The authorities cited by the complainant fully sustain his position in that behalf. Silver Lake Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. 370; Camden & Atlantic R. R.

Dewey*, 16 Mass. 94, 102, 8 Am. Dec. 128. A large number of cases to the same effect are collected in the case in 17 Barb., above cited.

The next point made is that the language of the mortgages is insufficient to cover these loans. The consideration of that point necessitates an examination of those instruments and the location of the mortgaged premises. The latter consist of two tracts of land, or, more accurately speaking, one tract of land bisected by a street. Taken as a whole, it may be described as being about 750 feet in length by 460 feet in width, facing for that distance on Staten Island Sound, and lying between Fayette street and Commerce street, which run substantially at right angles with the line of the shore, and is bounded by High street on the west. It is bisected by Rector street, which leaves about three-fifths of the whole lot between it and the sound, and about two-fifths between it and High street. From the north corner of the whole tract is to be deducted a small portion belonging to Mrs. Ramsay and another small portion belonging to St. Peter's Church. The first mortgage was given by Ramsay and wife on the 3d of March, 1892, and covers the block between High and Rector streets, and secures a bond in the penal sum of $60,000, with this condition: "Whereas the Middlesex County Bank is about to loan certain sums of money to the said Hugh Ramsay to an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of $30,000 by discounting his promissory notes drawn to his order payable in three months from the date thereof respectively"—with the usual verbiage that the mortgage was to be void if the notes were paid. The condition provides also for securing any renewal of such notes. The second mortgage was given on the 10th of June, 1895, and covers a parallelogram on the east side of Rector street, bounded on the ends by Liberty and Commerce streets, and on the east side by the remainder of the whole tract. The condition of this mortgage declares that it is given as additional security for the first mortgage. The third mortgage is dated the 4th of December, 1895, and covers the whole tract, and refers to an accompanying bond whose condition is as follows: "Whereas the Middlesex County Bank is about to loan certain sums of money to the said Hugh Ramsay to an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars by discounting his promissory notes drawn to his order, payable in three months from the date thereof respectively"—following precisely the language of the first mortgage, including the mention of renewals. In fact, it is quite plain, by pencil memoranda found on the face of the first mortgage, that it was handed to the scrivener as a form for the third mortgage.

Now, the argument is that no notes at three months were ever discounted for Ramsay, but that all the loans were made on notes payable on demand, and hence were not secured by these mortgages. I am unable to see the least force in this objection, under the circumstances of this case. In the first place, its enforcement would result in rendering these instruments absolutely valueless, except as to the $19,600 note, in which, on its face, it is declared that it is secured by a mortgage. In the next place, the evidence is overwhelming that these moneys were loaned on the strength of these mortgages, and Ramsay must have so understood it. It is quite impossible to believe that he could have understood anything else. To have done so he must have supposed that the bank was calling on him year after year to give these mortgages one after the other, and then was willing to loan him $50,000 or $60,000 without any security whatever. That it is quite competent for the parties to use the mortgage for a security other than that mentioned in it is entirely clear and authoritatively settled. Our courts have gone so far as to hold that a mortgage given for money loaned, which loan has been repaid and the mortgage delivered up to the mortgagor, may be redelivered for another and distinct loan and be entirely valid between the parties, and as against all other parties, except intervening incumbrancers. It is authoritatively settled in this state that it is competent to prove by parol what the real object of a mortgage is, and that it is given for the purpose not disclosed in the condition. Among the numerous cases cited by counsel I mention the following: Bell v. Fleming, 12 N. J. Eq. 13, affirmed Id. 491; Robinson v. Urquhart, 12 N. J. Eq. 515; Flannigan v. Westcott, 11 N. J. Eq. 264; Hoy v. Bramhall, 19 N. J. Eq. 564, 97 Am. Dec. 687; Farnum v. Burnett, 21 N. J. Eq. 87; Griffin v. N. J. Oil Co., 11 N. J. Eq. 49; Silvers v. Potter, 48 N. J. Eq. 539, 22 Atl. 584; Underhill v. Atwater, 22 N. J. Eq. 16; Atwater v. Underhill, 22 N. J. Eq. 603; Lanahan v. Lawton, 50 N. J. Eq. 276, 23 Atl. 476.

I venture the suggestion, however, that under the circumstances of this case the validity of the mortgages is of little consequence. They were of record and were notice to everybody. The debt of the defendant is thoroughly established and is valid and binding on his heirs at law. The land was sold by the administratrix to pay that debt, and all the parties defendant who claim under the conveyances of the administratrix took, of course, with notice of the debt, and have never paid one cent to the administratrix. She has a vendor's lien on the premises which she can enforce, and, in my judgment, the complainant, as a creditor, is subrogated to the right of the vendor's lien so held by the administratrix, and a very slight amendment to his bill would enable him to enforce that lien in this suit. The action of the widow and the adult heirs at law in accepting shares of stock in place of their several rights as dowers and heirs, would be binding on them for the purpose of enforcing the vendor's lien, so that the widow's dower, for that purpose is out of the way. The infant heir is, of course, bound by the acts of his ancestor. I will advise a decree in favor of the complainant for the whole amount of his claim, and that it is a first lien on the premises, with one exception. In July, 1897, Ramsay made a lease for 10 years to the defendant the New York Wood Vulcanizing Company, for about one-half of the water front, at the yearly rent of $4,700, and it now claims that the bank waived its priority over that lease, as a condition to its being made. This claim is thoroughly established and frankly admitted by the counsel for the complainant. The arrangement, however, does not destroy the lien of the mortgage upon the rents as they accrue.

I will advise a decree in accordance with these views. The decree will also be subject to whatever rights the city of Perth Amboy may have with regards to the opening of the street through the premises, which it claims was reserved in the vacation of one which traversed the most valuable tract diagonally.

The contest between the defendants has not been argued, and its consideration will be taken up hereafter.

MOORE v. DURNAN et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 6, 1905.)

1. INTEREST—DECREE—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a decree directed that, on complainants tendering to defendants a certain bond to indemnify defendants from any liability on a lost check, defendants should pay complainants $450 and taxed costs, the decree required payment only after tender of the security, and therefore did not carry interest until after that date.

2. LOST INSTRUMENTS—DECREE—INDEMNITY.

Where a decree directed payment of a lost check on complainants tendering to "two defendants" a certain bond, a bond given to only one of the defendants was not a compliance with the decree.

Bill by Charles P. Moore against Charles B. Durnan and others. On motion to set aside an execution. Granted.

William J. Backes, for complainant. Martin P. Devlin, for defendants.

MAGIE, Ch. The bill in this cause was for the enforcement of a lost check for $450. On March 8, 1902, a decree directed that, upon complainants tendering to the two defendants a bond for $500, with sureties, etc., to indemnify defendants against any liability upon the check, defendants should pay to complainant $450 and the taxed costs, and, in default of payment, that the complainant should have execution for said debt and costs. On ———, 1905, complainant issued execution in the cause for $450, with interest thereon calculated from the date of the decree. A motion is now pending to set aside the execution; the defendants claiming that it is excessive in including interest to a greater amount than the decree justifies.

It is conceded that no bond, with securities, for indemnifying the defendants, was tendered until September 25, 1905. Defendants insist that no interest can be exacted from them, except from that date. If the decree had required an immediate payment of the amount, it would doubtless have had the effect of a judgment at law, and carried interest thereon from its date. Section 44, Chancery Act 1902 (Laws 1902, p. 524); Wilson v. Marsh, 13 N. J. Eq. 289. But the decree required payment, not immediately, but only after the tender of security to indemnify; and, until that had been done, defendant could not be compelled to pay. Considering that indemnity was deemed necessary, it may be said that they could not safely pay. It follows, in my judgment, that the decree did not justify the execution for interest, except for so much as accrued after the tender of the required indemnity. I have not been referred to any authorities on this subject, and I have found no case myself, except Bushnan v. Morgan, 5 Simmons, 635, which seems in point, though the English decisions of that period on the subject of interest sustain doctrines which are not now admitted.

Among the papers submitted on this motion is a bond, which I presume was that which was tendered. If so, it does not conform to the terms of the decree, for it is given to only one of the defendants.

Upon the ground first mentioned, however, viz., that the execution is for an excessive amount, I think the motion must prevail.

TURNER v. KUEHNLE.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 9, 1905.)

1. DOWER—FORFEITURE—JUDICIAL SALE—EFFECT—FRAUD.

Where a husband, in order to defeat his wife's dower interest, caused a mortgage to be foreclosed against his lands, the wife being a party to the proceedings, and prevented competitive bidding at the sale, so that the land sold for no more than the mortgage, amounting to $4,300, and by agreement with the purchaser the husband received $18,000, the sale was not available as against the wife in a suit by her for dower.

2. FRAUD—DEFENSES—DUTY TO INVESTIGATE.

One who has perpetrated a fraud upon another cannot set up as a defense thereto that the defrauded party should have discovered the fraud and protected himself against it at the time.

3. DOWER—VALUATION—TIME—IMPROVEMENTS.

Where a husband conveyed his land in his lifetime, the widow's dower would be measured as at the date of his alienation, and she could acquire no benefit from subsequent improvements placed on the property or its general advance in price.

Suit by Louisa H. Turner against Louis Kuehnle for dower. Heard on demurrer to the bill. Demurrer overruled.

U. G. Styron, for complainant. John C. Reed and Thomas G. French, for defendant.

PITNEY, V. C. This is a suit for dower. The complainant, as the widow of Richard H. Turner, deceased, demands dower in some valuable real estate in Atlantic City of which her husband was seised in his lifetime, and which came by conveyance, in which she did not join, to the defendant, who is in possession of the same. The defendant claims that her dower is barred by the proceedings of foreclosure and sale under a mortgage which was paramount to her husband's title, and to which proceedings she was made a party. She sets out in her bill and challenges the binding effect upon her of the decree in foreclosure, although she was a party to it, on the ground that the amount of the mortgage was less than one-fourth of the value of the premises and of the actual price which was paid by the defendant to her husband, and that the foreclosure was voluntary upon the part of her husband and the defendant, and that they colluded in procuring the mortgage to be foreclosed and the premises to be sold thereunder for the bare amount of principal due on the mortgage, with interest and costs, and all for the express purpose of cutting off her inchoate right of dower. The question thus raised is an important and interesting one, and its solution requires a setting forth of the facts more at length. They are very well abstracted in the defendant's written argument, which I shall follow in the main.

The complainant was married to her husband in 1871, and lived with him at Atlantic City until 1894, when he deserted her and remained away until 1904, when he came to her house in Atlantic City and died. In August, 1893, he purchased the lands in question and obtained title thereto by a conveyance from one Hoffman, who, on the same day, mortgaged the premises to one Allen to secure $4,000, who afterwards assigned the mortgage to one Fitton. This is the mortgage which was subsequently foreclosed. In 1895 her husband leased the premises for 10 years, from March 25, 1893, to one Wheeler, for a yearly rent of $1,200. The lease contained a covenant upon the part of the husband to convey the premises at any time within one year for the sum of $18,000, free and clear of all incumbrances. Wheeler assigned the lease and covenant to a brewing company, and Wheeler and the brewing company, or one of them, made extensive improvements upon the premises, and incurred indebtedness therein which was not paid, and Allen judgments were recovered, and the premises brought to sale in January, 1896, and purchased by the defendant, to whom the lease and contract of sale were subsequently assigned, so that the defendant became entitled to demand the conveyance of the premises from the husband at the sum and price of $18,000. The defendant filed a bill against complainant's husband in this court for the specific performance of that contract on the 11th of March, 1896, and also filed a lis pendens under that bill. Prior to the filing of that bill the defendant and the complainant's husband caused a deed of conveyance for the premises to be prepared from the husband and the complainant to the defendant for the consideration of $18,000, and asked the complainant to execute it, but she declined. No further proceedings were had in the suit for specific performance, but in October, 1896, Fitton, the holder of the paramount mortgage, filed a bill to foreclose the same, making the complainant and her husband parties. No defense was put in by either herself or her husband. Final decree was obtained and execution issued to the sheriff of Atlantic county, and the property brought to sale on the 6th of February, 1897, and sold to the solicitor of Fitton for the amount due on the mortgage, with costs and interest. The solicitor assigned his bid to the defendant, and the sheriff made his deed to the defendant, and under that deed the defendant claims that he holds title free and clear of the complainant's dower. The description of the land shows that they consist of two lots which are apparently separate from each other.

The facts relied upon to nullify the effects of this conveyance against the complainant are as follows, which the complainant has learned since the death of her husband in 1904: The premises sold for $4,300, the amount due on the mortgage, and were worth a great deal more than the $18,000 mentioned in the contract of the husband, and were worth at least $30,000 by reason of the improvements put thereon by Wheeler and the brewing company, and one Irving, shortly before the sheriff's sale, actually offered complainant's husband $20,000 for the same, and the defendant actually paid or secured, coincident with the delivery of the sheriff's deed to him, to the complainant's husband the sum of $18,000, including the amount paid for the sheriff's deed. Upon the refusal of complainant to join with her husband in a conveyance to the defendant, her husband, and the defendant, in order to procure a transfer of the title of the land to the defendant, discharged of the incumbrance of the inchoate right of dower of the complainant, entered into an agreement to procure the mortgage in question to be foreclosed and the premises purchased from the sheriff by the defendant, at a price sufficient only to pay the amount due on the mortgage and the costs, which costs the husband agreed to pay out of the purchase money, and it was part of the agreement to provide against any surplus arising from the sale by discouraging and preventing competitive bidding at the sale, and it was understood between the husband and the defendant that at the delivery of the sheriff's deed to the defendant he should pay to the husband the whole $18,000 purchase money provided for in the covenant, and that the husband and the defendant induced the holder of the mortgage to allow the same to be foreclosed and the proceedings carried through to sale in accordance with the agreement. The mortgage was not foreclosed with the honest purpose of collecting the money due thereon, but with the fraudulent intent, to use the language of the bill, "of securing an unfair and unjust advantage of your oratrix by obtaining from such proceedings the decree of this court barring the rights and interest of your oratrix in the said lands * * * by means of a sale of the lands and a deed of conveyance to the defendant." At that time the complainant's husband was the owner of real estate in Atlantic City worth at least $30,000, and possessed of money and securities to a large amount. The sale was conducted at a hotel of which the defendant was the proprietor. The defendant is a man of reputed wealth, of extensive influence in the community, and of wide popularity. Both he and the complainant's husband were present at the sale, and caused it to be made known to those in attendance thereat, for the purpose of discouraging competition in the bidding, "that the premises were to be sold only for the purpose of making title thereto, and that the said Turner and the said Kuehnle were the only ones interested in said sale and said premises and in the objects of said sale." Those in attendance at the sale were largely the friends of defendant and the complainant's husband, and for that reason declined to bid, and only one bid was in fact made, and that was by the solicitor of the mortgagee, who was the personal counsel of the defendant and the husband, and known as such by the persons attending the sale. After the sale the solicitor, without any consideration, assigned the bid to the defendant, and the sheriff executed and delivered a deed to the defendant. The amount actually paid at its delivery by the defendant to the husband, by cash and mortgage, was $18,650. The additional $650 represented interest on the purchase price of $18,000. Complainant learned of these facts after the death of her husband, and immediately employed counsel to bring suit, and instructed him to take proceedings to establish her rights in the lands. Counsel so employed failed to proceed at once, and after waiting on him a reasonable time, the exact time is not stated, she employed her present solicitor, who filed this bill on the 17th day of May, 1905, about 14 months after the death of her husband.

The demurrer charges generally a want of equity, and that her remedy is at law, if at all, that any defense which she has to the decree should have been set up in the foreclosure suit, and that the bill is multifarious and lacking in parties. The complainant's bill does, in fact, attack the priority over the conveyance to her husband of the Fitton mortgage, but I think that that part of the bill does not set up a cause of action. She also alleges that her husband was entirely able financially to pay off and discharge the mortgage in fulfillment of his covenant to convey, and that the mortgage was in fact and in effect paid by her husband out of the purchase money, and such payment was known to the defendant, so that she is in equity dowerable of the whole premises without any deduction for the mortgage. Without expressing any final opinion on that question, I shall assume, for the purposes of the demurrer, that the defendant is at least entitled to occupy the position of assignee of the mortgage and to set it up in equity against the complainant's demand by way of reducing the amount of her dower, if any she has.

The important question in the cause is whether, from the facts above displayed, the defendant can set up the benefit of the decree of foreclosure against the complainant. The language of the decree, as set out in the bill, is that the "defendant [singular] be forever barred," etc. I shall treat it as if it was in the plural, "defendants," and that it includes the complainant. It seems to be entirely settled that the machinery of a court of justice is capable of being made use of to promote injustice and to perpetrate a fraud. In other words, there is nothing so peculiarly sacred about a judgment or decree of a court of justice as, on the one hand, to prevent their being used for fraudulent purposes, and, on the other hand, to prevent this court from limiting their force and effect accordingly. Metropolitan Bank v. Durant, 22 N. J. Eq. 35, at page 42, affirmed 24 N. J. Eq. 556. Mechanics' National Bank v. Burnet Mfg. Co., 33 N. J. Eq. 486 affirmed on appeal Squier v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 35 N. J. Eq. 344.

The bill was there filed to set aside a sale of property under a judgment and execution, on the ground that the judgment, which was for an honest debt, was recovered and the property brought to sale under it for the purpose of having the property sacrificed and bought in for the benefit of the defendant, and for the purpose of defeating the other creditors of the defendant. The last two headnotes are as follows: "Fraud perpetrated by means of a judgment is entitled to no more immunity than a fraud perpetrated by any other means. If a judgment, founded upon a just debt, is entered, not for the purpose of securing or collecting the debt, but for the purpose of being used for a cover to protect the defendant's property from his other creditors, the court will denounce it as a fraud and set it aside, as it would any other fraudulent contrivance."

To the same effect is Kirkpatrick v. Corning, 38 N. J. Eq. 234, in the Court of Appeals, and the same case subsequently before the same court in 40 N. J. Eq. 241. At page 257 of 40 N. J. Eq., Mr. Justice Scudder says: "While, therefore, the decree of foreclosure is conclusive as to the parties who were interested at the time in the lands foreclosed, so that they cannot attack it for informalities or want of proper parties [these were some of the grounds on which it was attacked], yet the sale of the real and personal estate may be set aside and the decree opened, if fraud be shown, and the prices paid for the land and personal estate will be inquired into to ascertain how much is equitably due from one party to the other. * * *" Further on he quotes, with approval, the language of Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, which I will again quote: "The strong language applied to cases of fraud is that deeds, obligations, contracts, awards, judgments, or decrees may be instruments to which parties may resort to cover fraud, and through which they may obtain the most unrighteous advantages, but none of such devices or instruments will be permitted, by a court of equity, to obstruct the requisitions of justice. If a case of fraud be established, a court of equity will set aside all transactions founded upon it, by whatever machinery they may have been effected, and notwithstanding any contrivance by which it may have been attempted to protect them. It is immaterial whether such machinery and contrivance consisted of a decree in equity and a purchase under it, or of a judgment at law, or of other transactions between the actors in the fraud." Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, 43, 44. The peculiar fraud perpetrated in the cases just cited was the use of the judgment in the one case and the decree of foreclosure in the other for the purpose of acquiring title to property for a sum less than it was worth, and thus cutting off, in the one case, the other creditors of the defendant in the judgment, and, in the other case, the parties interested in the equity of redemption.

Such was the object of the sale under the foreclosure in the present case, and of the contrivance by which the property was sold at a price less than one quarter of the real contract price between the parties, and one-sixth of the actual value of the property. What the complainant asks is, indeed, not the setting aside the decree of sale, but that of foreclosure, which is that the defendants stand absolutely forever barred and foreclosed in the equity of redemption in so much of the mortgaged premises as shall be sold by virtue of the decree. Now, a sale fraudulently contrived and conducted in such manner as to reduce the amount bid to less than one quarter of the actual price paid for the premises, for the purpose of defeating the just and lawful right of the complainant in the actual surplus money, ought not, in equity, to be considered and treated as such a sale as will fulfill the condition of the decree barring redemption. The decree itself consists of two parts: First, the ascertainment of the amount due and the declaration that the complainant is entitled to have the premises sold to pay the same; and second, the decree of foreclosure against all the defendants when the premises are sold, so that the actual foreclosure depends entirely upon the sale, and, in order to give effect to the foreclosure in a court of equity, it must not be a fraudulent sale, conducted in such a manner as to injure the parties affected by it.

But it is argued that complainant was guilty of a lack of proper attention to her own interests in not taking at the time positive action in asserting her rights, and that by her silence she measurably acquiesced in what was done and is estopped from now asserting them. Let us consider this aspect of the case; and in so doing we must bear in mind that she was under all the ordinary disadvantages of a woman, inexperienced in legal matters, and presumably unadvised as to her rights and how to assert them. She did, indeed, have notice that the property was proposed to be sold about a year previous to the sheriff's sale by her husband to the defendant for the sum of $18,000, but she is not chargeable with notice that the foreclosure which took place several months later was part of a scheme to carry through that sale without her signature to the deed. Moreover, I do not feel disposed to apply to her, with full force, the maxim that ignorance of the law does not excuse. I doubt very much whether it ought to be applied under the circumstances of this case. Be that as it may, she had a right to presume that the property would bring at the sale its full value, and she was not called upon to suspect, much less presume, that the sale of property worth to her husband $18,000, and to the person holding the contract many thousand more, could be so managed as to be sold at a sum not more than one-sixth of its real value, and such sale receive the approval of this court. She was not only not chargeable with notice, but the demurrer admits that she did not have actual knowledge of the fraudulent means by which that unlawful result was obtained. She had the right to expect that the surplus, over and above the amount of the mortgage, would be paid into this court, and that before it was paid out she would receive notice thereof, according to the rules and practice of this court, and have the opportunity to assert her rights. She is not chargeable with notice that a fraud was being practiced upon her. These considerations of themselves are, in my judgment, a sufficient answer to this objection.

But there is another consideration, and it is this: In my judgment a party who has perpetrated a fraud upon another through the forms of law, or otherwise, cannot be permitted to set up, as a defense to his fraud, that the defrauded party ought to have discovered the fraud and protected himself or herself against it at the time. It does not alter the character or effect of the fraud that it was successful, and that the defrauded party might have protected himself or herself against it, and failed, either through oversight, positive neglect, or otherwise, to do so, and in my judgment no estoppel arises out of such failure. It is not necessary at this time to determine definitively what remedy the complainant would have had against the $14,000 surplus, if the property had been bid up to the actual amount paid, nor the remedy which she will have in this cause at the final hearing. But there seems to be little doubt as to what her remedy was at the time of the sale. The question was dealt with and decided by Chancellor Zabrieskie in Vreeland v. Jacobus, 19 N. J. Eq. 231, and in Denton v. Nanny, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 618, where the subject is discussed and the authorities cited in an elaborate and able opinion. It may be inferred that the decision in Vreeland v. Jacobus led to the adoption of the 159th rule, found in the first edition of Dickenson's Chancery Precedents, at page 40, and the elaborate scheme for ascertaining the value of the widow's inchoate right of dower, found on pages 64, 65, of the same book. That rule, 159, was abrogated in 1886 (see 41 N. J. Eq. 1, 6 Atl. 111), for what reason I am not at present informed. But its abrogation cannot affect the right of the complainant under the doctrine laid down by Chancellor Zabrieskie in Vreeland v. Jacobus, which I do not find has ever been doubted or overruled.

There is as little doubt as to the remedy of the complainant herein, if the bar of the decree of foreclosure is removed as to her. As her husband did not die seised of the premises, her dower will be measured as of the date of his alienation, and she will derive no benefit from the subsequent improvements put upon the property, or its general advance in price. So, as to damages for the detention of her dower, they will commence from the date of her demand, and not from the date of the death of her husband.

Objection was taken that Mr. Flitton, the mortgagee, should have been made a party. I am unable to see the least interest that he has in this controversy. No relief is prayed against him, and no decree that the court can make can affect him in the least, either directly or indirectly.

I will advise that the demurrer be overruled, with costs, and leave to the defendant to answer within 20 days after service upon him of a copy of the order and of payment of costs.

BELLEVILLE TP., ESSEX COUNTY, v. CITY OF ORANGE et al.

(Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. NUISANCE — PUBLIC NUISANCE — ABATEMENT—ACTION BY TOWN.

Where a town was not charged with duties relating to the public health, it was not entitled, independent of contract, to file a bill for protection against a public nuisance common to all its citizens; such power being vested in the Attorney General.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—UNAUTHORIZED CONTRACTS—ENFORCEMENT.

Where complainant town contracted with defendant city, without legislative authority, that defendant, as a part of the construction of a sewer to tide water through the streets of the town, should maintain in another municipality a tidal collection chamber, to be operated in a certain manner, the town did not thereby acquire the right to compel specific performance of that portion of the contract regulating the use of such chamber for the protection of the public interests of the town.

3. SAME—CONTRACTS—SEWERS.

Gen. St. p. 622, § 4, authorizing a town to make such regulations for the laying of a sewer through its territory to tide water as might be imposed for laying its own sewers therein, did not authorize a contract between a town and a city, constructing a tidal sewer through the streets of the town, regulating the use of a tidal collection chamber in another municipality when constructed.

4. SAME—ULTRA VIRES.

A city being authorized by Gen. St. p. 622, § 4, to construct a tidal sewer and a tidal collection chamber in connection therewith, and to control the operation of such chamber, an agreement relating to its operation, if made with a person or municipal authority having property or public rights to protect, is not ultra vires.

Bill by the township of Belleville, in Essex county, against the city of Orange and others. On demurrer to the bill. Sustained.

Mr. Tamblyn and Oliver H. Perry, for complainant. William A. Lord, Edwin B. Goodell, and Mr. Halfpenny, for defendants.

EMERY, V. C. The city of Orange, by the act of April 7, 1890, entitled "An act to provide for drainage and sewerage in cities of this state" (Gen. St. p. 622), was authorized (section 4) to construct a sewer to tide water, and for this purpose, if necessary, to lay its sewer through the streets of any other township or municipality, "under such reasonable regulations, if any, as may be imposed by such township or municipality with respect to like work done therein by itself, and such street or highway shall be, as far as possible, restored to its original condition, at the proper cost of the city for whose benefit the work is done." On April 20, 1892, the city of Orange and the township of Belleville entered into a contract (annexed to the bill) by which the township consented to the construction through part of its territory by the city of Orange of a sewer to tide water; the sewer (in the language of the recital) "to be an outlet for other sewers already constructed and in the course of construction, within its

[the city's] limits." The consent of the township was given upon certain terms and conditions, all of which, except two, related to the places in the streets where the sewer pipes were to be located, the protection of public travel during the construction, the restoration of the streets, and the payment of the expense of inspection of the construction. These terms and conditions were all regulations of a character which might be imposed by the township with respect to the construction of its own sewers. Another of these "terms and conditions" related to the location of the outlet at tide water, and the fourth, the only one now in question, was as follows: "(4) A tidal chamber shall be constructed in connection with said sewer, into which all the sewage shall be carried. Said tidal chamber shall be air-tight and water-tight, and shall be emptied only during the first two hours of the ebb tide." The city of Orange expressly agreed to observe and fulfill the terms and conditions. The sewer was constructed according to the agreement, the outlet being within the boundaries of the city of Newark, and a tidal chamber, also within the city of Newark, was constructed in connection with it, and, as the bill alleges, for a considerable period after the agreement the sewage was collected in the tidal chamber and discharged within the hours specified in the agreement. The city of Orange, as the bill further alleges, subsequent to the construction of the outlet allowed other municipalities, the townships of Bloomfield and Montclair, to discharge sewage into the outlet sewer, by reason of which the sewer is overcharged, and the tidal chamber is inadequate to hold the sewage for the term required by the agreement. The agreement with Montclair for the use of the sewer was made before the contract, and the agreement with Bloomfield in the following year (1895). Both of these agreements were made under the authority of a previous act of March 26, 1890, entitled "An act to provide for drainage and sewerage in townships." Gen. St. p. 3649. The bill charges that for more than a year past the sewage has been allowed to pass through the tidal chamber into the river at all hours of the day and night; that the city of Orange refuses to collect and discharge it according to the agreement. By reason of this breach of the agreement the sewage discharged into the Passaic river accumulates at the mouth of the sewer, and is carried by the tide up the Passaic river, "to and along the property of complainant and the citizens of the township of Belleville, to the injury and damage of the property of your orator and the citizens of the said township of Belleville, and that the same is a menace to the health of the said citizens and inhabitants of the said township of Belleville." Injunction is sought compelling the specific performance of this article of the agreement, and defendant demurs to the bill for want of equity.

The bill is not filed for the protection from an alleged nuisance of property owned by complainant, and the ownership of any property entitled to such protection is not alleged by the bill. As mere riparian owners of property situate on the tide water, it is doubtful, under the decision in Marcus Sayre Co. v. Newark (1899) 60 N. J. Eq. 361, 45 Atl. 985, whether the township is entitled to such protection. Nor is the complainant charged by law with any such duties relating to the public health as to entitle it, independent of any contract, to file a bill for protection against a public nuisance common to all its citizens. The Attorney General alone has this right. Newark Aqueduct Board v. Passaic (1899) 45 N. J. Eq. 393, 401, 18 Atl. 106.

The question in the case, therefore, is whether the township, having no property or public rights to be protected against the nuisance alleged, is entitled to the substantial relief of enjoining the alleged nuisance by a specific performance of the terms of the contract relating to the manner of the use of the sewer. This equitable remedy is usually given for the purpose of protecting rights of a complainant, or, in case of public bodies, for the protection of public rights with which they are charged by law, and relating to which there are contracts authorized by law. The township cannot, in my judgment, by a mere contract with another municipality, and in the absence of legislative authority, invest itself with the rights which belong to the Attorney General or other public authorities for the protection of public interests; nor, in the absence of like authority, could the city of Orange, by contract, give such public rights against itself to the township. The statutory authority to make regulations as to laying the sewer through the territory of the township, such as might be imposed for laying its own sewers therein, did not, either expressly or by implication, authorize a contract relating to the use of the sewer in another municipality when constructed, on breach of which the township would be entitled, as representing the common public rights, to enjoin a violation of the contract, for the sole reason that the violation resulted in a public nuisance. The remedy against the alleged public nuisance, if any remedy exists, is with the Attorney General, and the township cannot, in my judgment, acquire the right to enjoin a public nuisance on the ground of breach of contract, unless the Legislature has authorized the township to make a contract for that purpose.

It was claimed by defendant that this clause of the contract was ultra vires; but, as the city had power under the act to construct the tidal chamber and to control its operation, an agreement relating to this operation, if made with a person or municipal authority who had property or public rights to protect, would not, I think, have been ultra vires; and, not being necessarily ultra vires, it is possible that an action at law for nominal damages might be maintained in favor even of a contractee not having any property or public rights to protect. I do not pass on this question, for the equitable remedy of specific performance is given, not for the mere enforcement of contracts, but because specific performance is necessary to give complainant the full benefit of the property or other rights which he is entitled to receive by the contract.

The demurrer will be sustained.

GRAF v. WEST JERSEY & S. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)
CARRIERS — INJURY TO PASSENGER — NEGLIGENCE — JOLTING OF CAR.

Where a train, just as it stopped, gave a lurch to one side, which caused the door of a car to shut upon the fingers of a passenger who stood in an open doorway, the facts did not warrant an inference of negligence; the motion of the car appearing to have been no more than the usual motion incident to stopping.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, §§ 1205, 1223.]

Appeal from District Court of Camden. Action by Richard E. Graf against the West Jersey & Seashore Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Argued June term, 1905, before DIXON and SWAYZE, JJ.

Gaskill & Gaskill, for appellant. Clarence T. Atkinson and Spencer Simpson, for respondent.

SWAYZE, J. The only question necessary to be considered is whether there was negligence on the part of the defendant. The only testimony of negligence is that of the plaintiff. He was a passenger, and when the conductor called the name of the station "got up and went to the forward end of the car, and in order to avoid the final jerk of the train, as it always gives a little kind of jerk, held his hand up and steadied himself on the jamb of the door; the door was open, and all of a sudden the train gave a kind of a lurch to one side, just the second that it stopped, and the door shut down on his fingers." He subsequently testified that the car went too far, and he naturally thought there would be a jerk. The motion of the car which caused the door to close seems to have been no more than the usual motion which the plaintiff himself anticipated, and we think fails to warrant an inference of negligence. In this respect the case differs from Field v. D., L. & W. R. R. Co., 69 N. J. Law, 433, 55 Atl. 241, where there was a jerk of sufficient violence to throw the plaintiff from a position inside the car over the chain on the opposite side of the rear platform, and from Burr v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co., 64 N. J. Law, 30, 44 Atl. 845, where there was a very violent and unusual lurch of the car backward and forward. The trial judge should have granted the motion to nonsuit.

The judgment must be reversed, and there must be a new trial.

PEOPLE'S NAT. BANK OF NEW BRUNSWICK v. SCHEPFLIN.

(Supreme Court of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONTRACTS OF WIFE—SURETYSHIP.

Where, in a suit on a note, defendant claimed that at the time the note was given she was a married woman, and that it was given for her husband's accommodation to be discounted at plaintiff bank, whether the note was payable to her own order and by her indorsed before delivery to her husband, or whether it was payable to his order, was immaterial.

2. EVIDENCE—PAROL—NOTES—NATURE OF LIABILITY.

As between the immediate parties to a note, it may be proved that it was really given by the maker for the accommodation of her husband.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 20, Cent. Dig. Evidence, § 1962.]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE—NOTE BY MARRIED WOMAN—LAW MERCHANT—APPLICATION.

Where a married woman executed a note for the accommodation of her husband which she was disabled by law from making, it never became her note, and the law merchant was inapplicable thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 28, Cent. Dig. Husband and Wife, § 629.]

4. SAME—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Defendant's husband applied to plaintiff bank for a loan, which was refused; but the bank offered to discount defendant's notes indorsed by the husband, and for this purpose defendant executed notes, of which the note sued on was a renewal, which the husband indorsed and delivered to the bank, but before the discount was made defendant was required to sign a "proceeds check" for the amount of the discount, which was charged to her to offset the discount as a part of the same transaction, and the money was then placed to the husband's credit; defendant having no bank account or other transactions with complainant bank. Held, that the note was given by defendant for the accommodation of her husband, and was unenforceable as against her, under Gen. St. p. 2017, § 5, providing that a married woman shall not be liable to answer on any promise for the default or liability of any other person.

5. SAME—NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS LAW.

A note executed by a married woman for the accommodation of her husband, which is unenforceable under Gen. St. p. 2017, § 5, prohibiting her from becoming surety or agreeing to answer for the default or liability of any other person, is not made valid by the negotiable instruments law (P. L. 1902, p. 583), providing that every negotiable instrument is deemed prima facie to have been issued for a valuable consideration, and every person whose signature appears thereon to have become a party thereto for value, etc.

Action by the People's National Bank of New Brunswick, N. J., against Louisa Schepflin. Judgment for plaintiff. On rule against plaintiff to show cause why a new trial should not be granted. Rule absolute.

Argued June term, 1905, before GUMMERE, C. J., and FORT, PITNEY, and REED, JJ.

Theodore B. Booraem, for plaintiff. Craig A. Marsh, for defendant.

PITNEY, J. This action was brought to recover the amount due upon a promissory note dated June 11, 1903, payable to the order of the plaintiff, for $3,866.57, signed by the defendant and her husband, Christian Schepflin, who died before the commencement of suit. The making and delivery of the note were not disputed. The defense was that it was made without consideration moving to the defendant; that at the time of the making thereof she was a married woman and gave the note as surety for her husband; and that she neither directly nor indirectly obtained any money, property, or other thing of value, for her own use or for the benefit of her separate estate, on the faith of the note. Motions for nonsuit and for direction of a verdict in defendant's favor were made upon grounds that properly raised the questions presently to be dealt with. These motions were overruled, and the learned trial justice, against objection, directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the note. A new trial is now asked, because the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and contrary to law, and because the trial justice erred in refusing defendant's motions and in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

The evidence showed that the note in suit was the last renewal of a series of notes that had been discounted by the plaintiff bank under the following circumstances. On September 16, 1899, Mrs. Schepflin gave to her husband for his accommodation her promissory note for $2,500, payable 4 months after date at plaintiff bank. Whether the note was payable to her own order and by her indorsed before delivery to her husband, or whether it was payable to his order, does not clearly appear, and in our view makes no difference. The note was given for the purpose of enabling the husband to procure a loan from the bank for his own benefit. He indorsed it, and presented it to the cashier for discount. The cashier testified that upon being applied to by the husband, he explained to him that the bank could not loan the money to him, but would loan it to Mrs. Schepflin. The cashier thereupon filled out what is called in the case a "proceeds check," handed it to Mr. Schepflin, and told him that if he would get the check signed by his wife the bank would discount the note. The check was in the following form:

|-------------------|-----------------------|
| $2,500.00 | New Brunswick, N. J., |
| 51.23 | September 19, 1899. |
| $2,448.67 | |

The People's National Bank pay to the order of Proceeds of Note twenty-four hundred forty-eight and 67/100 dollars.

Mrs. Schepflin signed this check, and the husband turned it over to the bank on September 21st. Whether the cashier of the bank was present at the signing of the check, or whether the husband alone was present with Mrs. Schepflin at that time, was in dispute, but in our view, the difference is immaterial. Upon the presentation of the proceeds check, bearing Mrs. Schepflin's signature, to the bank, on September 21st, the note was discounted, and the amount of the note, less discount, to wit, $2,448.67, was placed to the credit of Mrs. Schepflin's name upon the discount book, and carried into the ledger to the credit of her name under the heading "Sundry Accounts." At the same time, or at least on the same day, and as a part of the same transaction, the account in her name was debited with precisely the same sum on account of the proceeds check, and that sum was carried to the credit of her husband, and thereby placed subject to his disbursement, and was disbursed and used by him. On January 5, 1900, Mrs. Schepflin made another note in like form for the further sum of $2,500, and delivered it to her husband for his accommodation and benefit. He applied to the bank to discount this note, and again was met with a refusal unless he would first procure a proceeds check from his wife. A check was thereupon filled up by the cashier dated January 4, 1900, and reading: "The People's National Bank pay to Proceeds of Note twenty-four hundred forty-eight and 67/100 dollars," and delivered to Mr. Schepflin in order that the wife's signature might be procured. It was procured, the check was returned to the bank on January 6th, and the second note was thereupon discounted, the proceeds thereof ($2,448.67) being entered as in the former instance to the credit of her name upon the discount book and upon the ledger of "Sundry Accounts." At the same time her name was debited upon this ledger with the like amount on account of the proceeds check, and the amount was carried over to the credit of the husband. These two notes of $2,500 each were renewed from time to time thereafter in whole or in part, the successive renewal notes being signed by Mrs. Schepflin, indorsed by her husband, and delivered to the bank. On each occasion her name seems to have been credited on the ledger with the proceeds of the renewal note and debited at the same time with the like amount, the debits being represented by the maturing notes, although these did not always agree in amount with the renewals by reason of the fact that partial payments were at different times made by the husband. This series of discounts and renewals finally eventuated in the giving of the note in suit, which represented the balance at that time due to the bank.

The evidence renders it clear beyond dispute that unless Mrs. Schepflin can be deemed to have received the proceeds of the original discounts, she did not, either at the time of the making of the original notes, or at any other time, receive any consideration of value for her own use or for the benefit of her separate estate. She had no other banking transactions with the plaintiff, kept no funds on deposit there, drew none, and gave no checks saving the "Proceeds Checks" above mentioned. Section 5 of our revised married woman's act of 1874, as amended in 1895 (P. L. 1895, p. 821; Gen. St. p. 2017), declares that any married woman shall have the right to bind herself by contract in the same manner and to the same extent as though she were unmarried, "provided, that nothing herein shall enable such married woman to become an accommodation indorser, guarantor or surety, nor shall she be liable on any promise to pay the debt, or answer for the default or liability of any other person; provided, further, however, that if on faith of any indorsement, contract or guaranty or suretyship, promise to pay the debt or answer for the default or liability of any other person, any married woman obtains, directly or indirectly, any money, property or other thing of value, for her own use, or for the use, benefit or advantage of her separate estate, she shall be liable thereon as though she were unmarried."

Under the facts of the present case the second proviso has no applicancy, and the question is whether the note in suit can have legal efficacy in view of the first proviso. The validity of the note in suit manifestly depends upon the validity of the original notes for $2,500 each, dated September 16, 1899, and January 6, 1900. If Mrs. Schepflin did not in a legal sense receive the proceeds of the discount of those notes she was an accommodation maker. Since the notes were intended to be and were in fact indorsed by the husband she was his surety if the money was in fact borrowed by him from the bank. In Van Deventer v. Van Deventer, 46 N. J. Law, 460, 464, where the wife was joint maker with the husband of a note given to secure moneys borrowed by him, she was held to be a surety. If it had not been in contemplation that Mr. Schepflin should become a party to the instrument, still the wife's note made to secure a loan advanced to him would be a promise to pay his debt. Contracts of suretyship and promises to pay the debt of another person are equally within the ban of the first proviso of section 5 of the married woman's act. And as pointed out by Justice Collins in this court in Villet v. Eastburn, 63 N. J. Law, 450, 453, 43 Atl. 741, it is not significant that the proviso in terms prohibits the making by a married woman of an accommodation indorsement, and is silent with respect to her becoming an accommodation maker of a promissory note; the form of suretyship is immaterial. Upon a review of this decision by the Court of Errors and Appeals, the judges were divided in opinion upon another question, but there was almost unanimity upon this point. The present Chief Justice, who wrote the opinion of a plurality of the court, said (64 N. J. Law at page 645, 46 Atl. at page 736): "Although in form Mrs. Eastburn became an original debtor by signing the note in suit, she was in fact merely a surety for Cowenhoven, 'having put her name to the paper for his accommodation.'" And the opinion of Justice Van Syckel shows that he entertained a like view.

Prior to the enactment of the negotiable instruments law (P. L. 1902, p. 583), it was held by our courts that in an action at law upon a promissory note made by two persons, one of them could not set up as a defense that he was, to the knowledge of the payee, an accommodation maker, and therefore entitled to the privileges of a surety, on the ground that his right to the status of surety was an equity not enforceable in the courts of common law. Anthony v. Fritts, 45 N. J. Law, 1; Shute v. Taylor, 61 N. J. Law, 256, 39 Atl. 663. It was pointed out by Chief Justice Beasley in Mount v. Zisken, 7 N. J. Law J. 71, that evidence to show suretyship is admissible when it is offered not to vary the terms of the contract but to show the status of the party and a fact which taken in connection with the status would render the contract void, and that he had intended to say in the opinion in Anthony v. Fritts that this distinction must be made. As between the immediate parties to a promissory note its real character may always be shown. If the payee sues upon it it may be proved that the note was really given for his accommodation. Messmore v. Meyer, 56 N. J. Law, 31, 27 Atl. 938. Save for the law merchant, the real character of a note might be shown even as against a holder in due course. But if a contract, although made in fact by a married woman, is one that she is disabled by law from making, it never becomes her promissory note, and the rule of the law merchant can have no applicancy to it. Woolverton v. Van Syckel, 57 N. J. Law, 393, 31 Atl. 603; Villet v. Eastburn, 63 N. J. Law at page 454, 43 Atl. at page 742; Id., 64 N. J. Law at pages 646, 650, 46 Atl. at pages 736, 737. Even with respect to parties capable of contracting, it is well settled that the rule against varying the terms of a written instrument by parol evidence does not apply at all to evidence tending to show, as between the parties, that the contract was void for want of consideration or the like. Metler's Adm'r's v. Metler, 18 N. J. Eq. 270, 273; Metler v. Metler's Adm'r's, 19 N. J. Eq. 457; Chaddock v. Vanness, 35 N. J. Law, 517, at pages 520, 522, 10 Am. Rep. 256; Johnson v. Ramsey, 43 N. J. Law, 279, at page 282, 39 Am. Rep. 580; Middleton v. Griffith, 57 N. J. Law, 442, at page 448, 31 Atl. 405, at page 407, 51 Am. St. Rep. 617. And this is still the case under the negotiable instruments act of 1902 (P. L. 1902, pp. 583, 587, 589, 596, 615, §§ 16, 24, 28, 29, 68, 196).

The fundamental inquiry, therefore, upon which the present case turns, is whether the loans resulting from the discount of the two notes of $2,500 each were made to Mrs. Schepflin or to her husband; and this is a question of substance, not of form. So treating it, in our opinion the question admits of but one answer. In each instance (for the evidence renders it clear that the circumstances of the two transactions were indistinguishable), while the cashier of the bank professed an unwillingness to lend the money to Mr. Schepflin, and a willingness to lend

It to the wife, the parties proceeded to take effective measures to prevent her from having at any time the least control of the proceeds of the notes or either of them, by procuring from her, in advance of the discount, an assignment of the total proceeds by means of the two "proceeds checks" above referred to. These checks were intended to have efficacy at the very instant the note was discounted. Each note and its corresponding check, and the bookkeeping entries by which in form the proceeds of the discount were placed to the wife's credit, and in form were transferred from her credit to that of her husband by means of the check, were parts of one and the same transaction, the practical and intended effect of which was to pass to her husband immediately the proceeds of the discount, precisely the same as if the discount had been directly credited to him in the first instance and the proceeds check had been dispensed with. The bookkeeping entries, like the "proceeds checks," were pure fictions so far as they purported to evidence any transaction between the wife and the bank. Notwithstanding the fictions, the fact is clear that the bank's money remained in its own control at all times until it was placed by it within the control of Christian Schepflin. The loans, therefore, were in fact made by the bank to him.

The present case is thus clearly distinguishable from those cases in which it has been held that if the loan is made in fact to the wife she is a principal debtor and not a surety, although it be her purpose at the time to afterwards lend the money to her husband, and she proceeds to carry out that purpose when she is placed in control of the fund. Such were the cases of First National Bank of Elizabeth v. Craig, 1 N. J. Law J. 153, where the note in suit was discounted for the wife, the proceeds placed to her credit on the books of the bank and in her own bank book, and she drew them afterwards by her own checks payable to her husband's order; Todd v. Bally, 58 N. J. Law, 10, 32 Atl. 696, where there was evidence (believed by the jury) showing plainly that the loan was made to the wife, and the trial judge instructed the jury that if this was the true version of the transaction the plaintiff was entitled to recover the moneys in question, but that if the loan was made to the husband, the wife standing as surety, the defendant was entitled to a verdict, and that if the wife was the real borrower it was no consequence, whether it was her purpose to turn over the money so obtained to her husband for his use; and Hackettstown National Bank v. Ming, 52 N. J. Eq. 156, 27 Atl. 920, where the husband discounted the note ostensibly for his wife's benefit, received a check for the proceeds payable to her order, and afterwards took this check to her and persuaded her to indorse it over to him. It was held by Vice Chancellor Pitney (52 N. J. Eq. at page 163. 27 Atl. at page 923) that the drawing of the check to the order of the wife and handing it to the husband was a mere offer of a loan to her on the note, that until she accepted that offer and used the check by indorsing it the contract of lending was merely executory, and that her action in indorsing the check completed a contract of lending between the bank and her, so that she became the borrower. In those cases the wife at the time of the discount became the actual recipient of the money, or its equivalent, which thereupon became her separate property and subject to her own disposition by virtue of the married woman's act. In the case before us, there was no instant of time during which the defendant had possession or control of the proceeds of the discounts. The loans were not made, nor was any credit entered in her name at the bank, until after the "proceeds checks" had been lodged with the cashier. In form—in fiction—those checks operated to assign in advance the proceeds of a loan made to her; in substance and in fact they prevented, as they were intended to prevent, the loan from reaching her.

To attribute any binding force to her promissory notes given under such circumstances would be running counter not only to the spirit but to the letter of section 5 of the married woman's act. It may be suggested that if a married woman is to be permitted, as in the cases just cited, to lend to her husband, or to another, moneys borrowed by her as soon as she receives them, there is little more mischief in permitting her to assign the proceeds of the loan in advance of receiving it. But this is a question of policy that it is the province of the Legislature to deal with, not of the courts. Moneys once received by the wife, although they be borrowed, become her property, which the statute permits her to give away or lend as she pleases. So she may pledge or mortgage her separate property to secure the debt of her husband or any third party. But the statute disables her from mortgaging her future to secure the debt of another, which is the effect of a contract of suretyship or the like. The original notes in question here, and most of the renewals, were given prior to the negotiable instruments act of 1902. The note in suit was given after the passage of that act. In our view this makes no difference. This statute gives no validity to the contract of a married woman, made by way of surety or promise to pay the debt of another person.

It follows that the learned trial justice erred in refusing defendant's motions for nonsuit, and for direction of a verdict, and the rule to show cause should be made absolute.

GRILLEY v. ATKINS.

(Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Dec. 15, 1906.)

1. DEEDS—DEPOSIT FOR DELIVERY ON GRANTOR'S DEATH—EFFECT.

Plaintiff's mother executed a deed to plaintiff and delivered the same to P., who, though he drew the deed, was not the grantor's general attorney or agent, directing him to deliver the deed to plaintiff on the grantor's death. P. inclosed the deed in an envelope, on which the grantor signed and sealed an indorsement that she placed the deed in escrow in the hands of P., to deliver to the grantee or his heirs at her death. Held that, by delivering the deed to P., the grantor parted with all right of dominion or control over it, and that such delivery was a present delivery of the deed.

2. SAME—TIME OF TAKING EFFECT.

Where a grantor delivered a deed to a third person, to be delivered by the depository to the grantee on the grantor's death, the grantee took an immediate estate, subject to a life use of the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 298.]

3. SAME—REVOCATION.

A voluntary deed, delivered to a third person, to be delivered by him to the grantee on the grantor's death, cannot be revoked by the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, § 549.]

Appeal from Superior Court, New Haven County; George W. Wheeler, Judge.

Suit by William F. Grilley against Homer L. Atkins for the cancellation of a deed. From a decree in favor of complainant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward F. Cole, for appellant. Charles G. Root, for appellee.

TORRANCE, C. J. The plaintiff and the defendant are half-brothers, sons of the same mother, Eunice A. Atkins. She died in September, 1899, aged 86 years. The dispute between the brothers relates to the ownership of land lying in the town of Waterbury, and described in the first paragraph of the complaint. The plaintiff claims the land under a deed from his mother made in April, 1898, hereinafter for brevity called "deed A," while the defendant claims it, or a portion of it, under a deed from her made in June, 1899, hereinafter called "deed B." The controlling facts in the case are in substance as follows:

On April 14, 1898, Mrs. Atkins, accompanied by the plaintiff, went to the office of Wilson H. Pierce, Esq., a practicing attorney in Waterbury, and Mrs. Atkins then requested him to draw a deed, to be executed by her, conveying to the plaintiff, subject to her life use, a certain piece of land situated in Waterbury, with a dwelling house thereon, described in the first paragraph of the complaint. Pierce drew said deed, and the same was then and there duly executed by Mrs. Atkins; and thereupon, at her request and by her direction, he placed said deed in an envelope and sealed it up. The deed in said envelope was then delivered to Pierce by Mrs. Atkins with instruction to keep and hold the same as an escrow, and to deliver the same upon her death to the plaintiff; and at the request of Mrs. Atkins Pierce then and there wrote the following words upon said envelope: "I hereby place the within deed as an escrow in the hands of Wilson H. Pierce, my attorney, to deliver the said deed upon my death to my son William F. Grilley of Waterbury, or his heirs, to be recorded." Mrs. Atkins then placed her name and seal on said envelope under said words, as follows: "Eunice Atkins. [L. S.]"—and Pierce then wrote upon said envelope: "April 14, 1898. Deed in my hands as an escrow, to be delivered to William F. Grilley, of Waterbury, upon the death of Eunice A. Atkins. W. H. P." Pierce had never before this time, and never thereafter, acted as the attorney of Mrs. Atkins. All that Pierce did for Mrs. Atkins on this occasion was to draw the deed and take the acknowledgment, make the indorsement upon the envelope, and place the same in his safe. At the time of the delivery of said deed to Pierce there was no intent upon the part of Mrs. Atkins to keep control of said deed, and she never in fact kept or retained control of the same. The delivery to Pierce was made by Mrs. Atkins with the intention that it should be a delivery in escrow. Said deed was left with Pierce with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff. On or about February 20, 1899, Mrs. Atkins went to Pierce's office and demanded of him said deed left by her with him April 14, 1898, but he refused to give it to her upon the ground that he had no legal right to do so without the consent of the grantee therein. On June 29, 1899, Mrs. Atkins, accompanied by the defendant, went to an attorney in Waterbury, who drew up a deed which was duly executed by Mrs. Atkins and which purported to convey to the defendant certain lands, including the house and a portion of the lot described in paragraph 1 of the complaint. Neither of said deeds was given upon a valuable consideration.

Mrs. Atkins died at Wolcott early in the morning of September 29, 1899. In the forenoon of said day the plaintiff and defendant were at the home of the defendant where Mrs. Atkins lay dead, and the defendant pretended to the plaintiff that he was going to Bristol, leaving the plaintiff to come to Waterbury to make some arrangements for the funeral. The plaintiff came to Waterbury, and, after making some arrangements for the funeral, went to the office of Pierce about 3:30 p. m. on said day, demanded and received from him the deed left in escrow, and took the same to the office of the town clerk of the town of Waterbury, where he left it to be recorded at 3:30 p. m., and the same was duly recorded. Instead of going to Bristol, the defendant on said day came to Waterbury and left at the town clerk's office for record said deed of June 29th, at 3:15 p. m. The defendant, before June 29, 1899, knew of the existence of said deed left in escrow, and knew that it was to be delivered to the plaintiff upon the death of Mrs. Atkins. The plaintiff had no knowledge of the defendant's deed of June 29th until after said September 29th. When Pierce delivered said deed left in escrow to the plaintiff, he wrote on the envelope containing the deed: "Received the within deed this 29th day of September, 1899, 3:30 p. m."

Upon these facts the trial court set aside deed B, and ordered the defendant to execute and deliver to the plaintiff a release deed of the land described in deed A; and this appeal is based upon alleged errors made by the court in so doing.

Where a deed is placed in the hands of a depositary for conditional future delivery to the grantee, a distinction has by some courts been recognized between cases where the future delivery depends upon the performance of some condition, and those where it depends upon the death of the grantor. In the former case the deed does not become operative until rightfully delivered by the depositary to the grantee, while in the latter, upon delivery to the depositary, it is deemed to be the grantor's deed presently, taking effect for many, if not for most purposes, from the time of its delivery to the depositary. The deed in either of these cases is usually called an "escrow," but perhaps more frequently and more properly that word is used to designate the deed in the former, rather than in the latter, case. In Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 412, 37 Am. Dec. 154, Chief Justice Shaw states the distinction in this way: "Where the future delivery is made to depend on the payment of money, or the performance of some other condition, it will be deemed an escrow. Where it is merely to wait the lapse of time, or the happening of some contingency, and not the performance of a condition, it will be deemed the grantee's deed presently. Still it will not take effect as a deed until the second delivery; but when thus delivered it will take effect by relation from the first delivery." This distinction between a deed placed in the hands of a depositary to be "delivered" by him upon the performance of some condition, and a deed "delivered" to the depositary to be by him handed over to the grantee at the death of the grantor, is recognized quite generally throughout the United States (2 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 342; 16 Cyc. 566, and cases there cited); but the courts are not agreed either as to the complete effect to be given to the "delivery" to the depositary, or as to the time when the title passes to the grantee. Some courts seem to hold that for many purposes the deed becomes operative and title passes when the deed is delivered to the depositary; others, that it does not become operative till the death of the grantor, and then by relation takes effect from the "delivery" to the depositary; while still others seem to hold that the "delivery" to the depositary conveys title immediately to the grantee, subject to the life interest of the grantor. Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 412, 37 Am. Dec. 154; Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 92; Haeg v. Haeg, 53 Minn. 83, 55 N. W. 1114; Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Baker v. Baker, 159 Ill. 394, 42 N. E. 867; Brown v. Westerfield, 47 Neb. 399, 66 N. W. 439, 53 Am. St. Rep. 532; Arnegard v. Arnegard, 7 N. D. 475, 75 N. W. 797, 41 L. R. A. 258.

To a certain extent such a distinction is recognized in our own reports. In Belden v. Carter, 4 Day, 66, 4 Am. Dec. 185, the deeds were left with a third party with directions to keep them, and, if the grantor never called for them, to deliver them after the grantor's death to the grantees, but, if the grantor called for the deeds, to deliver them to him. The grantor died without recalling the deeds. It was held that the delivery to the third person was a delivery of the grantor's deeds presently; that the depositary held them in trust for the grantees; that the title became consummate in the grantees upon the death of the grantor; and that the deeds took effect by relation from the time of the first delivery. The placing of the deeds with the depositary was held to be a delivery of the grantor's deed presently, although the grantor during his life retained full control of the deeds and could recall them at pleasure. The ruling upon this last point in the above case is opposed to the overwhelming weight of authority (see note to the case of Munro v. Bowles, 54 L. R. A. 872, and cases there cited), and it would not probably be followed in this state today. Porter v. Woodhouse, 59 Conn. 568, 22 Atl. 299, 18 L. R. A. 64, 21 Am. St. Rep. 131. In Stewart v. Stewart, 5 Conn. 316, James Stewart made a deed of land to his children, and delivered it to a third party to hold till the grantor's death and then to deliver it to the grantees. After his death the deed was duly delivered to the grantees. It was held, following Belden v. Carter, that the deed when placed in the depositary's hands was the grantor's deed presently, consummate upon his death, and "efficacious to the passing of the interest conveyed, from the delivery to the trustee or agent." The instrument was held not to be a devise, "but a deed taking effect from the first and only delivery, and consummated by the death of the grantor." In Jones v. Jones, 6 Conn. 111, 113, 16 Am. Dec. 35, Chief Justice Hosmer says, in effect, that the delivery of a deed to a third party to the use of the grantees, to be delivered to them after the death of the grantor, is by legal operation a delivery to the grantees themselves; and, although this was an obiter dictum, it is worthy of note "as the opinion of an eminent judge." Walte, J., in Woodward v. Camp, 22 Conn. 458, 461. In the last-named case a married woman united with her husband in the execution of a deed of land, and gave it to her husband with directions to deliver it to the grantee at her death. It was held in effect that the delivery to the husband was a delivery in presenti, vesting the title in the grantee, to become effectual and consummated upon the death of the grantor. On the other hand, in the cases cited below, the deeds and other instruments delivered to third parties for future conditional delivery were held to be escrows, having no operative force until the second delivery. Wolcott v. Coleman, 1 Conn. 375; Huntington v. Smith, 4 Conn. 235; Turner v. Coe, 5 Conn. 94; Sparrow v. Smith, 5 Conn. 113; Raymond v. Smith, 5 Conn. 555; White v. Bailey, 14 Conn. 271.
